I will close this article by remarking that the word Basileia, rendered kingdom, occurs in the apostolical writing 109 times and is never rendered church. And that the word Ekklesia, rendered church, occurs 115 times, and is never rendered kingdom. Thus, I hope you will be induced to cease using these terms interchangeably. And also abandon the idea of organization of either church or kingdom upon the day of Pentecost.

Scenes in Damascus.

Like all Eastern cities, the interior is disappointing. The streets are dusty and narrow, and the effect of the shabby houses and dilapidated walls is rather that of a collection of villages huddled together than of a large and important city. Our first call was made at an excellent hotel kept by a Greek. Its court-yards with fountains playing and large orange trees shadowing the whole place, looked so cultivating, its myrtles and jessamines and marble floors so cool, and its bedrooms so clean and comfortable, that we felt quite sorry it had not been arranged that we should stay there. Instead of pitching our tents in one of the far-famed gardens of Damascus. From the hotel we made a progress through the picture bazaars. Here there are covered-in buildings, swarming with people in every variety of oriental costumes. Turks, Syrians, Maronites and Druses of the town jostle each other. Now a Bedouin of the desert rides by on a beautiful Arab mare, with his long-pointed lance at rest, followed by other Bedouins on foot and in rags, unsuccessful robbers, possibly. Friday is the Mohammedan Sabbath, and they make it market day as well, so the Bedouins of the desert who come from long distances may combine their temporal and spiritual duties comfortably and do their marketing and go to the mosque on the same day. The streets were even more crowded than last night, with varied and wonderful costumes, so closely packed that it was difficult to make one's way through them. In the corner stood a Bedouin Ananzeh, of the tribes from near Palmyra, bargaining for a cane to make a spear, his goats-hair cloak, with its broad black and white stripes, hanging from his stalwart shoulders. Another of the tribe hard by seemed to be doing his best to sell his horse, while others again rode by with an abstracted air, the graceful mares which they bestrode often followed by whinnying foals. Groups of Jewish, Turkish, or Christian women made their purchases with quite as much earnestness and gesticulation as housewives nearer home, while their lords and masters lounged near, probably keeping an eye on the domestic expenditures, but apparently only intent on sweet-meats from some of the many venders. There were no Franks except ourselves.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, MAY 5, 1860.

OUR paper is full, and we forbear writing much this week. Hope to give some deferred articles a place soon.

FROM Brother Bond we learn that a mistake was made in the name of the person in an obituary notice in THE RESTITUTION of March 24th. The name should have been W. H. Patterson instead of W. H. Puttes.

OUR readers have noticed, no doubt, that we have been inserting articles recently from a new correspondent, W. G. Moncrieff. Brother W. Laing, of Edinburgh, Scotland, says of him in a recent letter, "that he was the first public advocate of Life Views in Scotland, from 1848 to 1854." He is now connected with the Investigator, a paper published at Montreal. We earnestly hope he will continue to write for THE RESTITUTION.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Jesus Tempted to Mistrust God.

Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, he was afterward ahungered. And when the tempter came to him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread. But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Matt. iv. 1-4.

VERSE THIRD.

"And when the tempter came to him," etc.

After the long term of fasting, the tempter spied a conspicious, and, in his estimate, no doubt, an opportune effort against the spiritual integrity of the Son of God. Seasonable it was, inasmuch as the object of his malice was physically exhausted, not without, it was to be lawfully conjectured, a considerable amount of attending mental depression. The time, therefore, was well chosen, and betrayed the coward as well as the fiend. Having the forty days of fasting, and absorbed meditation, and uninterrupted anxiety through which our Lord has passed before his imagination, a charming writer has said —"The whole period had been one of moral and spiritual tension. When the exaltation dies away, when the fire burns low, when Nature weary and overstrained, re-asserts her rights—in a word, when a mighty reaction has begun, which leaves the man suffering, spiritless, exhausted—then is the hour of extreme danger, and that has been in many a fatal instance the moment in which a man has fallen a victim to insidious allurement or bold assault. It was at such a moment that the great battle of our Lord against the powers of evil was fought and won."

In these circumstances of extreme distress, with his wearied head perhaps pillowed, like Jacob's on a stone, the tempter suggests to him a method of escape, hoping to entrap him, like a bird in the fowler's gin.

"If thou be the Son of God."—At his baptism the voice from heaven had said,—"This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased;"—a testimony given immediately before "the Captain of our Salvation" was subjected to the fiery ordeal in the wilderness. If you are, or since you have been pronounced the Son of God, you must surely be able to provide for your own urgent wants; now, therefore, act in character—"command that these stones be made bread"—turned into loaves—for your support.

It will be remembered that the last taunt addressed to our Lord on the cross was analogous in form to the Satanic appeal,—"If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross." By doing so we shall have evidence indeed that you are what you pretend to be!

It has been suggested that the aim of the tempter was to insinuate a doubt into the Savior's mind regarding His Sonship. "If thou be the Son of God."—Your circumstances, as if the adversary had went on, hardly indicate that you are so; now put it to the proof—settle the matter at once—"command that these stones be turned into bread." It is a simple experiment, and a word from your lips will explain all and confirm all. Had our Lord complied, he would have betrayed a doubt of his Father's testimony—would have acted as one without faith, and the antagonist's foul aim would have been achieved.

We are rather inclined to the view already hinted—"If thou be,"—or since you are—"the Son of God," work out your deliverance by the superhuman power in your will and arm—change the stones into food, and save yourself from suffering and impending death. Thus, as we understand the method of the tempter, the intent was not to trouble the Lord Jesus on the question of his Sonship, but rather, as it were, to speak confirmingly on that point,—may we not say flatteringly?—so as to incline him in his hunger and weakness to do something that would, equally with what the explanation just remarked upon supposes, indicate a lack of confidence in his Father's promises. This actually appears to be the point of attack as seen by his own rapid discernment, and against which, judging from the demand of the tempter, he felt it needful instantly to guard his character and standing as the one in whom his Father was well pleased, and as the Savior of a ruined world likewise.

The demand or counsel of the wretch, but was to all ordinary appearance harmless, reasonable, and proper in our Lord's situation. He had the ability to do what was proposed, and necessarily had a word in its defence. The design of the adversary was skillfully planned;—the art in the movement was deep and cunning. Thank God our sinless Master detected the attempt on his piety, and baffled the wiles of his foe and ours. Let us dwell on the plot for a little while, that we may understand it now perfectly in its structure and contemplated results.

We must bear in mind that our Lord was clothed with ample power to perform the act suggested by the tempter; and he must have been conscious that such was one of his endowments as the Son of God. We read his own wonderful words spoken on different occasions thereafter, and we may bring them up to the date of the temptation to exhibit how vast were the powers obedient to his control—"The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand."—"My Father worketh hitherto, and I work."—"The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do: for what things soever he doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise,"—"For as the Father raiseth the dead, and quickeneth them; even so the Son quickeneth whom he will." When, moved by exalted sympathy with suffering humanity, he cures the sick, feeds thousands with a few loaves and a few small fishes, stills the fury of the tempest on the sea of Galilee, and raises the dead, imparting joy to their sorrowing friends,—when he reveals in such instances the divine force hidden in his being, we learn the meaning of the words we have transcribed from the story of his life. It would have been no difficult matter for him to do what the enemy recommended. At a word the stones would have been transmuted into bread, as swiftly as the water once changed into wine, and the loaves and the fishes were mysteriously enlarged in bulk to feed a hungry multitude far removed from ordinary supplies.

But though he had the power he did not provide for himself a table in the wilderness; at all events, he had not done so up to the moment when he was urged to exercise his productive energy for that end. We may be sure he did not require the devil to hint to him that he held limitless capacity in trust, but, aware that it was his heritage and under his volition, he had purposely abstained from exercising it, and for reasons of the most exalted kind.

Why had he not used his miraculous ability to deliver himself when perplexed with hunger?

1. Being one of his Father's family, he had the common promises of relief, and he was willing to live by them in the same manner as the humblest of his brethren. What were the promises? Such as are directly or indirectly conveyed in texts like the following:—"The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want,"—"Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed,"—"They (the upright) shall not be ashamed in the evil time, and in the days of famine shall they be satisfied,"—"Bread shall be given him (the man who "walketh righteously"), his water shall be sure."

The Blessed One in trial could also recollect how an angel had pointed out a fountain to the exhausted Hagar; how another had touched Elijah, when greatly in need, and showed him food at hand to renew his strength; and how the same prophet had even been nourished for a period by ravens obeying a Divine mandate ruling their wild natures. These facts illustrated the gracious pledges and demonstrated to his understanding how the good word could not fail, even when the elect are in straits to all appearance the most desperate. Thus guided, thus upheld, he waited and suffered denying himself the exercise of the power which could easily have summoned before him the very luxuries known throughout earth's richest clines. He had to act as an example, and the hour of want was improved by him silently to read us an enduring lesson. His Father is our Father, and what he did in the time of pain, he can enable us to do after his course

Again.—He was soon to deliver instructions bearing on the identical subject now growing in his experience, and it was essential that there should be nothing in his history that seemed even in appearance to weaken the force of the teaching he was about to convey. On the Mount, he thus taught his disciples:—"Take no thought (be not anxious) saying, What shall we eat? or what shall we drink? . . . Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things." Had he by supernatural might provided for himself in the deprivations of the solitude, would not his example have crippled and crushed into the sand the lofty precepts that fell from his tongue? A poor saint when pangs assailed him could not have said in hope of infinite comfort, let me now look steadily to Jesus when he was similarly tried. Turning towards the desert he would behold the Son of God with his resistless authority commanding angels to his help, or supplies from the four winds of Heaven. He was hungered, the sufferer might exclaim, but I am feeble as a child in the day of my need; I cannot appease my own cravings like him, and what is left me but despair? He—the Son of God—could not endure, privation, how can I when darkness is all around? But our great Friend would not leave his people only with words, forlorn. He went down to the lowest depths of human woe, and in that groaning stormy sphere became an inspiring aid to all the sons and daughters of pain. It was his choice so to do. Love moved him to court the bitterest experience mortal heart can feel, that he might assure us that even trials so great, so piercing, may be nobly borne, for he bore them with only the stay and the celestial wine free to the entire household of faith.

Do you not observe that the principle on which he acted when pressed by the grip of hunger, was the same that regulated his whole career? His might, so great, is only at the service of others,—never used for his own advantage. It is an overwhelming thought that he who could have done so much for himself, never thought of himself at all. Even when his enemies rudely insulted him, when they crowned him with thorns, and nailed him to the cross, he held that tremendous potency in his will by a firm and merciful restraint. He could have withered them where they stood as by a flash of lightning, but his mission was to save men's lives, not to destroy them. The sight is divine, and has melted unnumbered hearts in tears. It is an out-shadowing of the infinite long-suffering and pity,—a spectacle whose lines of grandeur, whose depth of meaning, angels and men will never but dimly comprehend. It is unselfishness unveiled, radiant with eternal beauty. It is, in a word, the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge.

To be done for the present:—While our Lord suffers from want, and is in the act of being tempted to unbelief, we may reflect for a moment that he had treasured up some experience within the past few days as to how his Father was able to preserve him when all the means of support were withdrawn, or rather when he was withdrawn from them. The forty days and forty nights amid the wild beasts whispered to him—trust! His whole previous life,—his escape when an infant from murderous cruelty, his support in Egypt, the humble home at Nazareth, where toil brought the sainted household bread,—all cried—trust! This passing season of gloom and distress was no evidence that his Father in heaven had forgotten to care; therefore, he ought to trust,—he could trust,—and, glory be to God, he did trust.

"Whatever You Do, Do It heartily as to the Lord."

Whatever you do—what does that mean? Just this, that everything you do, is to be done as if you were doing it for the Lord, and it is not only to be done as to him, but done heartily—with the whole heart.

What a blessed life to live! How easy each task becomes when done for One for whom we feel such tender love! If done for him—done as to him—knowing that our work must, if well done, or ill done,—be seen of him—how careful will we be that it be done well.

Whatever be the service he requires of us, let it be joyfully and readily performed. He looks at the heart. He sees our motives. Let these be so true and loyal, that, for his sake, we will avoid "the very appearance of evil;" avoid that, which will, in any way, hinder the progress of truth. If what we do, is done as to the Lord, we will take his way of doing it; we will fill our hearts with his spirit, walk in his footsteps, have the mind that was in him, that esteems others as better than ourselves. Filled with his tenderness and compassion, how will we plead with the perishing? how much we will sacrifice to save them! What cherished schemes give up! How humble ourselves to teach them the way of life! What hardships will we endure!

Working as for the Lord, how kind will we be to those whom we deem to be in error; how ready and free to service; how meek in shewing them wherein they have gone astray; how careful, lest we drive them from the truth.

Working as for the Lord, we will do all that we can, for one another; we will admonish, exhort and pray, striving to so help each to attain unto the end of the race.

Working as for the Lord, we will in all our business transactions, keep him in mind; we will remember him morning, noon and night, and so living, will be accepted of him when he comes in his glory. S. ROXANA WING.

Sir, We Would See Jesus!—No. 2.

To write upon the negative or dark side of of the subject we have under consideration, is not a pleasure, but a task; who can estimate or fully set forth the dreadful consequences of disobeying God's holy law? Did God inflict the full penalty of the law upon Adam? We answer unhesitating yes. Will he repeat it? No; it would be out of harmony with every attribute of his whole being. Will he be less exacting or less inflexible in enforcing to the full extent, the penalty of his law on the men of this age or generation; than to Adam or those who have lived in the ages preceding the Gospel? No. God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation (or age) he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted with him. Oh, how changed the scene! Evil enters, man yields to temptation, eats the forbidden fruit, violates God's law, becomes a sinner, (for sin is the transgression of God), yea, a rebel against the government of God; the hosts of Satan are marshaled for the conflict; the black flag is hoisted; yea, nailed to the mast, and has floated in triumph over this fallen or revolted planet for 6,000 years; and to-day the rebellion is just as determined, just as sanguine, and just as fearful as when Adam experienced the withering curse of his Maker. What was the motive, and what is the motive now? Answer:—The supremacy of the earth; it will be the motive till the strong man armed comes and binds him and spoils his goods, and takes possession of the purchased inheritance. Surely the motive is strong enough for both saint and sinner to exclaim in dead earnest, "Sir, we would see Jesus." But man is a sinner; he loves darkness rather than light. While we write we utter a prayer to the God of heaven: Break the delusion, yea, the charm that binds the men of this generation to this rebellious world, draw aside the curtain, let in one ray or one flash of the glory of the coming age; dispel the midnight darkness that envelops the minds of men, that they may escape for their life, and look not behind them, but remember Lot's wife.

Oh that we were able to delineate and set forth in its true light the result of the great transgression, it is wide as the world, high as the heaven, and as deep as the foundations on which the earth rests. Just so wide, so high, and so deep will the great atonement reach and work an eternal, complete, and effectual cure for all the evils resulting from Adam's violation of God's law. Who then of the lost sons and daughters of Adam will not join with the writer, and exclaim with the Greeks who went up to Jerusalem to worship, "Sir we would see Jesus?" or with the Revelator, "Come, Lord Jesus, Oh, come quickly?" The apostacy must be perfected, the man of sin fully developed, the vine of the earth gathered and cast into the wine press of the wrath of God; the tares must be gathered, bound in bundles and burned. What motive can the scattered remnant of the church of God put forth, or lay before the men of this generation that they may see the dreadful condition they are in, how powerless, are the sects and denominations to teach, and lead men in the way of salvation? Again we ask, what can we do? Answer:—We can, and must do just what Noah and Lot did, for beyond all question we are in the antitype of their days; we must preach the whole truth as it is in Jesus; yea, and we must practice it, as Noah and Lot did; it will avail nothing without the practice; faith without works is dead. Our works must be wrought in God and must yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness. Noah was a man of faith and of works, by his faith he honored and pleased God; by his works he warned that wicked generation and thus prepared an ark for the salvation of himself and family. Oh that we could work as effectually as did Noah; a bright type of Christ, that our sons and our daughters, would come into the ark, ere the gathering storm of God's wrath bursts upon our ungodly world.

A few inferences before we close. We are not looking for the one very God, the eternal Father to come as the second person of the adorable trinity nor are we looking merely for a great prophet, the Son of Joseph and Mary. We are not looking for a spiritual manifestation in and through the church to convert the world under the present arrangement of the Gospel, nor are we looking for the saints to be taken to some far off planet while the earth is burned or melted, and a new heaven and a new earth created instanter by an act of Physical Omnipotence; which the saints will descend and take possession of. These have no warrant or support in the word of God but are the contrivings of the creed makers. But we are looking and earnestly, desire to see the same Jesus, the Son of Man, the Son of God; yea, the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world. Even the man of sorrows who sojourned in Jerusalem, who demonstrated the power and authority that God the Father endowed him with, by the miracles and wonderful works he performed, was crucified and laid in Joseph's new tomb, whom God raised from the dead on the third auspicious day, made immortal by the Spirit of holiness, who was with his disciples forty days and forty nights, instructing them in the things relating to the kingdom of God, who ascended from Mount Olivet to the right hand of the Father, to fill the office of our High Priest as our advocate and intercessor, which is to continue till the times of the Gentiles expire, from whence he is to come again clothed in majestic, royal, kingly power, to occupy the throne of his Father David; to rule the world for an age, in which will be restored all that was lost by the great transgression. We would see Jesus as the Life Giver, the only one to whom God has delegated the power to raise up and quicken into new and immortal life the righteous dead and living. We would see him; for the promise is unto them that look for him, and love his appearing, will he come, without a sin offering unto salvation.

We have named some of the reasons why we are in sympathy with the Greeks who uttered the words of our text, but who can contemplate the great and glorious, as well as the heartrending and soul distressing scenes that are just before us. How did the heart of the dear Redeemer bleed with sorrow and anguish, when he uttered his last lamentation over his beloved countrymen, their city and temple? Should not the body, who have been so highly favored with the clear light of Divine Revelation be in deep sympathy with the head and weep day and night; over the condition of the fallen, perishing world.

Dearly beloved, let us bestir ourselves; first let us enter into a strict, careful, and prayerful examination of our hearts, our faith, and our works. Let us be sure that we stand approved of God, having believed and obeyed the Gospel, having been begotten by the word of truth, are walking in newness of life are living epistles known and read of all men. Let us lift up our voices, cry aloud, and spare not, but faithfully warn the men of this wicked and adulterous generation of the sure and certain doom that is just before them. Noah and his family were all gathered into the ark, God shut them in, they were saved. Oh that we had the testimony that it would be thus with our household. We often ask, why has he implanted in our hearts such a deep sympathy for our relatives and friends? We are not selfish, we extend the same sympathetic feeling to our neighbors and our enemies, that they might repent, believe and obey, and thus lay hold on eternal life.

Our convictions are strong that the end of the Gospel age is upon us, and we have but a short remnant of time to make the necessary preparation to meet him who is to judge and reward every one, as their works shall be. We feel we have come far short in setting forth the great transgression and its fearful results; and also the glory and blessedness of the near future age.

We would earnestly recommend the careful reading of the very able articles of Prof. J. P. Weethee, which we heartily endorse.

Dearly beloved, what can we say more, or what motive can we hold out, to stimulate the called out and chosen ones to hold fast wherewith they have attained, that no man take their crown.

Am I nearer home to-night?

The power of feeling for animals, realizing their wants and making their pains our own, is one which is most irregularly shown by human beings. A Timon may have it, and a Howard be devoid of it. A rough shepherd's heart may overflow with it, and that of an exquisite fine gentleman distinguished man of science may be as utterly without it as the neither millstone. One thing I think must be clear: till a man has learnt to feel for all his sentient fellow-creatures, whether in human or in brutal form, he has not yet ascended the first step towards true civilization nor applied the first lesson from the love of God.—Frances Power Cobbe.

When Chunichc, the founder of the present or Tsing dynasty, ascended the throne of China, he planted a tree in the courtyard of the temple called Tanche-ssu, which is situated in the hills a short distance west of Pekin. It is believed that the ruling family will remain in power so long as this tree exists. At present it shows no signs of decay, and has apparently a long life before it; but there is a still more extraordinary superstition attached to it. Saplings sprout out periodically from the root, and with the death of each prince one withers away, while a fresh one appears in honor of the new emperor. Each sapling bears the same relation to the individual prince that the tree does to the dynasty; and not unnaturally the Emperor for the time being watched with considerable anxiety the growth of his particular sapling. The tree is named "The Emperor's Tree," and it may be worthy of noting that the sapling of the present Emperor is said to be extremely vigorous and flourishing.

POETRY.

"She Lives Whom We Call Dead."
Longfellow.

W. F. CROCKETT.

O mortal! O deceived
By this illusive faith;
Hast thou ne'er conceived,
Hast thou ne'er believed,
That death is death?

The pallid cheek;
The shrunken sightless eyes;
What language do they speak,
Is here for life you seek,
Where this senseless being lies?

Has God permitted thee
Within death's bound to tread;
And is that mind eternal,
Living the forms to see,
"Whom we call dead?"

And thou hast learned to die
By such a faith—and leave
Death with thy words that fascts
The truth,—we must "all mourn" to be
At rest within the grave,

Oh would'st thou welcome peace
To seek the Light above;
And thou shalt find from woe our case,
And in the morning sweet release
To endless life and love.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GALVESTON, Texas, April 21st, 1880.

Editor Restitution: I herewith enclose a letter to me, and a communication for your paper, which the letter will explain. The article referred to was published in the Christian of the 19th of February, last. I wrote a review, (not using the one written by Bro. Luxford, of Richmond), and forwarded to the Christian's editor-in-chief, Mr. Garrison, who was in this city last winter, but owing to his absence from St. Louis, the article has not seen the light, nor do I yet know its fate. I have hope that he will publish it however as I was informed he had said as much. If you should publish the herewith sent article, please send the Christian a marked copy? This is a barren field, or at least, it appears so; although we are poor workers for the truth. Yours in the cause. Yours in the hope of Israel.

N. B. HENDY.

HENRICO CO., VA., April 3, 1880.

Bro. Hendy, Dear Sir: Bro. Luxford showed me your letter to him with the St. Louis paper also sent him. I took the paper for a short time and concluded while he was writing for you, I would also write a short article and see if I could get it in THE RESTITUTION, published at Plymouth, Indiana. Before I sent it off I saw Bro L., again, and he advised me (though not seeing what I had written) to send mine to you also, and let you select either his or mine as you might prefer, or from both and make up one of your own. I have concluded to do so; and if mine is worth anything you can use it; but being written for another paper would not answer exactly, for the St. Louis paper without some little alteration. If you think proper, you can still try it in THE RESTITUTION, or any other paper with or without your alterations, and use Bro. L., as contemplated. Bro. L., is rather more pressed for time than I am, and health not very good, though more competent probably to answer your purpose, he had completed nothing when I saw him, but will probably write you by time you get this from me. What I have written does not notice all the points so closely, as I had the paper but a short time and supposed that they would be more closely examined by him, would be glad if you would favor me with a copy of whatever may be published. My kind remembrance to Judge J., and all with you. Yours truly in the same hope.

R. R. BOWLES.

In a recent number of a paper called the Christian or Disciple, the editor or one in that capacity gives us in his own words the substance of a Bible conversation held a short time before that at Austin, Texas, intended as a reply to some question propounded by a Christadelphian at Galveston; and as if to avoid the responsibility of such inconsistent conclusions for himself alone, he gives them to his readers drawn from the half dozen or more individuals of that evening's entertainment; yet as he says it is not exactly in their own words but dressed up by himself, we notice them accordingly. I will first remind him of his own premises, "not to be wise above what is written." He says, "The thinking, knowing and intelligent part of man is alone responsible and hence the subject of rewards and punishments." It is written, "all who are in their graves shall come forth to their reward." If he can show that the subject which is in the grave is the spirit, and the body somewhere else he may be right. He says, "the spirit survives the dissolution of the body and must give an account to God." It is written "the hour is come when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live," but according to him they are already living somewhere, and hence no necessity of this awakening. Again he says, "The Savior explains the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, that the righteous are comforted the wicked are tormented." I cannot see it thus written there. He says "it is the soul or spirit that sins." It is written, "we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ that every one may receive the things in body according to what he hath done." He seems to congratulate himself somewhat, that "by denying that man was part of the deity, he has avoided the trap set for him." He has however failed to see another device on the trap which has entangled him in such conclusions as these. "The body is only the house in which the spirit resides. The spirit has to be clothed upon with its glorious body from heaven." Now is it not written, "This [mortal and not spirit] must be clothed with or put on immortality." This perfect union he says of the spirit with God in the life to come implies also the immortalization of the body. Do we have to depend on implication for such teachings, when Paul says positively, "this mortal must put on immortality" proving a change of state as, "put on the beautiful garments, O, Jerusalem." It is surprising to see how freely some persons will use the sacred writings, and some scarcely use them at all. But perhaps he is a so-called preacher (a misnomer) and has rights in Bible definitions which the Christadelphians have not: yet he should remember he has no authority to go beyond what is written. Immortality he says, means more than continued existence. No etymologist can get more out of that word than deathlessness or mortality deprived of its attributive character by the prefix im. There are many promises made to those who attain to immortality. I will now put him side by side with Alexander Campbell. Campbell says Ch., system p., 281. "Immortality in the sacred writings is never applied to the spirit of man; it is not the doctrine of Plato which the resurrection of Jesus proves; it is the immortalization of the body of which his resurrection is a proof or pledge. . . . Jesus was not a spirit when he returned to God" But this editor says the "spirit is immortal and not subject to decay and disintegration." Those who call themselves "Christians or Disciples" until comparatively some few years back, advocated the doctrine of the "immortality of the soul." They have found that doctrine untenable; they now contend for the "immortality of the spirit." "Spirit" in the sacred writings is no more expressive of immortality than soul. Abraham and Jacob when they died, gave up the ghost or spirit, but according to the teachings now sought to be enforced on us, they did not do as the record tell us, but they and their spirits went off together. The preacher Ec. iii. 19. Says the same fatality happens to man as to beasts, "as the one dieth so dieth the other; they have all one breath." [Heb. ruach, Gr. pneuma].

Immortality occurs five times, and never in connection with soul or spirit; twice out of the five it is applied to the body. "Immortal" occurs only once and then it is applied to the King eternal alone. We have liquids which do not go to corruption as water does; we call them "spirits;" some "ardent spirits," not because they are less material than water, but because they have more life abiding in them; have the death principle worked out of them, are rectified, and fitted for a more enduring existence. Spirit does not mean immateriality, nor does Paul deal with it thus. Spirit is from spiro, to breathe. We breathe for a while, but have death in our organizations, and, therefore, cannot be spiritual, living or breathing, in the sense of an immortal being, until we have the death principle worked out of us; when that takes place we will have living or spiritual bodies, or bodies given us not by the will of our parents, but by the spirit of God. Paul does not say "there is a natural body and there is a spirit," but a "spiritual body." To be born is to come into existence, and the birth we once had was dependent on the will of our parents, but when the resurrection state comes, our progenitors who have crumbled into dust as well as we, cannot reproduce us; for us to be born again, other means will have to be used, which we do not now comprehend any more than whence comes and goes the wind that blows, "so is every one that is born of the spirit." And we know that Paul says "He will quicken our mortal bodies by his spirit, which will be a spiritual birth, or being "born again;" a body, not a natural body, but a spiritual body filled to partake of the life beyond, which he makes entirely dependent on the resurrection of the dead. 1 Cor. xv. And Jesus also in almost similar words to Nicodemus makes this birth of the spirit an indispensible condition to an entrance in the kingdom. Can these Austinites who have proved themselves not very well instructed in the teachings of either Alexander Campbell, or Paul and Jesus, suppose for a moment that a Christadelphian, or any one else who desires a "thus saith the Lord," for his faith can believe such nonsense as we have quoted? If they would themselves be wise in what is written, let them study their Bibles more, and the theology of the day less; and if they would have their lights radiate from their city of the "Lone Star," let them take heed that "that light which is in them be not darkness," that they may not be allured by that strong delusion "which is permitted to exist" into a belief of a lie to their own condemnation. 2 Thess. ii. 12.

Bible Retaliation: The Holy Scriptures teach that there is no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus, provided they walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit. The apostle in his epistle to the saints or holy ones in Rome, dwells upon this idea to a considerable extent, and with great earnestness, or we can see for ourselves in the eighth chapter of said epistle. It is certainly a great and consoling thought. It is calculated to make us examine ourselves as to whether we are in the anointed Jesus. In his epistle to the Galatians he teaches that they, as believers, are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus; for, says he, "As many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ, and if ye be Christ's, ye are Abraham's seed, and are heirs according to the promise." In the same context, in Romans, he says: "The spirit beareth witness that we are the children of God, and if children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ," provided we suffer with him, that we may be glorified with him. Howbeit, I reckon, that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory to be revealed in us. The earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God. For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected (the same) in hope, that the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. The apostle represents every creature as groaning and travailing in pain, on account of this bondage of corruption. How thankful we ought to be for so glorious a hope. Even the apostles groaned on account of the present bondage while waiting for the adoption, that is, the redemption of the body. The whole of this eighth chapter in Romans is exceedingly rich. It is a volume in few words, and well worthy of hiding in our hearts. In a part of it he says: "We know that all things work together for good to them who love God, who are the called according to his purpose." Whom he foreknew, he predestined, that is, marked out beforehand, even in this life, by their being conformed to the image of his son. He sums up, in the conclusion, with the unfeigned assurance that neither death, nor life, nor all things combined, can separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord. Let us, then, provoke one another to love and good works.

The obelisk which was ordered by Queen Victoria to be erected on the spot where the Prince Imperial fell in Zululand, has been put in position.

A New Testament has recently been translated into Hebraw by Prof. Delitsch, of Leipsic, for the benefit of the Jews of Germany, Russia and Poland.

A manuscript supposed to have been written by St. Peter has lately been discovered among the property of a man named Bore, who died last year at Jerusalem, at the age of 101. The style of the work has led to the conclusion that it is authentic, and it is stated that the London Bible Society, which has despatched a committee to the spot, has offered Bore's heirs the sum of $100,000 for its possession. The heirs, however, refuse to part with the manuscript, though it seems probable that they will allow the society to reproduce and translate it.

On the Goldberg at Mardorf, near Marburg, in Hesse, a large number of rare ancient gold coins have just been discovered. They are so-called Bracteates. On the hollow side there is a picture in relief, having three, five, seven, or nine elevated points, of a snake-like animal; while the raised side shows a gear-shaped elevation in the center, surrounded by two or three points and a wreath of leaves. The size of the coins is about that of a half-sovereign, but thicker, the value amounting nearly to a sovereign.

It is estimated that there are 500,000 wolves in European Russia, and the havoc they make every year is immense. Statistics show that in 1873 the damage caused by them amounted in value to about £1,250,000, and this is believed to be much under the real loss. In one district it is known that over 3,000 head of reindeer belonging to the nomads were destroyed by the wolves in a single night. In some instances there is a desire on the part of the peasants to conceal the facts. Besides the destruction of domestic animals, the annual loss of human life by wolves is about one hundred and fifty souls.

The United States had just come into possession of another revolutionary relic of historic value. A few days ago Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, presented to the United States, through President Hayes, the writing desk upon which the Declaration of Independence was written by Mr. Jefferson. It was given in the name of the children of the late Mr. Joseph Coolidge, of Boston, to whom it was given by Jefferson himself in 1825, whose granddaughter Mr. Coolidge had married. The desk will be deposited in the dre-proof library of the State Department, where the original draft of the Declaration is preserved.

The San Francisco Chronicle has ascertained that Chinamen decline to become naturalized because the Chinese penal code declares that all persons who renounce their country and their allegiance shall be beheaded. The property of all such criminals is to be confiscated, and their wives and children distributed as slaves to the great officers of state. Their parents, grandparents, brothers, and grandchildren, whether habitually living with them under the same roof or not, are to be banished to the distance of 2,000 leagues. All who conceal or connive at the crime are to be strangled. Those who inform against the criminals are rewarded with the whole of their property.

HOW QUEEN VICTORIA LOOKS.

I had a good view of her Majesty's features as possible at a distance of about thirty paces in a railroad depot not too liberally lighted with gas. She is not so tall as she looks in the photographs and standard paintings. She is decidedly below the ordinary height, and not so stout as I have often heard her described. She is what I should call one of the "comfortable" build. Her Majesty was dressed in very deep mourning, with an abundance of crape. Her head covering was a sort of crape coronet hat; her dress was long behind and looped up in front, and covered with crape, and she wore, as well as I could discern, a black cloth jacket, trimmed heavily with crape, of a very plain, square cut. If she carried any jewelry it was of the simplest description: none of it was visible, and one of her hands was ungloved

DIED.

SHIPMAN.—Of old age, March 30, Bro. Jacob Shipman.

Brother Shipman was born in one of the New England states, in A. D. 1800, and after coming to the years of accountability joined in with the Christian Church, and when having occasion to change his place of residence moved to the state of Pennsylvania taking with him a letter from the above named church, and while living in that state, he and his wife joined and worshipped with the Baptists. In 1860, he with his family, moved into this town (Somerset, Wis.) and being vacated from all church relationship, was forced to take the Bible as his only guide in the way to life, and from it he felt the power of the Most High, he found the way of life, and as he felt me, he felt as though he had found a pearl of great price. He told me that I was the only man that he had ever seen who held to God's plan of salvation as revealed in the Bible. He sent for me to come and see him about three weeks before he died and as I knew that to die rejoiced as they listened to the glorious testimony of the dying man. He said that he was now ready to be offered. Oh, wonderful preparation! We trust a crown awaits him. May the good Lord sustain his aged companion and all that mourn his loss. Services by the writer, assisted by the Congregationalist clergyman of town.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

All the associations that the author advances are correct, in full accord with the Scriptures, and never more timely or well attended; and in the right spirit, cannot fail to give strength and comfort to the earnest true hungry-for Christ. Philadelphia, June 9, 1877.

Everything is substantiated by copious quotations from the Scriptures—and every one we have had an interest directly, would not convey the idea. We have been deeply absorbed, for some of the topics are treated in some in importance to us. . . . Any one not fully convinced with new subject in all its bearings, and who wishes to see the question presented in a clear and convincing way should buy this book.—The Herald Messenger, Va., May 1, 1878.

The author presents his thoughts in a very pleasing manner, and is correct in doctrine, and his spirit Christian.—The Watch Tower, Christopher, Kinston, N. C., Oct. 15, 1879.

We think the book is a strong one, and we take pleasure in recommending it to those who desire to inform themselves concerning the steps in advance.—The Christian Herald, Chesterfield, Missouri, July 16, 1879.

In presenting the conditions of salvation, the author is clear and strong. . . . For those who desire to know the best of reasons he said in support of these views, it would be difficult to find a pleasanter book to read or a better.—The Christian Standard, (Disciples), Cincinnati, O., Sept. 27, 1879.

The author shows very clearly that the inheritance is to be upon the earth, and that immortality is not a present possession of man, but is to be sought for and obtained only as the gift of God through Jesus Christ.—Western Christ, (Adventist), Boston, Nov. 13, 1879.

The doctrine is ably set forth, and conscientiously discussed. The author is very fervent in thought and happy in illustration. . . . The spirit of the author is Christian and saintly.—Nine Reveiw, Philadelphia, January 22, 1880.

There is much valuable truth in this volume.—The Sabbath, London, Eng.

I think your book, "the Gospel of the Kingdom," is unanswerable; the scriptures are so plainly introduced by you (texts no room for opposing arguments.—S. H. M., Va.

I am well pleased with the book; it is very instructive. I hope you will have a large sale in this vicinity.—S. H. M., Ontario, Canada.

Our sincere thanks to you for the work cannot be expressed with words.—T. T. D., Texas.

I am very much comforted by your excellent discourses. They are models of study and of logic, and will shelter in the deep deluge of God's word more and more.—W. S., Florida.

At once to my surprisings, I was unable to put down the reading, I wanted an interview adjourning or preacher; and am glad to say your book fills the place. I have it out at the work already.—S. W. K., Illinois.

An elder lately will every copies in Evansville, writes. They do splendid work. In my examination the subject I shall always need and listened to have taken from you.—J. F. C., Arkansas.

I have obtained of all the books that I got of you a good while ago, and as there is considerable interest manifested in this part of the country, I concluded that I would send for some more, as they are considered a splendid work.—E. H. H., Illinois.

I am delighted with the book, and feel sure that it will do much towards spreading the glorious truths of the "strange doctrine" which you so ably advocate.—Mrs. A. M., Texas.

Lucid, forcible, and abounding with plain Scriptural proof, every sentence it must recommend itself to all lovers of divine truth.—Mrs. R. L. H., Va.

I have read brother Jones' book of Ten Discourses, and I say emphatically that I think it ultimately well suited to put into the hands of one who desires to learn the gospel.—Alfred Ackerson, Va.

If it is such the shortest to in the hands of every lover of the Bible.—Rev. G. Hockaday, S. J.

The reader who will mentally digest it, will find in the subject a perfect key to what seems exceedingly contrary to most mysterious of all books—the Bible—and I venture to say that the way of eternal salvation is as plainly described and clearly revealed as it possibly could be to the human understanding. While a money value cannot be placed on such a work, we may be pardoned in saying that any one of the Ten Discourses is worth the price asked for the book.—L. Reynolds, M. D., Va.

The price of this book, by mail is $1.00, which may be sent by post-office order or registered letter, either before or since you receive the book. Send Orders to WILEY JONES,

RESTITUTION FUND.

ANSON, Fulton Co., Ind., Nov. 29, 1879.

Elder Restitution:—With your permission I will make an appeal to the brotherhood for help to support THE RESTITUTION for the year 1880 and locate the weekly there.

Now, dear brethren, I call upon one and all who feel themselves able, to donate to the cause of Christ the small amount of $5.00 between this and the first of January.

Dear brethren, we could do this, with a few exceptions, if we just thought so. I am well aware that many brethren have comprehended Lodge, but I make this appeal in a special manner to those who have heretofore been nothing as a free-will offering.

Dear brother, do not say, I am too poor. Perhaps you are using that money for tea, coffee, tobacco, or some other luxuries. Consider for one moment: are we who claim to be the chosen of God, of so poverty stricken that we cannot support a weekly paper.

We do hope that everyone will respond to this appeal. Please let us hear from all those who cannot or will not pay the $5.00, and will deny ourselves of some of their excess. I am also a poor man. My name is Abraham Fontbonn. I am 43 years old and have a large family to support. I have a small farm of 80 acres. I farm and work at the carpenter's trade to support my family. I use neither tobacco nor intoxicating drinks.

And, dear Editor, I will enclose $5.00 to commence on. I read THE RESTITUTION, and the Bible, and I hope to meet you all in that coming Kingdom. So, farewell.

POETRY.

The Silent Life.

We lead two lives, the outward scenery fair
And full of smiles, that on the surface lie,
The other spent in many a silent prayer,
With thoughts and feelings hid from mortals eye.

The weary, weary hours of mental pain,
Unspoken yearnings for the dear ones now
The wishes half defined, yet crowded down,
Make up the silent life we lead alone.

And happy visions we may never show,
Hold all the silent life with sweet perfume;
That they who lead like outward glances know,
Yet life seems brighter for each stolen gleam.

This silent life—we little reck its power
To strengthen us in right, and quell
What, or we from our thoughts like blight to rout,
Or let them wander where-so'er they will

This silent life not those we love may share,
Though day by day we strive to draw them near;
Our secret chamber—none may enter there,
Save that one Eye that never seeks to peer.

And if beneath that Eye we do not quail,
Though all the world may turn from us aside,
We own a secret power that shall prevail
When every motive of our life is dried.

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

"The Regeneration of Palestine"—Mr. Gladstone and the Anglo-Turkish Convention—Turkey's Continued Decline—The Jews and Their Affairs.

The crisis described in our last summary of the "Signs of the Times" seems to an end, so far as the outside world is permitted to know, by Turkey giving in to the demands of England, and appointing Baker Pacha to superintend the introduction of reforms into Asia Minor. The London correspondent of the Liverpool Daily Post says that people in the Metropolis in government secrets, believe the appointment of Baker Pacha has more to do with military than reform measures in the Asiatic dominions of the Sultan. Russia's threatening attitude on the Armenian frontier suggests the advisability of England getting into some degree of readiness for the struggle which politicians foresee must take place between the two powers in that quarter of the world.

Be it as it may, reforms are the pretext; and reforms will doubtless to some extent be carried on concurrently with whatever military arrangements it may be considered necessary to make. Among these reforms, it is most cheering to see some indications of those having reference to the Jews and their land. The editor of the Jewish Chronicle says he believes the Prime Minister of England has received with approval a suggestion for the establishment of industrial colonies of Jews in the Holy Land under the auspices of the Anglo-Turkish Convention. The article in which this statement is made is so interesting that we make no apology for quoting it entire. It is entitled

THE REGENERATION OF PALESTINE.

The idea that in our days we should see Palestine reorganized, is sufficient to arouse the warmest interest in the minds of every Jew who has the least zeal for his race or admiration for its brilliant history. The practical ways and means of bringing this about are engaging the attention of many very good and earnest people, and it is not by any means impossible that this inspiration, which seems at first sight so visionary, may actually be realized within no very long time. This state of thing in the Turkish Empire and the absolute necessity of some improvement there, encourage the supposition, and we believe it is quite true, that the Prime Minister of England has received with approval the suggestion that, under the shelter of the English Protectorate of Asia Minor, arrangements should be made for setting industrial colonies of Jews in Palestine. Prosperous colonies of German Christians are already resident in two or three exceptionally flourishing parts of that country. We have ourselves published a letter from a Jewish colonist, who is farming at some distance from Jerusalem; and the Jaffa Agricultural School, under the presidency of Mr. Charles Netter, is well-known to our readers. More recently than the formation of any of the establishments to which we have referred, the subject was prominently taken up by the candidate for an English constituency, Mr. Cazalet, Liberal candidate for Mid-Kent. This gentleman has established manufactories with great success in Russia, and perhaps entertains the idea, which has occurred to many, of removing some of the large Jewish population which is known to be practiced in agricultural pursuits in Russia, to the more favored country of the Levant. Mr. Cazalet, in a pamphlet which is before us, enlarges at considerable length upon the ways and means of accomplishing the restoration of Syria. He does not regard Palestine as distinct from Syria, but treats the larger area as the country which is destined by the fact that many Jews have settled in Damascus, and other parts of the province.

"No one can read the history of this part of the world without being astonished at the magnitude of the change which has come over it. The traveller in the land of Edom comes on the vast ruins of Petra, a great stone city, with the remains of temples, baths, aqueducts, in solid rock or marble, once busy with the resort of merchants, artisans, soldiers, and people of all kinds, now utterly deserted except by a few wandering Arabs, who occasionally pitch their tents in the silent market-place. Baalbek and Palmyra are other famous deserted cities of Syria. Wherever the traveller goes he finds ruins of aqueducts, fallen walls, broken columns, and great cities untenanted. The desert has encroached upon places which were once cultivated with all the careful art of the la petite culture. The country has become almost depeopled through the rapacity of its governors or their inability to preserve peace. It can never be forgotten by anyone who reads history, that without a strong government to repress violence, communities of men are always liable to relapse into primitive savagery, and that to lose the characteristics which enables man to survive at all. Without institutions, man is one of the feeblest of living things, and a race which loses its institutions dies away. In Syria, political institutions became long ago weak and corrupt; and the inevitable consequence was the physical and moral decay of the population. Mr. Cazalet gives a melancholy picture of the state of those who at present survive, and it is obvious that the tendency is to complete extinction and not to any recovery. Once, however, introduce a better government, and the individuals set free to it would develop powers of improvement of which they at present but rarely disclose the germ.

Syria, says Mr. Cazalet, has a population of two millions. Of this population, nearly 1,500,000 are Moslems. But these are not Turks; they are Arabs, and they hate the Turks with an undying hatred. The Christians number about 450,000. Of other sects, such as the Druses and Ansadrych, there may perhaps be 150,000; and there are 25,000 Jews. The Turks are a few in number, strangers in race and language, hated by every sect and class, wanting in physical power, destitute of moral principle, and yet they are the despots of the land. The Arabs who thus form two-thirds of the whole of the population, and are for the most part lords of the soil, are with very few exceptions, completely illiterate, regardless of truth, dishonest in their dealings, and immoral in their conduct. In large towns the greater proportion of the upper class are both physically and mentally feeble, owing to the effects of polygamy, early marriages, and degrading vices. Out of such elements there is no possibility of creating a ruling class. The other sects are too few in number, and too bigoted and superstitious to be of any assistance in the government of the country. There was a chance, says Mr. Cazalet, for the regeneration of this country some years ago, when the Viceroy of Egypt conquered it from his suzerain the Sultan. It was England who interposed, and compelled Mehemet Ali to retire to the banks of the Nile. Lord Palmerston confessed to the French Ambassador that his purpose was to make Syria a desert in order to interpose an insurmountable barrier between the Sultan and his Egyptian vassal. So Mr. Cazalet states on the authority of Guizot's Memoirs. Whether or not this singular policy ever guided the English Government, it is certain that different motives now prevail. The acquisition of Cyprus is a sign that the condition of Asia Minor will no longer be a matter of indifference to the great power which has already exercised a political influence for good greater than any of which we have had experience in the history of the world.

Discussing the means of restoring prosperity to Syria, Mr. Cazalet says that if the regeneration of Syria is to be attempted it must of necessity come from without, and can be brought about by an influx of an industrious and more enlightened people. The restoration of the Jews to their own land seems to him the only practicable means. This event need not prove in any way a strain on the resources of England. All that is required is that England should create the conditions under which a large number of Jews would gradually emigrate of their own accord to Syria and Palestine. The first condition of such a movement is that law and order should be introduced under the English Protectorate. The greedy Pasha and the unjust judge must be got rid of. England must take the executive out of the country which is in her own hands. A second condition essential to the return of the Jews is, that some great work such as the construction of the Euphrates Valley Railway, should be undertaken by the English government. This would afford occupation for a vast number of mechanics and laborers, and serve as a guarantee that our protectorate would not be abandoned. Another influence which would greatly assist the colonization of the country would be to establish a college in the Holy Land, which would serve as a centre of Jewish philosophy and science. The total number of Jews throughout the world is variously estimated at from eight to ten millions. Of these the greater number—probably six millions—inhabit Russia, Roumania, and the old Polish provinces which now belong to Austria and Germany. The condition of the Jews in Russia is deplorable in the extreme. They are denied civil rights. They are forbidden to hold landed property. They are treated as aliens, and are restricted to limited areas in which they suffer from the evils of over-population. These conditions have induced many thousands of Russian Jews to migrate to America within the last thirty and forty years, and it may be confidently predicted that Syria, under the British protectorate, would offer still greater attractions. 'Nobody,' concludes Mr. Cazalet, 'who has any knowledge of the Jewish character, can for a moment doubt that if the Jews were restored to their country under an English protectorate they would prove true to our nation, and that Syria would become as firmly united to England as if it were peopled by our own countrymen.'

So speaks Mr. Cazalet as a purely English politician, and it cannot be denied that the English have acquired by their protectorate to the Asiatic dominions of the Porte a right to deal with this question without consulting any of the other powers. Their part would perhaps be limited to establishing by their authority a small board, which would then administer Syria or Palestine as the case might be. Two or three able men, supported by the authority of a great European State and with power to levy an armed constabulary, would, if gained as they doubtless would be by wise economical principles, make in five years an enormous difference in the condition of the province. Instead of the scanty share of plunder extorted in all sorts of cruel and unlikely ways from the provincials which now filters to Constantinople, the Porte would receive a regular tribute. Justice would be equitably administered, the taxes imposed with discrimination, and collected without illegal extortion. The Euphrates railway does not seem to us a necessary part of the scheme; but is doubtless desirable for its own sake. The first step of the new Board would be to regulate the Haluchn, the almsmoney which at present corrupts and demoralizes the Jewish population. A large influx of immigrants might indeed have the like effect without any positive regulation, since it would make the amount which each individual would receive too small to have much influence on his conduct. But it would be wiser to abolish the present distribution altogether, and to apply the moneys received to the endowment of a Hebrew University at Jerusalem. The International Palestine Commission is already collecting money for a modern school in Jerusalem. Mr. Samuel Montagu showed in our last how much this is needed, and the well-intentioned defence of the present state of things which Mr. Cardalla sends us this week cannot alter the facts as related by all impartial travellers. Efforts to improve elementary education in Jerusalem, can do nothing but good. It must be confessed, however, that praiseworthy as this movement is, it is too small. To cope with the needs of the situation a large measure and governmental powers are necessary, and their results might not only be most beneficial to poor and oppressed communities of Jews, but might powerfully promote and accelerate the civilization of the world.

The Roman Catholic Question.

To understand the papal policy on education, one must appreciate the difference between our common schools and those of Rome. It is well to compare them intellectually and morally, in their aims and tendencies, their principles and results; in their influence upon the character and future of the pupils, and their effect upon the respectability, safety, and prosperity of the state. This necessity is forced upon the intelligent Roman Catholic fathers and mothers who know that a papal decree on mixed education has no infallibility, who value American institutions and the rights of their children as American citizens, and who look with parental care to their future welfare.

Let the Jesuits once become to the state, as regards education, an imperium in imperio,—let them, independently of the civil power, determine the character of the studies and the selection and approval of the teachers, taking care, as the Syllabus directs, that the schools shall not be in conformity to the will of the rulers or the prevailing opinion of the age, but shall be joined to the Roman Catholic faith and the power of the Roman Catholic church,—and on the principle that he who controls the education of a country controls its future, they may with reason regard as a Republican control of the schools as the capture of the outworks and bulwarks of the republic, whose guns may be turned against all that shall remain of its political and religious freedom. ....

But the antagonism between the Christian teaching given in our public schools in regard to chastity, truth, and justice, etc., and that authorized by the Pope on these points, is so will presently appear, very striking; and the views of the Roman courts as to the intellectual education which they approve for their subjects are equally opposed to those of the American people for what they demand for their children as the future sovereigns of the republic.

Cardinal Cullen, in his evidence before the Educational Committee, given in their report of 1870, frankly stated his opinion that education should be limited to "the three R's, the reading of the Scriptures, and the history of the church. Too much education would make the poor discontented with their lot, and unfit them for following the plow, using the spade, hammering iron, and building walls."

A view similar to that of Cardinal Cullen was expressed to Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins, of the New York bar, by his excellency, Cardinal Antonelli, who said "that he thought it better that the children should grow up in ignorance than be educated in such a system of schools as the state of Massachusetts supports. That the essential part of education was the catechism; and while arithmetic and geography and other similar studies might be useful, they were not essential." ....

Without referring to similar statistics abroad of reformatories and industrial schools, we find at home census and police returns all telling the same story,—that Roman Catholic schools, as compared with our own, are propaganda, of ignorance, superstition, vagrancy, pauperism, and crime; that they endanger society by recruiting the dangerous classes; that they burden society with a load of taxation, and that they endanger the stability of our institutions by debasing our civilization. We shall presently ask how far these influences are accounted for by the character of their teachings.

Mr. Hawkins has shown from the United States census of 1870 the comparative number of illiterates, paupers, and criminals, to every 10,000 inhabitants, produced respectively by the Roman Catholic parochial schools, the public schools in twenty-one states, and by the public schools in Massachusetts. When they are arranged for more easy comparison, it is easy to appreciate the objections of Alderman Reardon and his friends, of Cambridgeport, to transfer their children from the state schools of Massachusetts to that of Father Scully.

TO EVERY TEN THOUSAND INHABITANTS.

	Illiterates.	Paupers.	Crim.
Catholic schools.....	1,500	400	300
Public schools, 21 states.	300	150	75
In the schools of Mass...	21	19	11

He also showed that in the state of New York the Roman Catholic parochial-school system turned out three and one-half times as many paupers as the public school system. ...

To an American who has not marked the progress of the Roman Catholics in America and their plans as recently developed, the idea of the Jesuits confronting the republic as it enters its second century with an intimation that they are about to control it will seem strange as he recalls the eventful history of that order which has won in turn the detestation of all nations and the condemnation of the Church of Rome. ....

To-day the revived order appears to be at the head of the church of Rome. The dogma of infallibility is pronounced the logical result of its existence. Dr. Manning represents the Jesuits as leading the mission to England to subdue the will of that imperial race.

In America we are told that they have captured our great cities; that by their agents they manipulate the press and secure its silence; that they have revised for the American Encyclopædia the history of their intrigues and persecutions; that they have driven the Bible from the public schools, arranged terms with party leaders, secured grants of lands and moneys, and annual subsidies in the shape of charities; that they have begun to assert the supremacy of the church over the state, and are preparing for greater triumphs. ...

That there is to be a struggle, and a hard one, for the control in our republic between the people constituting the state and the ecclesiastics who represent the Roman church, no rational man who understands the situation can for a moment doubt. In the light of history and reason it seems equally clear, either that the struggle is now to be decided by maintaining against the opposition the supremacy of the state in its right of education intellectual and moral, in its administration of justice, in the safety of elections from priestly control, and in every other legitimate exercise of sovereignty,—or that, if these be yielded through treachery or indifference, the struggle will sooner or later be transferred to the battle field, and decided in the most terrible of conflicts, a religious war.—John Cox, International Review for March, 1880.

The English Liberal Victory.

The unexpected defeat of the Tories in England, the permanent displacement of Lord Beaconsfield, the overwhelming triumph of the Liberals, their accession to power, and especially their accession with such a man as Mr. Gladstone, the "Plumed Knight" of the victory, as the leader of the House of Commons, are all steps in the direction of republicanism and of a larger popular participation in the government.

In this country such an event would have been hailed as a sweeping reform victory, for it was not fought as against Lord Beaconsfield or upon any single issue of bad government, but for change and reform in every detail, both of foreign and domestic policy. It was an uprising of the people in every sense of the word. The battle was fought against the aristocracy, the Established Church, the politicians, the plutocracy, and the official classes, and in the face of these odds there was a gain of nearly half a million of votes over the election of 1874, when the Tories secured control of the Government. Among all the London daily papers there was but one, the Daily News, that supported the Liberal party, and yet of the twenty-two members from that city fourteen were for Mr. Gladstone's cause, and of the voters 233,000 to 204,000. Such a victory as this in the very citadel of Toryism shows that the people were aroused to the determination that personal government should give way to a Government more in accord with political progress, liberal policy, and republican ideas,—and that determination will be all the stronger since the Imperial consideration that followed the retiring Beaconsfield and the Imperial snub that greeted Lord Hartington when summoned to meet her Majesty. That is a line of argument in favor of republicanism that even the wayfaring man, though a fool can understand.

Among the various steps which lead to a more republican method of administering the Government will be a reform in the infamously unjust Land laws, which bear with such crushing weight not only upon the tenantry of Ireland, though they feel its burdens the most, but also upon the tenantry of England and Scotland. It may not amount to an absolute emancipation of the British agricultural serfs from the grinding rule of the land monopolists, who now take everything that is produced and reduce their victims to the point of starvation, but it will at least lighten their burdens, so that they can at least live and will not have to look to this country for their means of support. It may not be able to allow them actual ownership of the land they cultivate, which was filched or confiscated from their ancestors, but it will furnish them with inducements to labor and make improvements upon their farms, without having those improvements charged over to them again in the shape of increased rentals. Land reform will be followed by electoral reforms, and the old condition of things which existed hundreds of years ago, and has come down without change, will be wiped out. Rotten boroughs will no longer appear in Parliament with the voting power of great cities, and the owners of deserted, worn-out estates, with a few hundred squalid people on them, will not be allowed to exert the same influence as large, industrial, growing centres teeming with wealth and population. With the equalization of suffrage will come the reduction of taxation.

With a Government that cannot be otherwise than popular and pervaded by the sentiments of the people will come the end of the personal government that has been exercised by Lord Beaconsfield, and that has originated and enforced policies even without the knowledge of Parliament. Foreign wars, instituted in the interests of his dramatic vainglory and for conquest, will cease.

The oppressed nationalities will hail this election with delight. Suffering Greece may now expect relief from the last vestiges of Turkish misrule, and that enlargement of her boundaries which the Tories first promised and then refused to grant. The Armenian Christians may look for their freedom from Moslem intolerance. The newly-fledged Slavic nationalities can at least expect friendly sympathy and counsel, instead of coldness and indifference. We may now look to see the Treaty of Berlin executed in sympathy with its spirit and letter, a policy either of frank accord or frank defiance of Russia; the pacification of Afghanistan, with some guaranty for its independence; the inauguration of reforms in the administration of India and the relief of its suffering people; a demand upon Turkey that she shall execute every reform forthwith that she has promised over and over again to the Porte upon penalty of the extinction of the last remnant of Turkish rule in Europe. These are the leading features of the Liberal programme; every one of them is in the direction of a more republican form of government and in consonance with the spirit of political progress; and with such a man as Mr. Gladstone at the helm there will be a resolute effort made to execute them. The surest proof of the republican tendency of this great victory is the bitter feeling manifested by Tories everywhere, and especially by the German, Austrian, and Turkish Courts, towards the Liberals, and especially towards Mr. Gladstone, whose sympathies with the Slavic Christians and with oppressed nationalities everywhere are well enough known to them. What Mr. Gladstone's power will be is foreshadowed in an editorial article in the London Times of April 19, which says: "In office or out of it, he will have it in his power to sway to an incalculable extent the destinies of the new Ministry. It will be impossible for them to arrive at any decisions or introduce any measures without taking into account the views he may be likely to adopt."

Editor Restitution:—THE RESTITUTION does all the preaching we have here. I have been here eight years, and there has been but one preacher of the Apostle's faith here since I have been here; he was travelling and stopped a few days with us; so THE RESTITUTION does our preaching. We fight the mystic doctor as best we can with the sword of the Spirit, and never fail to put them to flight. The Bible, with THE RESTITUTION to assist us to study the Sacred Volume, is enough to whip the Platonic philosophers with. I have been reading THE RESTITUTION six months, and am free to say that by the aid it has given me in studying the Bible, I have learned more truth within the six months that I have studied it than in all my study before, and I have been a Bible reader fifteen years. I soon learned that I was drunk on wine; (Rev. xvii.) and THE RESTITUTION assisted me in getting sober, and helped to guide me out of Babylon. Many thanks to the editor and able contributors.

Yours in hope of eternal life when the Life Giver comes.

POSTAGE STAMPS.

The number of different kinds of postage stamps which have been hitherto issued all over the world is estimated, in round numbers, at 6,000. Among them are to be found the effigies of five emperors, eighteen kings, three queens, one grand duke, six princes, one princess, and a great number of presidents, etc. Some of the stamps bear coats of arms and other emblems, as crowns, the papal keys, and tiara, anchors, eagles, lions, horses, stars, serpents, railway trains, horsemen, messengers, etc. The collection preserved in the Museum of the Berlin post offices included, on July 1, 1879, 4,403 specimens of different postage stamps. Of these, 2,462 were from Europe, 441 from Asia, 251 from Africa, 1,143 from America, and 201 from Australia.

The fifteen great American inventions of world-wide adoption are: 1. The cotton gin. 2. The planing machine. 3. The grass mower and reaper. 4. The rotary printing press. 5. Navigation by steam. 6. The hot air engine. 7. The sewing machine. 8. The India rubber industry. 9. The machine manufacture of horseshoes. 10. The sand blast for carving. 11. The gauge lathe. 12. The grain elevator. 13. TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the first "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the translation of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Second Period—Signs of the Fall of Jerusalem.—Having finished our examination of Christ's history of the first period, as given by Mathew, Mark and Luke, extending to the signs of the overthrow of Jerusalem, and covering a space of thirty-five years. One thing is remarkable, in Christ's language, used to express various classes of persons and events not one word is used out of its plain ordinary meaning; very similar to that used by Gabriel to Daniel. He speaks as one familiar with the future, and as desirous by his words to reveal the future to his disciples. Why should he narrate events of the first period in his history by using such literal styles of expressing his thoughts, if he did not desire so to be understood in the entire chain?

Examine the following words:—"Temple," (not a church), "Buildings," "See," "These things," "Jesus," "Stones," "Thrown down," "Sat," "Mount of Olives," "Disciples," (Peter, James, John and Andrew), "Sign," "Coming," "World," (age), "Man," "Deceive," "I am Christ," "Wars," "Nation," "Kingdom," "Famines," "Pestilences," "Earthquakes," "Deliver," "Kill," "Hatred," "Betray," "False prophets," "Iniquity," "End." Let us now examine the narration of the second period. This covers about five years, extending from the beginning of the signs and prodigies till Jerusalem is compassed with armies. (Luke xxi. 20).

"Fearful sights and great signs shall there be from heaven." Luke xxi. 11.

Fearful Sights.—They are said to be from heaven, though the language does not necessarily require that all should be seen in heaven. What fearful sights were there before the destruction of Jerusalem? Josephus, the Jewish historian who lived at this time, records some remarkable sights. He states that a star hung over the city like a sword, and a comet continued a whole year; that the people being at the feast of unleavened bread, at the ninth hour of the night, a great light shone around the altar and temple, and continued an hour; that a cow led to sacrifice brought forth a lamb; that just before sunset chariots and armies were seen all over the country fighting in the clouds, and besieging cities; one night the massy brazen gate at the east side of the temple opened of its own accord; and at another time a voice was heard at midnight from the inner temple, saying, "Let us go hence." One Jesus, thought to be an idiot, or insane, who, for several years before the fall of the city, went about, saying, "Wo to the city, wo to the people, and wo to the temple." Nothing could silence him; at length, the last time of repeating these words, he added, "Wo to myself," and was immediately killed, as it were by accident. These signs were evidently given to draw the people's attention to the fact of an impending calamity, that, giving heed to the warning they might personally escape to some safe position. The sign, intended more particularly for Christians, that would, at that time, be residing in Jerusalem is found in Luke xxi. 20. "And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh." This sign is cautionary, and to be improved by them; for he immediately adds, "Then let them in Judea flee to the mountains and let them which are in the midst of it depart out; and let not them in the countries enter thereinto." Verse 21.

It had thus been predicted, beholding the city he wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! But now they are hid from thine eyes. For the days shall come upon thee when thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round and keep thee in on every side. Luke xix. 42, 43. He then said, When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, of which I spoke, you may know that its desolation is near; when you must flee from the city. These signs, therefore, belong to a period immediately preceding the destruction of the doomed city. These are not signs of his coming, but they mark the vicinity of Jerusalem's overthrow, and point out that event and that only; he says nothing about his return at that time. His disciples were interested in that event, and, consequently, should know when it was near.

Two great events are brought to view in Christ's narration, the fall of Jerusalem and the temple; and the coming of Christ. Both these events are preceded by signs. Why then should these events and their signs be confounded? Let them be as distinct in our mind as in the Savior's.

We have examined Luke's sketch of narration of the signs of the destruction of Jerusalem; it only remains to compare it with those of Matthew and Mark.

Matt. xxiv. 15. "When ye, therefore, shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, whoso readeth let him understand." "Standing where it ought not." Mark xiii. 14.

Christ names but one abomination, that of the Desolator. As these abominations have been fully explained in former numbers, we pass them with the additional idea, that Christ wished the disciples to understand that that abomination was Roman and still in the future, and that he uses the term with a full knowledge of what Pagan and Papal Rome would do in after years to the people of God. The directions to flee from the city are very similar in the three Evangelists. One point should be explained. When Jerusalem was compassed on every side with armies, how could they flee out of the city? History shows how flight was made possible. Cestius Gallus, at the head of a Roman army enters Judea in the summer of A. D. 66. He besieges Jerusalem with an army sufficiently powerful to have taken the city in its divided state. Some strange alarm being created one night, he precipitately withdrew his army from its fortifications around the city. The Jews taking courage sallied forth and defeated the Roman general, slaughtering a large portion of his army. This took place in the summer of A. D. 66.

The Christians of Jerusalem, seeing a war impending, retire to Pella, in the kingdom of Agrippa, beyond Jordan.

Titus marches against Jerusalem to besiege it before the passover, A. D. 70. Comes down to Jerusalem some days previous to the passover.

The factions in the city unite at first against the Romans, but afterwards divide.

The Romans take the first enclosure of Jerusalem; then the second; they make a wall round the city, which is reduced to distress by famine. In this was fulfilled Christ's prediction in Luke xix. 43. For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench (χαρακα-Charaka), ditch, dike, fosse; a fortification, rampart, fence; properly a fortification, or rampart, about thee, and compass thee around, and keep thee in on every side. In June A. D. 70, we close the second period, that containing the signs of the fall of Jerusalem.

No language more literal exists. And the accomplishment is equally literal. The terms "Jerusalem," "Enemies," "Trench" or "Fortification," "Fearful sights," "Great signs," are all literal. No other meaning can here be attached to the words. The evidence of the literal narration and interpretation is accumulating. The first two periods are truly and literally narrated and accomplished. Reason would teach us, that the same laws of language would govern the other periods since they are a continuation of the same discourse.

Third Period—Destruction of Jerusalem.—"And shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation." Luke xix. 44. "The days will come, in the which there shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down." Luke xxi. 6. The records of Matthew and Mark are similar; Matthew and Mark speak of great tribulation, but say nothing about the fall of the city, but only of the temple. Luke, however, is more definite; for he speaks of laying the city even with the ground; he also says, "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh; He calls them the days of "vengeance," "wrath" upon this people; Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles." Luke xxi. 24. These are sufficient to show that Christ saw, and predicted the destruction of the city. How and when was this part of Christ's prediction accomplished? For the full record of its fulfillment read Josephus. On the 17th of July A. D. 70, the "sacrifice and oblation ceased." Dan. ix. 27. The Romans become masters of the court of the Gentiles, and set fire to the galleries. A Roman soldier sets the temple on fire, notwithstanding forbidden by Titus.

Titus demolishes the temple to its very foundation in A. D. 71. He also demolishes the city, reserving the towers of Hippicos, Phazael, and Mariamne. For fifty years after Jerusalem's destruction by Titus, it disappears from the pages of history. Under the Roman emperor Hadrian A. D. 135, Hadrian first destroyed the ruins left by Titus, and passed a plough over the foundations of the temple. He erected a new city, and peopled it by a colony of Roman citizens, A. D. 130. He named the new city Ælia Capitolina. Here we date the close of the third period. In this terrible overthrow, it is said that 1,100,000 Jews perished and 90,000 were sold into slavery. We see that the fulfillment of the events of the third period were equally as literal as the narration.

Fourth Period—From the Fall of Jerusalem to the Signs of the Second Advent.—This period covers many centuries, yet the narration is very concise.

They are called "These days." They were to be called days of great tribulation. "Except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved; but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." Matt. xxiv. 21, 22. Those days are called days of vengeance; distress in the land and wrath upon this people (the Jews). Of the Jews, during that period, it is said, "They shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Luke xxi. 24. During those days there will be three classes of men. The elect-Christians out of all nations; Jews, under the wrath of God, and Gentiles, those of all other nations but the Jews. This is the period of the agencies of the Pagan and Papal abominations—the great period of Jewish trouble, and Christian martyrdom. Christ revealed the events of this period more fully to John in the Isle of Patmos, which will be considered critically when tracing the chains of prophecy in that book of symbols.

This period is noted for its false christs and its false prophets; some we shall notice. During this series of generations, are enumerated about twenty-three false christs; of these Christ says, "Then (during this long period) if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or there; believe it not. For there shall arise false christs, and false prophets, and shew great signs and wonders; insomuch that if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect, I forewarn you. Wherefore if they shall say unto you, Behold he is in the secret chambers; believe it not. Behold he is in the desert; go not forth. For as the lightning (bright shining light) cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall the coming of the Son of man be. Wheresoever the carcass is there will the eagles be gathered together." Matt. xxiv. 23–28.

False Christs.—1. Caziba. Under Hadrian, A. D. 130–6. Placed himself at the head of the Jews, called himself their Messiah. He was received by the Jews as their king to restore their nationality. He called himself Barchocheba, the star foretold by Balaam. He raised an army, coined money in his own name. Hadrian raised an army, defeated him with terrible slaughter. He was killed, with a loss to the Jews, in all of about 550,000 men.

2. Moses Cretensis.—A. D. 434, under the reign of Theodosius the younger. He assumed to be a second Moses, to deliver the inhabitants of Crete. The people under strong delusion, neglected their lands, houses and all other concerns, and followed him. On the day appointed, Moses led them to the top of a rock, men, women and children threw themselves headlong into the sea, without any fear or reluctance, till so great a number were drowned, that the others had their eyes opened; looking for their Moses, he was missing.

3. Son of Moses.—A. D. 520, in the reign of Justin. He entered into a city of Arabia Felix. He oppressed the Christians of that place. He was taken prisoner, and put to death by Elesban, Ethiopian general.

4. Julian.—A. D. 529, Jews and Samaritans rebelled against the emperor Justinian; proclaimed one Julian, their king and Messiah. Justinian sent an army against them, and put their Messiah to death.

5. Mahomet.—A. D. 571. First professed to be a Messiah. Changed to a prophet.

6. Serenus in Spain, A. D. 721.

7. Twelfth century had many false Messiahs.

8. Jew in Persia, A. D. 1138.

9. False Messiah in Spain, A. D. 1157.

10. In A. D. 1167 another arose.

11. Also, in the same year one appeared in Arabia.

12. A Jew on the Euphrates, A. D. 1177.

13, 14. In A. D. 1174 and 1175, others appeared.

15. A. D. 1500, David el David in Persia.

16. In the same century another appeared.

17. Ismael Sophus in Spain, A. D. 1497.

18. A. D. 1500, Rabbi Lemlem German Jew in Austria.

19. In 1609, a Jew of Cologne.

20. In A. D. 1634, Rabbi Solomon Mulcho.

21. In 1645, a false Christ arose in the East Indies.

22. In A. D. 1624, another arose in the Low Countries.

23. In A. D. 1666, Sabat'ai Sevi, of Aleppo. Was the most remarkable of all the false Christs. This period was an age of tribulation and of false Christs.

SELECTIONS.

(Chicago Tribune.)

The Slavic Federation in Turkey.

The London Spectator, a leading organ of the English Liberals, has a semi-authoritative article upon the Liberal policy in the East, which foreshadows some important changes in the political condition of the Balkan Peninsula, or at least intimates that the sympathy of the Gladstone Government will lie in the direction of those changes, which of itself will be a most momentous gain in the estimation of the Slavic victims of Turkish misrule. The Spectator intimates that, unless the Beaconsfield Government has made secret agreements of which the country is not aware, and which cannot be disregarded, the policy of the new government will be to convert the Balkan provinces into a Federation which will be the legitimate heir of Turkey, or rather its successor, as Turkey can leave nothing which any people would be willing to accept as a legacy, so that the Federation will appear in the place in Europe which Turkey now occupies.—a consummation devoutly to be wished.

A most important auxiliary in this change will be the Treaty of Berlin, which has never yet been carried out in any of the demands which it makes upon Turkey. The Spectator points out how the Federation may be accomplished, and its plan substantially indicates what Mr. Gladstone has more than once urged in his speeches and writings, and what Lord Hartington and Lord Granville have also indirectly suggested. Bosnia and Herzegovnia are not annexed to Austria by the treaty, but are only placed in her custody, as a sort of receiver, and can be erected into a principality under an Austrian Archduke. Servia is independent. Montenegro is independent and has obtained the addition to her territory which she has always wanted. Roumania is entirely independent, and Bulgaria substantially so. Eastern Roumelia is freed from Turkish officeholders, and can easily be made into a principality. Macedonia is guaranteed a constitution by the treaty like Crete, and Greece will shortly be erected into a powerful kingdom with the addition of Epirus and Thessaly, hitherto kept from her by the bad faith of the Tory Government and the obstinate procrastination of the Turks. If, therefore, the treaty were carried out according to its spirit and letter, the City of Constantinople and its environs would be all that is left in the Balkan Peninsula of Turkish insolence, perfidy, brutality, and misrule. A Federation like this, allied for offensive and defensive purposes, adopting common military arrangements, and backed by the sympathy of England, would be a formidable power against any nation that should attempt to invade it. It is estimated that in less than five years from the organization of such a Federation it could put and keep in the field the following forces:

Roumania	100,000
Servia	100,000
Bosnia	80,000
Montenegro	12,000
Bulgaria	60,000
Roumelia	30,000
Macedonia	30,000
Greece (with Epirus, Thessaly)	80,000
Total	492,000

The above is a stronger force than that with which Turkey held Russia at bay so long, while in this case the Federation would have the active sympathy of England, which Turkey did not have.

In answer to the very natural comment that might be made by some, that these provinces would be mere outlying States of Russia, the Spectator says:

"So long as they are oppressed by the the rest of the world they naturally look to their one armed friend, fear to displease him, and in the last resort even obey his commands; but, if once made free, why should they be Russian, even in proclivities? Because they are Slav? The Roumanians and the Greeks are no more Slavs than the French: the Serbs are proud to foolishness of their separateness from all the other peoples, and the South Slavs are no more Russian in predilection than the Poles are. People write as if the slavs were of necessity united, and forget that two great branches of the race have contended for 600 years, and that a third has always expressed acute fear of being lost in the vast morass of Russian life. Community of race makes people intelligible to one another, but does not always make them friends; and a Pole and a Russian, or a Serb and a Russian, or a Bulgarian and a Russian, are quite as capable of quarreling as a Virginian and a man from Massachusetts. Do all we English love all Yankees so exceedingly much? It has been one of the oddest circumstances of the controversy now ended, that the men who detest Russia and described her as the most cruel and oppressive of states have always represented her also as a most attractive power, so attractive that Serb, and Roumanian, and Bulgarian will always be her devoted and faithful agents. They will, we verily believe, be among her most unmanageable and refractory neighbors, always ready for any alliance which will release them from attending to St. Petersburg."

The above statement is interesting as presenting the policy of the Liberal Government, and it is a policy which not only will commend itself to all free people, but is one which must sooner or later be realized, whether the English Government lends its countenance and sympathy to it or not. Whatever else the war with Russia may not have done one thing is certain: it was the death-blow to Turkey. She is bankrupt in finances, in material resources, in political possessions. She is beneath contempt as a power among European States. She is shorn of a large part of her area, and, when the treaty is fully carried out, she will be reduced to a capital without a country. Such a skeleton as this, even if it had the disposition to carry out reforms, could not do it. The whole spirit of the treaty aimed at making Turkey a European Power pursuing European methods of rule,—a metamorphosis as impossible as it would be to expect the Afghans, the Tartars, the Chinese, or any other Asiatic caste to Europeanize itself. There is but one alternative left, and that is the foundation of a great Slavic Federation upon the ruins of the Turkish Empire; and if the Gladstone Government can accomplish this, or prepare the way for it, it will leave behind it a noble monument, even if it should fail in every other measure of the reforms it hopes to consummate.

(Our Dumb Animals.)

Extinct Species.

In 1741, the illustrious naturalist, Steller, was wrecked on a small island off the coast of Kamtchatka, since called Behring's Island. There he found in enormous numbers an unwieldly aquatic beast, the rhytina, which he took to be the manatee, which it closely resembled. Peaceful and harmless, browsing on sea-weed, with dull senses, but with strong feelings of attachment for their mates, these beasts seem long to have escaped discovery, in spite of the various expeditions which visited Eastern Siberia after it came into the position of Russia in the latter part of the seventeenth century. This escape was doubtless due to its very restricted range; for it seems not to have inhabited the mainland of Kamtchatka, or America, or the Kurile Islands, or any other part except the remote and desolate spot where it was discovered, and where doubtless for ages it had held, in undisputed sovereignty, its "ancient solitary reign." Unfortunately for it, it was not only equally incapable of flight or of self-defence, but its unwieldly body proved to be excellent eating. The result was, that such was the havoc made by the crews of trading vessels that, in only twenty-seven years from the time of its first discovery, the last survivor was killed and the species entirely extirpated. Another example of rapid extirpation by sailors is that of the gigantic and defenceless ground pigeon of Mauritius (without powers of flight), which was called the dodo, and which, till lately, was only known by some old representations, and a solitary head, two feet, and the more or less imperfect skulls. No specimen of the dodo has been known alive since 1681. The great auk, also now extinct, survived till 1844, and seventy skins, nine skeletons, a variety of bones, and sixty-five eggs of the bird are now carefully preserved in museums. But the most wholesale and regretable destruction of lately-existing animals is that which the natives of New Zealand have effected. Previously to its human colonization that island was inhabited by a number of gigantic birds of various (at least four) species, of which group the little apteryx alone survives.

A Warning Word.

Dr. Horatius Bonar, of Scotland, gives us all timely advice in these words: "Beware of letting go the truth of God; of either denying or disgracing, or depreciating it. 'Hold fast that which thou hast.' The Master is absent; and responsibility in the Master's absence is double responsibility. He trusts us to maintain his truth and to honor his name, till he return. Let his churches be faithful to their trust, honoring him as Prophet, Priest, and King. He may be returning soon. If, on his return, he finds us unfaithful to himself and to his truth, what shall be our recompense? Behold, he cometh! Like a trumpet voice, let that cry go through the Churches; let it echo through earth. His long absence will soon be ended. Let us be ready; let us watch and be ready.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAFLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, MAY 12, 1880.

We have not had the time to consider and answer some of the questions proposed for our investigation by different ones. We hope to have more leisure before long. At present we are unable to do more than attend to the most pressing duties devolving on us.

We have received three numbers of The Trumpet of Israel. This is a new periodical published at No. 3 Crescent Place, Boston, Mass., at $1.75 a year. It advocates the Identity of the British Nation with the lost ten tribes of Israel, the marked distinction between Israel and the Jews, and the return of both these peoples of the Abrahamic stock to their own land in the near future. It is an unique, and, to us, an interesting magazine. We also have received one number of the Champion, a journal of Christian liberty and progress published weekly at 132 Nassau Street, New York, at $2.00 a year. This paper also advocates the identity of the ten tribes with the British Nation, gives the news of the day in a condensed form, and makes the prophecies of the Scripture, and the import of the Great Pyramid, special features.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Jesus Tempted to Mistrust God.

Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, he was afterward ahungered. And when the tempter came to him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread. But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Matt. iv. 1-4.

VERSE FOURTH.

"And he answered and said, It is written," etc.

In the third of this series, it was remarked of the Lord Jesus that "though he had the power, he did not provide for himself 'a table in the wilderness;' at all events, he had not done so up to the moment when he was invited to exercise his productive energy for that end." The considerations that had piously restrained him hitherto, inspired the immediate answer to the tempter's advice:—"It is written"—that is, in the Scriptures, my Father's volume of guidance to his children,—"Man shall not live by bread alone, but" etc. Keep it in mind that the adversary spoke of "bread"—"command that these stones be made bread." Bread, as if it had been whispered, you must have,—it alone alleviates hunger, and rescues one in your circumstances from the grave. The word "bread" was used either because the speaker was so ignorant as to imagine that it was indispensable to the support of human life, or, which is more likely, to fix our Lord's mind on that single article—to prevent him from turning his thoughts into a wider channel—the wide range of possibilities, or adequate means in God's providence, whereby in the absence of the ordinary staff of life existence might be easily upheld. All that was designed to make the subject of attack feel more keenly the extremity of his case, and shut him up to an act of compliance with the cunning demand, compliance too at once, without a moment's reflection, for his personal deliverance, by a putting forth of his latent extraordinary force.

But the tempter was foiled. The composure of Christ enabled him to survey the whole position, like a trained swordsman in a mortal encounter, and to fall back on his ample resources—the promises of support—resources of infinite goodness, placed at the command of every pious soul in its most critical emergencies. "It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone" etc. Reason is not appealed to—only the Word, and a Word given ages before as a guiding rule,—an unfailing assurance—to all when in the path of duty, or in the way of God.

The reference is to the experience of the Israelites while desert wanderers, as given in the rehearsal of their wonderful fortunes by Moses when their pilgrimage, and his own life, were about to close. "And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna (which thou knewest not, neither did your fathers know) that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live." Deut. viii. 3. When they entered on their long and perilous journey, the question naturally arose how is life to be preserved in the wilderness?—how can we have supplies of bread in a region where seed-times and harvests are unknown? You can live, as if the response had been verbally returned, without bread; God has other resources in his hand, and if you will exercise patience you will soon learn how he can provide for all your wants. Now, to meet the emergency, the outcome of his own will—he desired—gave the word or command, that manna should be the substitute, and by it, regularly provided in the exercise of his amazing beneficence, they were sustained whilst their forty years of wearisome pilgrimage continued. He did not send them into the desert to starve, for that would have been the natural result had ordinary bread been the only life-support. No; bread was only one means, and failing it, and it could not but fail, there was manna, and when requisite the extraordinary bounty dropt day by day from the clouds. In commanding them to pass through the inhospitable region, he mercifully, as it were, bound himself to provide for them a table of some kind, and by that compassionate arrangement he glorified his name, as their Guardian and Friend, so that every servant in after ages might understand beyond a doubt, small as a grain of mustard seed or its shadow even, that whatever is requisite will be graciously supplied in some way to those who honor his will, to it in the line of active obedience, or endurance of trial in sickness or in health.

This was the shield of faith whereby the Son of God quenched the fiery dart aimed at his pure and confiding spirit: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Bread, tempter, as if the blessed lips had said, is not essential to my preservation in any condition of my life; I am here by my Father's appointment, and I know his love and faithfulness will not come short. He knows my situation, and I can depend on him as in more agreeable circumstances. I shall not want longer than he sees fit and proper for me to endure the smarting of hunger. He can ordain manna for my support, as in the case of the chosen tribes of old—he can send ravens as to Elijah with food, he can appoint angels to bring me supplies; his resources are unlimited, his promise cannot fail, and I shall not use my power as you suggest, and thereby relinquish confidence in his assurances of support. I am in his charge, and in a way known to his sympathy and compassion, relief will earlier or later be imparted. The how is no concern of mine; I shall not be confounded in the end, for it is written, blessed are all they who put their trust in him."

Few of us who have been accustomed to read and hear expositions of this passage have not been surprised at the frequency with which it seems to be mis-apprehended in its point and drift. Usually the meaning is given after this fashion:—I can live without bread; that is a poor concern at best; my support even now is the spiritually nutritious word or communications of my heavenly Father; all else is too insignificant for a moment's thought. Poor man is almost exclusively engrossed with anxiety as to the bread that perisheth, but though at present I am in need of food, I have meat to eat that the world knows not of, and am abundantly satisfied with it.

There is truth in this, yet it has, in our view, no bearing on the case in hand. As a reply, it misses the mark. It represents the speaker away from common sense into what seems very like a region of dreamy fanaticism, instead of returning a plain and most effective answer to the enemy's suggestion. The Savior required bread—physical nourishment—and nothing spiritual could take its room. What can chapters and verses do for one who is an hungered? He must have substantial, bona fide, provision, and rehearsing the sweetest parts of Scripture as an equivalent for nature's demand will only tantalize the sufferer, and leave him to the action of organic laws, ending in death. Bread and not Bible, in other words, is what the famished require. What would floods of direct divine inspiration do for a man expiring in want? Does God mock men? Never; food for the body, celestial truth for the mind; but they have their own sphere of utility, are never interchangeable, and only ignorance could pretend in any condition that the one might be employed in lieu of the other. In fact, if one could say, I need no dinner I have the Bible, another might rejoin, and I need no Bible, Old or New, for I have dined to my heart's content. But rightly understood the Lord does not intimate that he has a substitute for human food in his Father's precious word, or in anything else. He neither had bread, nor anything in its place; but he tells us what he had would do in these very trying circumstances, viz., wait for bread or something equally appropriate, till his Father above should be pleased to send it, and of course, refrain from acting for his own relief as if the golden promises were smoke. In other words, he may be understood to deliver himself thus:—I am not dependent on bread;—it is my Father's effective word, I rest my safety. To him belongs exhaustless means of relief. He will not forsake me. What deliverance may arrive, I know not; but this I know deliverance will come opportunely in obedience to his command who is master of nature and her laws.—So the tempter failed to persuade him to act as if he had thrown off confidence in his Father's superintending watchfulness. Faith rose in its simple might, and Satan fell. It was true of Jesus, as it is of each holy child of God,—"The just shall live by faith." In the same way he worsted the arch-foe in other temptations, recorded in the succeeding verses, and came off more than conqueror through him that loved him. By understanding the first trial, which we have reverentially endeavored to elucidate, any one may readily understand the other cases, for the same principle of power—power drawn from absolute reliance in what God has commanded God has promised, applies to them all, and to every possible instance in which loyalty to the Supreme Ruler and child-like repose in the good Father's word is subjected to trial.

At the close of the temptation the devil left the exalted sufferer, and "angels came and ministered to him." They appear on the scene by divine command, we may be sure; and their very presence would cheer him in his loneliness and distress. It was heaven manifestly on his side,—a symbolized message in radiant forms of approval from the awful throne. The immortal visitors were delayed till what was deemed the fittest moment in the wisdom of God. To the mind of flesh, they might in kindness have been despatched at an earlier hour, but the tarrying was ordained for the best, evolving the faith of Jesus in that degree that ennobles his character, and opening their lips in songs of adoration to a fallen world. They ministered to the Son of God. What food they brought, we are not informed; food they would certainly bring, and we may hold our curiosity in check. If not bread, why, then it was something else that refreshed his weary frame. It came in answer to his trust, and explanatory of the words he baffled Satan's attempt with—Man shall not live by bread alone, but by any means that Omnipotence may desire.

So in like manner, my brother on the dusty way, we are authorized to trust the sure word, and our divine Father's character. With him all things are possible, and he delivers at no time to faith what he is unable to realize. Backed by Omnipotence is this eternal moral fact—he "cannot lie." Then, like your Elder Brother trust; trust him when friends are near and prosperity smiles; trust him when you are in the wilderness, all in solitude, and the last refuge gone, save his own arms expanded to receive his quivering, perhaps bewildered, child. In want, while living in his service, it is your privilege to count on his aid. Appeal to him;—his ear is open to your cry. He knows what you require—his very character is suspended on your deliverance.

In your trials, and they may be very grevious, yet not to be compared, one may venture to assume, with the tragic loves of Calvary, and the tortures of martyrs and confessors,—in your trials, especially when the basket and the store are empty, imitate, we again with all possible emphasis say—imitate the Lord Jesus, who dealt with his Father alone. Run not to God, and then to man. In appealing to man you are not honoring him in the day of your affliction. Appeal to your Father alone. Trouble not yourself as to how you may be delivered. Can the uncreated intelligence be baffled, like yours? Can the arm from which suns and planets are suspended, fall like thine?

CONCLUSION.

It may be profitable, before laying down the pen, to invite close attention to the circumstance that while man may be sustained in life during its present aspect by different instrumentalities under the divine selection, as necessity dictates to his wisdom, there is but one mode whereby a higher and more lasting existence can be reached and preserved. For our time-life there is bread, and flesh, and fish, and fruits and "manna", and for ought we know a host of other means at his behest to maintain those who in the fulfillment of pious duty must be specially provided for. He may even fall back on mere power, without the intervention of any material agency whatever. Indeed, there are many words, or fiats, at his choice, so that nothing bounds the sweep of his sustaining generosity. But there is only one bread that endureth unto "life eternal." He has determined on but one way of immortalizing men, and to this method he is, after the counsel of his own will, self-limited. As a result, life for man hereafter independent of the now glorified Emmanuel, is absolutely impossible. There is no choice of fate, words,—words fraught with all-conquering might,—in this case. God has left himself none, and it is of vast moment that this peculiarity should be thoroughly understood. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you."

Never was there a more fatal blunder than when it was conceived, and daringly promulgated, that God had willed our race to interminable individual duration, independent of conditions. That leaves choice in the matter out of man's sphere entirely. It make immortality simply fate, which is unalterable. Sad will be their disappointment who depend on such a calculation, when the lake of fire gleams before their sight. Having rejected or disregarded Christ—the Immortalizer, they must perish in the burning flood. Immortality is his gift, or the gift of God to man through his mediation. "God hath given"—made a gift—"to us of eternal life, and this life is in his Son." My friend, the gift is there for you, and now for you there. Seeking unending existence, expecting it, at any other source is simply throwing the last hope away. We know that you are welcome to enjoy it, and urge you to close with the easy terms ere the day's sun goes down.

BELGIUM—TO FRENCH JESUITS.

BRUSSELS, May 7.—A stormy discussion took place in the chamber of representatives to-day on the bill prolonging the law relating to the treatment of foreigners in Belgium. The minister of justice announced that the line of conduct of the government toward French Jesuits, should they come to Belgium, would be precisely the same as that adopted toward members of religious bodies expelled from Germany. If religious confraternities came to Belgium, the law would be enforced against them.

ST. PETERSBURG, May 8.—The beetle, which ravaged the crops in Poltava and Ekaterinoslav in 1878, has been found in large numbers in Larvalstadt, and the peasants fear to sow the spring crop. The greatest alarm prevails in Tiflis in consequence of the discovery of locust eggs. Unless they are exterminated before development, famine through the Caucasus will be inevitable.

AFRICA—BATANGA DESTROYED.

LONDON, May 10.—Batanga, on the Cameroons river, on the west coast of Africa, has been bombarded and burned by the British on account of the capture and ill-treatment of British subjects by the natives.

A despatch from Paris says: "The caravan which went on a preliminary survey for the proposed Sahara Railway has returned to Algeria. They thoroughly explored the country between Ouedrhin and Elcolcah, to the south of which they received passes through the great sand-banks barring the Insalah route. They were quite unmolested."

SENTENTIOUS PARAGRAPHS.

Care for what you say, or what you say will make you care.

Keep aloof from sadness, for sadness is sickness of the soul.

It is not in the bright day, but only in the solemn night, that other worlds are to be seen shining in the long, long distances.

Be graven on my inmost soul,
This word of truth divine:
"They that turn many to the Lord,
Bright as the stars shall shine."

If we could only read the secret history of our enemies, we should find in each man's life sorrow and suffering enough to disarm all hostility.

No man can lift himself above the world unless he takes hold of something higher than the world; he cannot lift himself out of himself unless he grasps something higher than himself.

Every man or woman who has gained wealth, position or fame, has learned, what every young person ought to know on the threshold of life, that there is no royal highway to success other than patient hard work.

Too often we fold our hands in sleep,
In the summer sunshine lying,
While the boy lies there in a tangled heap,
And the vines and flowers are dying;
Then rise, when the winds blow bleak and cold,
To fret o'er the ruin, the rust, and the mold.

Meditate long, meditate humbly on what it is to have a Creator, and comfort will come at last. If broad daylight should never be yours on this side the grave, He will hold your feet in the twilight that they shall not stumble, and at last, with all the more love, and all the more speed as well, He will fold you to his bosom, who is himself the Light Eternal.—F. W. Faber.

A SINGLE STAIN.

Do young persons ever think how little it takes to stain their characters? A drop of ink is a very small thing, yet, dropped into a tumbler of clear water, it blackens the whole. And so the first oath, the first lie, the first wrong act or thought of evil, may seem trivial, but it leaves a stain upon the character. Look out for the first stain.

Fair is the land which faith espies
Blooming beneath unclouded skies,—
Where weary saints in robes of light
Shall rest with infinite delight;
Where death's tyrannic sway is o'er,
And friends will meet to part no more;
Where grief shall in no bosom dwell,
And none shall speak the word, Farewell.

THREE IMPOSSIBILITIES.

To overestimate the greatness of redeeming love; to overestimate the joys which God hath prepared for those who love him; to overestimate the obligation under which we are laid to consecrate our time, our talents, our fortunes, and all that we have and are to the promotion of God's glory and the happiness of our fellowmen. With such a consecration, no man has ever avowed, or ever can say on a dying bed, that if he had his life to live over again he would serve his Master less zealously, and would do less for his country and for his kind.—Dr. Hall.

So live that, when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, which moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon; but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

SELECTIONS.

Algiers and Its Martyr.

ALGIERS, April 5.—You will enjoy a letter from here, as so few Americans come to such a remote spot. It is by steamer forty hours from Marseilles, and in coming out of the harbor of the latter place we passed the romantic and memorable Chateau d' If, situated high up on a rocky promontory; and later in the voyage passed between the islands of Majorca and Minorca. Marseilles is a bustling, active city, with an immense trade, and resembles an American town. We reached Algiers early this morning. I wish you could see the strange sights—the filthy Arabs. At every turn one sees the blank, staring background, ragged and picturesque figures, and Oriental, paved interior courts, such as Gerome's pencil has made so familiar. The town is on high ground, in an immense horseshoe-shaped harbor, with hills behind; and in the distance the Atlas Mountains form a misty background, sloping on the other side miles away, until lost in the deserts of Northern Africa. I spent some time in a mosque to-day, watching swarthy Mohammedans, draped in white, kneeling toward Mecca, and at intervals prostrating themselves before insignia of the Prophet, and touching their foreheads on the ground in abject idolatry. I could not walk on the rugs without taking off my shoes, and therefore stood by the door, on the pavement bordering the mats. The Arab population, for the most part, are porteurs—that is, they have been but here about nine hundred years,—the aborigines being the Kabyles, whose dress differs from the former chiefly in that their legs are bathed in bandages of cloth. The latter are magnificent men—tall, strong, ragged, fierce, and filthy. The women are presumably ugly, although only their eyes are visible. And now I will tell you a story,—the outline I heard before coming here,—and which is indeed true.

GERONIMO, THE ARAB MARTYR.

Many hundred years ago an intelligent Arab boy was taken to England and educated, and became a Christian. In mature manhood he returned to Algiers and sought the conversion of his fellow men in Algeria to the Christian faith, incurring thereby the displeasure of the more powerful followers of Mohammed. It chanced that the Dey of Algiers was building a mosk or dock about the same time, and one day he summoned Geronimo before him, and told him he might choose between renouncing the Christian faith and the alternative of being buried in the concrete rock-work of the mosk. He refused to forego his faith, and the Dey ordered his followers to seize and bind him with ropes, which was done accordingly. Once more he was asked to return to the faith of his ancestors, and refused. "Then let the Christian dog die," said the Dey; and Geronimo was thrown into the mosk, and concrete poured upon him until he was seen no more. Three centuries after, when the French had become the owners of the province, it became necessary to rebuild the mosk, and the work of removing it was begun. A certain antiquary, who owned a book in which the mode of Geronimo's death was described, called attention to the manner of it, and suggested working carefully until the supposed location of the remains of Geronimo were reached, and then pouring liquid plaster into the place, hoping thus to get a cast of the body, should the story prove true as regarded the manner of the martyrdom and the place where the body lay. When the mould had been allowed time to set in the opening, it was broken out carefully, and the exact semblance of a human form, lying horizontally and and bound with cords, was found; and to-day I have seen this mould in the Museum of Algiers, in the original position, face downwards. The body has marks of many contusions caused by falling stones, but is otherwise quite perfect, especially the face, which is characteristically Arabian.

POETRY.

An Exhortation.

JOHN L. WINCH.

Have your lamps all trimmed and burning,
Filled with love and holy yearning,
Waiting for your Lord's returning.

Gird yourselves, and be in waiting,
Nothing from your zeal abating,
Worldly pomp and glory hating.

Be ye patient and forbearing,
In reproaches meekly sharing,
In the right, be brave and daring.

Poor in life and low in station,
Mind it not, for your relation
Is by faith, in God's salvation.

Things are waxing old and hoary,
Soon will down the promised glory,
Burden of the prophet's story.

In the East, the light is breaking,
Palestine to life is waking,
European thrones are shaking.

Soon, ah! soon the heavens rending,
Will reveal the Lord descending,
To a reign of peace unending!

COMMUNICATIONS.

The Mission, Work and Nature of the Holy Ghost.

This subject is one of the greatest importance from the fact that, without the doctrine of the Holy Ghost or "Holy Spirit of promise," divine revelation, the written word of God, the preaching of the gospel, its hearing, or ordinary understanding of the same, would avail us nothing. It would be but a dead, empty letter without it. This is the only great moving, living power of it, and can alone render it "the power of God unto salvation." The whole scheme of human redemption, as grand as it is, would be but as the dry bones of the Valley of Ezekiel's vision save that system and scheme is richly impregnated with the all-vivifying influences of the Holy Ghost. Save "the spirit of life from God" enters into it, energizing and endowing it with vitality and power like the prophets' resurrected army, and the slain witnesses of the Apocalypse standing them upon their feet, placing them in the occupancy of life. We look upon Adam here before the breath of life from God was breathed into him and he became a living soul, as a faithful figure of the whole gospel system while destitute of this living principle. The Holy Ghost diffused through it. You have all the sublime plan in the most beautiful form and exquisite symmetry, perfect in its every part, but what is it unless the spirit of life from God has permeated it and has invested it with quickening energy? Nothing more than the dead though admirable structure and beautiful organism of Adam before he was made alive with the breath of life from him who alone has life in himself. Hence, seeing the importance of the subject and the fact of its being lost sight of, not only by the masses in Christendom, but also by many who claim to be waiting for the coming of Christ. Moved by a sense of duty, we would put forth an effort to revive this doctrine and restore it to its proper place in the estimation of all who are in search to know "what is truth?"

And, now, to be as explicit as possible, we shall contemplate the subject under the general heads: The Mission, Work and Nature of the Holy Ghost. Have not selected any one passage of Scripture—the popular method—as the basis of our remarks, but prefer to take the whole word of God to range through, being more likely to get at the truth of the matter.

1. The mission of the Holy Ghost. This will occupy our attention but a few minutes. Let us see, then, what the divine testimony affirms respecting this point. Before our Lord ascended up on high he promised to send it into the world, and taught that its advent would be readily recognized by the church, not only by external demonstrations and supernatural phenomena, such as miracles, etc., but by internal evidences, witnessing to the heart and soul of believers in a way unperceived by the world. And this is the solution of the apostle's inquiry: "Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us and not unto the world?" "Jesus answered and said unto him, if a man love me, he will keep my words, and my Father will love him, and we will come (i. e., through the medium of the Holy Ghost, as we should understand, ever maintaining the doctrine of the proper and separate personalities of both the Father as superior and self-existent, and the Son as subordinate and first begotten one) and make our abode with him." John xiv. 22, 23. "Nevertheless I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you." John xvi. 7. "But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me." John xv. 20. "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you." John xiv. 26. "Howbeit when the spirit of truth is come," etc. John xvi. 12. "But wait for the promise of the Father," etc. Acts i. 4

These few texts are sufficient to show the fact of its divine mission. Our Lord pledged his word as a consolation to his sorrowing disciples that it should come and make up for every want to them of his absence. It appears that its possession could not precede his departure, as he says, "It is expedient for you that I go away," etc. And this is evident from the fact of what he declared at the feast, or rather what John affirms in his comment on our Lord's saying, "In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried: If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink. He that believeth on me, as the Scriptures hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water. But this spake he of the spirit, which they that believe on him should receive, for the Holy Ghost was not yet given; because Jesus was not yet glorified." John vii. 37-39. Subsequent to his exaltation we find that it comes, and in its first descent "As of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they (the disciples) were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the spirit gave them utterance." Acts ii. 1-4. "Therefore being by the right hand of God, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear." Acts ii. 33. "Repent, and be baptized, every one of you in the name of the Lord Jesus, for the remission of your sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and to your children," etc. Acts ii. 38, 39. Its mission and advent, then, is fully established from the foregoing citations, but we are not to understand that this was its first introduction into the world, as the prophets doubtless were under its influence, as the apostles inform us that "Holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." Men of God in all ages prior to this had been under its special influence and instructions for special purposes in the divine economy of redemption in preaching, prophecying, and in writing according to the will of God, the result of which we have chiefly in the precious volume of divine inspiration—the founding and perpetuation of the church. Its possession was then limited to a few select individuals and not known under the name which it now bears, neither did it assume the forms that it did in the apostolic age, such as a dove or cloven tongues of fire; yet it may have appeared visibly to the ancient fathers in other forms equally as wonderful, for it is not unlikely but that the burning bush, as seen by Moses, the flaming sword cherubim placed at the entrance gate to Eden, and the shining seraphim as seen by Isaiah, and the mysterious and fiery looking wheels and "living creatures" as described by the prophet Ezekiel were all but so many manifestations of this wonderful personage, or rather personages, as we shall see under its proper head.

The Holy Ghost was given in those ages to but a few, and its benefits conferred but upon one nation—the Hebrews. But here it comes in our times as a free gift, by virtue of the one offering of the Lamb of God, and is conferred indiscriminately upon all out of every nation under heaven who comply with the specified conditions of the gospel. As it is said: "And we are his witnesses of these things; and so also is the Holy Ghost, whom God hath given to them that obey him." Acts v. 32; compare Luke xi. 13. "While Peter yet spake, the Holy Ghost fell on all them that heard the word. And they of the circumcision were astonished, as many as came with Peter, because that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost." Acts. x. 44, 45.

This is the sense, then, we are to understand in which it was not given prior to our Lord's ascent into heaven. It was only given then to one people, and but few of them; those being the patriarchs and prophets, and duly authorized leaders of the Jewish people. But now it is like the general announcement of the angel in reference to our Lord at his birth. "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people," both the Jew and Gentile; while its work was confined to but a few miracles, comparatively—the filling out the canon of Scripture which pointed to a work which was destined to be accomplished subsequent to the atonement—a work prefigured by the blood of bulls and goats on Jewish altars slain, and in the washings and various offerings presented under the Aaronic priesthood. We allude to the work of the cleansing of men from their sins and iniquities "by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost," which God is pleased to "shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Savior; that being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life." Titus iii. 4-7. And this is the section which shall now engage our attention for a few moments.

2. The particular work of the Holy Ghost. The work of the Holy Ghost, then, in the wise and beneficent economy of human redemption, we she ' God, is a great one, when we reflect that it is through its instrumentality that the natural deadness of the sinners' heart is removed, awakening him to the appropriate functions of a new and spiritual life. Man never can be created anew in Christ Jesus except he be reached by this life-giving power. There is no other power under heaven instituted of God. Take him in his fallen state out of the first Adam which tendeth to death, and place him in the second Adam which tendeth into life—save this divine power—so that, unless men and women come under its blessed influence and are re-quickened, re-created, transformed and transfigured into the life and image of him who came to give life, he cannot be saved, "for there is no other name or way under heaven whereby men can be saved." Acts iv. 12. For as much as our salvation depends on the life of Jesus Christ, in us planted there by the power of the truth of God through the agency and energizing operations of the Holy Ghost. Its work is diversified and vast, though all tending to one grand focal point, namely: The presentation to Christ at his coming of "a glorious church not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blame." In a word, it is the only agency of a new creation.

The word of God is very explicit on this, but let us turn to the word and get its expressions on this highly important point. "And when he is come, he will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment." John xvi. 8. This, it would seem, then, is his introductory work under the gospel, to convince men of the great truths contained in that gospel. "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things and bring all things to your remembrance," etc. Here he is represented as a great teacher and a quickener of the memory. "The spirit of truth he shall testify of me." Here he acts in the capacity, testifying to the Sonship of Christ, as also in the case of the Apostle Paul. "Save the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city that bonds and afflictions abide me." Witnessing, also, to our adoption into the great family of heaven. "The spirit itself (mark, not the word itself, but the spirit itself,) beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." Rom. viii. 16 Now, John says, "If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater, for this is the witness of God which he hath testified of his son. He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness (where, in some external phenomena, some open miracle, some historic fact in the written word? no but) in himself." 1 John v. 9, 10.

It is an internal testimony. He is an unerring guide and voucher for all that is promised of and by the Lord Jesus, dictating in harmony with the divine will, taking of the precious things of Christ, and both his beauty, glory and excellence, and the things of his which he so freely gives to the church, unfolding spiritual things, revealing future destinies of things, penetrating into some of the deeper mysteries of the gospel which have been hid from generations and for ages. This is obvious from the following: "He will guide you into all truth; for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak; and he will shew you things to come. He shall glorify me; for he shall receive of mine, and shew it unto you." John xvi. 13, 14.

Here is proof positive that the Holy Ghost is not co-equal with God the Father, and the third person in the trinity and direct emanation from God. Here is proof that it is a subordinate power, not only to the Father, but also to the Son. But we will speak more at large on this in its proper place. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard; neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him; but God hath revealed them unto us (how?) by his spirit, for the spirit searcheth (or searcheth us to search) all things; yea, the deep things of God, for what man knoweth the things of man save the spirit of man which is in him?" Even so the things of God knoweth not man but by the spirit of God. This shows the importance of the spirit's work, the necessity of a mutual recognition with the parties negotiating. "Now, we have received not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that we might know (be assured of) the things which are freely given to us of God. Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, (oh, how much wisdom there is of men, men standing high in Christendom, and how many they have to listen to them who settle down on their teachings and are willing to pay them large sums of money per annum for such preaching, while God says the end of such—or "harvest —shall be a heap in the day of grief and of desperate sorrow," or, as it reads in the margin, "removed in the day of inheritance, and there shall be deadly sorrow." Isa. xvii. 9-14,—but we return,) but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual things." John xvi. 13-15; 1 Cor. ii. 9-14.

This last quotation shows explicitly the paramount importance of the spirit's work, and presents him as a grand illuminator and unfolder of the import of the written word. You doubtless have heard of pictorial and illuminated Bibles, and have seen them, but you may never possess one truly so unless the Holy Ghost broods over it, imparting its heavenly glow, irradiating its pages with celestial light when that great light darts down from heaven, like "the angel (light) standing in the sun," Rev. xix. 17, or the angel light shedding its bright radiance on the earth—i. e., the church —illuminating it "with his glory," scattering its burning rays over the sacred pages then you have an illuminated Bible, and not before; one that will be beautifully illustrated and a highly pictorial one, too, for that same angelic illuminator (you will see by and by why we adopt this term) will take of the things of Christ's and of heaven, and which belongs to the Kingdom of God in the name of Jesus, and display them before you. A few passages occurs similar to this: "At that time Jesus answered and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the (worldly) wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes." "And he answered and said unto them, because it is given to you to know the mysteries of the kingdom, but to them (without) it is not given." Matt. xi. 25; xiii. 11. "And he saith unto them, but whom say ye that I am? And Simon Peter answered and said, thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, blessed art thou Simon Bar-jona, for flesh and blood (i. e., through no human means and contrivance have you acquired this important knowledge flesh and blood) hath not revealed this unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven." Matt. xvi. 16, 17. Paul says, "But when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace to reveal his Son in me, (that was a far more greater revelation to the apostle than the one he had on his way to Damascus when he saw the Lord Jesus in open vision "above the brightness of the sun," as he might be still an unchanged man in heart with all that, but when God revealed his Son in him it brought him far nearer to Christ than ever. It was Christ in him, then the hope and only true or well founded hope of glory; he could then say, "Christ liveth in me," "I live by faith on the Son of God who loved me and gave himself for me." He had not such deep and rich experience as this at the time of that vision on his way to Damascus. Let the high importance of this thought answer as an apology for this slight digression,) that I might preach him among the heathen: I conferred not with flesh and blood,"—i. e., he did not consult with any man or body of men as to his duty as to how he should preach, what he should preach, and where he should preach, but straightway went and preached, God being with him. Gal. i. 15, 16.

And the fact of Paul praying in the behalf of the Ephesians to give unto them the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Christ, that the eyes of their understanding might be enlightened, etc., Eph. i. 17, 18, together with many other texts which might be cited, but for want of time and space, which all goes to prove, most conclusively, the actual necessity of a special revelation, in order to properly understand the Scriptures in the sense, especially, of a saving knowledge, and this is through the instrumentality of the Holy Ghost. They show that Christ can appear nothing more than a root out of the dry ground without any fair form or comliness, and that it is only by the revelation of the spirit of God that he appears the one altogether lovely, rendering his name as the most fragrant ointment poured forth.

LETTER DRAWER.

Editor Restitution: I enclose a short article which I wrote last March, after Geo. B. Wendling lectured here. If you see fit to give it a place in our paper all right, if not it is all right. I hope the space may be better filled. I was very much filled at the blundering way in which it appeared, you will see I turned only to the points where he presumed to search Scripture, and I did it hoping some might be led to see the vain philosophy of such as he. We are commanded to sow beside all waters. It is for us to obey, and leave the result with the Great Father who doeth all things well, and he only knoweth the end from the beginning. You will no doubt be pained to hear that our dear Sister Rock has been, and still is very ill. That most fatal of all diseases, consumption, has been preying on her system for the past four years, and this spring she seems more feeble than ever before. She is a little better now, but has been very feeble for the past five weeks. She is resigned to our Father's will, but longs for the coming of the Just One. With me it is hoping against hope. How we long to see her restored, but thanks be to God, the blessed hope of immortality and eternal life, free from all pain, sin, and sorrow is ours. The promise is sure. The prize is worth contending for. The waiting will not be long. Your sister in hope of life,

CARRIE WILLIAMS.

St. Joseph, Mo.

Editor Restitution:—We would not be without the paper, for it is the only preaching we have in this part of the world. We are alone, so far as members are concerned, but we have God's Word with us, which is a great comfort and satisfaction; and the best of all it is the sure foundation of our eternal salvation. We hoped by this time to have had some money to send to help the paper out of its indebtedness, but circumstances have thrown me into such a condition that I cannot send any thing at present, but hope ere long to be able to do something.

Yours in hope of the soon coming kingdom.

Editor Restitution:—Will you please send our paper to this office. We are alone in the faith in this part of the country, and it is a great satisfaction to us to read the paper, as we have no other preacher. We have not heard a gospel sermon since Brother Hatch preached to us in Champaign county. We would like very much to hear some one once more, but as we are not able to send for a preacher, we will have to be content with reading the paper.

Your brother and sister in the faith.

JOSEPH & MATTIE HOLLEY.

DIED.

INNES—At Sacramento Cal., on Wednesday, April 23, 1879, Charlotte A. Innes, of Consumption, aged forty-six years, five months and six days.

Sister Innes was the wife of Bro. Peter Innes, formerly of Aurora, Ill., and had been a believer for over twenty-five years. Her faith in the gospel was strong, steady and unwavering. She honored her profession by a consistent walk in accordance with the truth, and left an example in this respect worthy of imitation. Sister Innes was a woman of noble qualities. Naturally quick of perception, intellectual, with good executive ability. She was a true and devoted wife, a fond mother and an affectionate sister and friend. For a number of years she was a sufferer, and knew that some day she would fall a victim to consumption. It was hoped that her removal with husband and family from Illinois to this state last fall would have delayed the fatal issue, but her disease had progressed too far before the step was taken. Disappointment, too, had a great influence on her mind. The family were expecting to meet a daughter who had lived here for eight years, but on their arrival it was to find she had died only a few days before of typhoid fever. This shock was so sudden and unexpected that sister Innes never fully recovered from it. When nearing the close of her career she was sorely for a release from suffering, and desire to be at rest. The writer spoke to the friends at her funeral on the faith and hope which sustained her in prospect of death. May her bereaved husband and children copy her example so far as she followed Christ.

RESTITUTION FUND.

ANSON, Fulton Co., Ind., Nov. 29, 1879.

Editor Restitution:—With your permission I will make an appeal to the brotherhood for help to support THE RESTITUTION for the year 1880 and to the 15th weekly visits.

Now, dear brethren, I call upon one and all who feel themselves able, to donate to the cause of Christ the small amount of $4.00 between this and the first of January.

Dear brethren, we could do this with a few exceptions, if we just thought so. I am well aware that some brethren have contributed nobly, but I make this appeal in a special manner to those who have heretofore done nothing as a free-will offering.

Dear brother, do not say, I am too poor! Perhaps you are doing that noxious weed, tobacco, in some form. Consider for one moment how we who claim to be the chosen of God are sorely stricken that we cannot support a weekly paper.

We do hope that everyone will respond to this appeal. Please let us hear from all those who can not or will not pay the $3.00, and will they please give us their excuse. I am also a poor man. My name is Abraham Fontious. I am 39 years old and have a large family to support. I have a small farm of 40 acres. I farm and work at the carpenter's trade to support my family. I use neither tobacco nor intoxicating drinks.

And, dear Editor, I will enclose $1.00 to commence on. I read THE RESTITUTION, and the Bible, and I hope to meet you all in that coming kingdom. So, farewell.

HYMNS OF THE ADVENT

Is the name of a new Hymn Book, just out, compiled by Chas. C. Barker—compiler of the "Hymns of the Morning"—and published by W. M. Pitts, Springfield, Mass.

Mr. Barker combines in this new work the "Hymns of the Morning" and a fresh and rare selection of music. As an appendix he adds a selection of "Favorite Hymns" (words only) whose music is familiar as a household word. Those of our brethren who have been asking for "Hymns of the Morning" for some time, can now be supplied with this new book, which is superior to the old one in that it embraces all of it and many new and beautiful songs. Those having the "Christian Psalmodist" and no music book will find this exactly what they want.

POETRY.

The Meek Shall Inherit the Earth.

W. J. CROCKETT.

Mercy is infinite, and man is weak;
The future shall obliterate the past
And heaven, no doubt, shall be their home at last.
—Cowper.

"Mercy is infinite and man is weak;
The future shall obliterate the past,"
That glorious future we're called upon to seek,
Yet heaven shall never be our home at last.

For faith, hope, and love, we shall obtain
The undimmed lustre of eternal worth;
When He returns who once for us was slain,
Who purchased for us mansions on the earth.

Our faith is based upon His gracious Word,
Our hope is that He'll soon return;
Such faith and hope the greatest joy afford
To all who for perfection deeply yearn.

Our love for Him forbids us to deceive
Mankind by holding forth as truth—a lie;
He in His Word has asked us to believe
The earth our home, and not "beyond the sky."

SELECTIONS.

(The Christadelphian, Jan. 1, 1880)

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

"The Regeneration of Palestine"—Mr. Gladstone and the Anglo-Turkish Convention—Turkey's Continued Decline—The Jews and Their Affairs.

THE ANGLO-TURKISH CONVENTION AND MR. GLADSTONE.

The former article, from the Jewish Chronicle, foreshadows that one particular result of the Anglo-Turkish Convention, the anticipation of which imparted to that convention the interest felt in it by those who are looking and longing for the return of God's favor to Israel. Once fairly begun, it will matter little, as regards the working out of it, which party gets into power in England. The Liberals, alike with the Tories, will accept the situation as they find it, and make the best of it. Mr. Gladstone referred to it in one of the numerous speeches he delivered during his week's tour in Scotland. He said in St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, December 5th, 1879, speaking of what he called "this interference in Asia Minor," "all I can say is that, right or wrong, I shall be glad if any good results are produced, whatever I may think of the means." Referring to the history of the Convention, he said: "We were told one fine day that we had become responsible for the good government of the whole of Turkey in Asia. Look at your maps, gentlemen, and see what the vast country is—seeing, I am afraid, with all of the consequences of bad government there. We—whose own affairs properly belonging to us are beyond our powers to deal with, and so are constantly running into arrear—by the action of the government, have in the dark been involved with enormous powers; we have to be responsible for the good government of Turkey in Asia. You are sometimes told it is Asia Minor, It is all Syria, all Palestine, Assyria, Arabia—the whole of these vast countries which are placed under our responsibility; and if, gentlemen, any functionary of the Turkish Empire misconducts himself in any manner, it is now your affair." [Cheers].

How very satisfactory to the brethren looking for the Lord must be this exhibition of facts, after so long an anticipation of England's installation in this position.

The drying of the river Euphrates has resulted in this preliminary preparation of "the way." On this point, Mr. Gladstone also said:

"I wish to avail myself of this occasion for the purpose of clearly putting and clearly answering one question of importance—'Who is it that ought to possess, who is it that ought to sway, those rich and fertile countries which are known as comprising what are called the Balkan provinces?' It seems to be agreed that the time has come, that the hour is about to strike, if it had not struck already, when the real sway of Turkish power over those fair provinces must cease [hear, hear, and cheers]—if it were only by reason of incompetence. [Applause.] Who, then, is to have the succession of Turkey? From the bottom of my heart, and with the fullest conviction of my understanding, I will give you the reply, a reply which I am perfectly certain will awaken a free and generous and unanimous echo in your bosoms. That succession is not to pass in Russia. It is not to pass in Austria. It is not to pass in England under whatever name of Anglo-Turkish Convention—['hear, hear,' hisses, and cheers]—or anything else. It is to pass to the people of those countries; to those who have inhabited them for many long centuries; to those who had reared them to a state of civilization when the great calamity of Ottoman conquest spread like a wild wave over that portion of the earth, and buried that civilization in its overwhelming force. These people, gentlemen, are already beginning to enjoy the commencement of liberty. Four or five millions of Roumanians, who were nominally subject to Turkey, are now independent; two millions of Servians who were once political slaves are now absolutely free, three hundred thousand heroes such as Christendom cannot match, the men of Montenegro—[cheers]—who for 400 years have held the sword in hand, and never have submitted to the insolence of despotic power, these men have not only their freedom but the acknowledgment of their freedom, and take their place among the states of Europe. Bulgaria has reached virtual independence. The end of it all is, gentlemen, thus far, that not less than eight or ten millions of people have in one form or another been brought by degrees out of political servitude, and have been made virtually free. Gentlemen, I appeal to you to join me in the expression of the hope that under the yoke of no power whatever will those free provinces be brought. It is not Russia alone whose movements ought to be watched with vigilance. There are other schemes abroad. There is too much reason to expect that some portion of the statesmen of Austria will endeavor to extend her rule and fulfill the fatal prophecies that have been uttered, and cause a great change in the Balkan Peninsula to be only the substitution of one kind of supremacy for another. Let us place the sympathies of this audience on the side of order. [Cheers.] Rely upon it, the people who inhabit these provinces have no desire to trouble their neighbors—no desire to vex you or me. Their desire is peacefully to pass their human existence in the discharge of their duties to God and man, in the care of their families, in the enjoyment of tranquility and freedom, in making happiness prevail in that portion of the face of the earth which was before the abode of misery and shame. But I say, gentlemen, that this is a fair picture, and one which should not be spoiled by the hand of man. I demand of the authorities of this country, I demand it of our government—and I believe you will re-echo the demand—[cheers]—that to no Russian scheme, that to no Austrian scheme, that to no English scheme—[cheers]—that to no scheme shall they lend a moment's countenance, but shall, with a kindly care, cherish and foster the blessed institutions of freedom that are beginning to prevail, nay, that are already at work in those emancipated provinces."

These remarks are interesting as showing that in the event of Mr. Gladstone coming into power at the next election—[his has come into power.—ED.]—(though it cannot be said to be by any means certain that the Tories will not come back), the downfall of Turkish power would be accepted, and the various provinces of the effete power settled on the principle of nationalities, and therefore Palestine for the Jews. If Beaconsfield come back to office, he will probably pursue his designs with less disguise than ever. In either case, God's purpose will be accomplished, and by the particular means employed, even if not obviously so. It often happens that things have to go back to get forward. Novices as we are in God's great ways, we are apt to imagine this mode of progress to be retrogression.

TURKEY GOING DOWN—ISRAEL COMING UP.

The London correspondent of the Liverpool Daily Post says: "The Porte's latest scheme for securing more money has come to a standstill. The Galata bankers insist that before the agreement is signed the new financial arrangements shall be communicated to the Powers. The incident is a curious illustration of the confusion and instability of Turkish affairs, and of the rapidity with which Turkey is sinking down into a dependent position. Her interests have become European property, and bankers refuse even to lend her a sum of money until the agreement on which the advance is made, has been approved by the Powers."

It is also stated that the purveyors of provisions for the Sultan's palace have refused to continue their supplies, on account of not getting their accounts paid.

Turkey going down, Israel coming up; this is in accordance with the character of the times, as divinely revealed. There are a variety of symptoms on the latter point as well as on the former. The Free Church of Scotland, which has a special commission to look after its mission work among the Jews, has in its monthly publication an article on the return of the Jews to Palestine. It says:

"The land of their promised inheritance is rapidly becoming their own in fee. If we compare the present with eighty-three years ago, when the Sublime Porte permitted only three hundred to live within the walls of the Holy City, the change is remarkable. Forty years since, the Porte modified this original order so that a large number could abide there; but they were shut up in narrow and filthy quarters, next to the dog and leper quarters, the objects of contempt and cruel oppressions. But even this quarter restriction was removed ten years ago. And now the ruling power is in the hand of Great Britain, the sceptre itself is in the hand of an Israelite, and Baron Rothschild holds a mortgage on Palestine as security for 200,000,000 francs loaned to the Sultan of Turkey. It looks very much as if accomplished fact had put itself in the place of prophecy. The Jews, after quarter restrictions were removed, bought all the land which could be obtained within the gates, and have built entire streets of houses within the gates. With the improvements inevitable from liberty and possession of home, have come hundred progressions in provisions of charity for the destitute and afflicted. The German Jews have sixteen of these. Two journals have been started, and in the Rothschild and other Jewish hospitals, 6,000 patients are under constant treatment. The Venetian Jews have given 60,000 francs to found a school of agriculture; and in evidence of a progress that shows divine care and intervention, the number of Jews has doubled in about ten years. In 1859 there were not more than seven thousand Jews shut up in their quarters; and though a vast improvement on the past, still they appear to us wretched enough to make the most careless sigh over the mighty fallen. But in the five succeeding years they increased to more than 13,000."

The Jewish Chronicle having spoken of this as "a jumble of facts and fiction," a correspondent wrote to ask which were the facts and which the fiction. The editor replied: "The facts are those which refer to the recent increase in the Jewish population of Jerusalem; the fiction such statements as that "Baron Rothschild holds a mortgage on Palestine as security for 200,000,000 francs loaned to Turkey." It will be seen that this does not make much difference to the paragraph. It leaves its main features intact as undoubted facts. These are spoken to from a variety of sources. In the Aberdeen Free Press are the following remarks:

"Emigration to Palestine for purposes of agricultural settlement must be regarded as at any rate not less hopeful than the agrarian improvement of Cyprus—the notable 'place of arms.' And we find the scheme advocated in all seriousness by Rev. James Neil, B. A., formerly incumbent of an English church in Jerusalem. Mr. Neil submits various considerations in favor of his proposal. Palestine was at one time so fertile as to be styled 'a land flowing with milk and honey;' and it still retains its great natural capabilities. The heavier lands in some parts yield literally a hundredfold, and under irrigation four crops a year can be produced. The olive, the vine, the fig, and other fruit trees yield abundantly; while in the best situation the orange, lemon, citron, and other valuable fruits not so much associated with the country can be productively grown. The labor is exceedingly cheap; men for ordinary agricultural work being paid with 5s. or 6s. a week, and women with half that amount. The land yields without other manure than such as is produced by the animals kept, or by burning down stubbles. And while horses, mules, oxen, and camels can be bought cheap, they are also cheaply maintained. The fine climate and settled character of the seasons make it unnecessary to have farm buildings of other than the slightest description; even stacking of the crop is not necessary, as it may safely be exposed in a heap for several months to be thrashed at leisure. Such is the picture given. Palestine, we are further reminded, is within twelve days' steam voyage of England. Mr. Neil believes that an European immigration on a large scale would be a valuable means of regenerating the country. There are already small German settlements at Jaffa, Mount Carmel, and Jerusalem, which are successful as far as they go, but they are limited as to capital, and give attention to handicraft trades rather than to agriculture. We do not know that many intending emigrants will be tempted to think of Palestine; and yet it is difficult to say why they should not. To be sure, the 'unspeakable Turk' is there; but his dominance is by means so great nor so potential for oppression and mischief as elsewhere."

We read that a fortnight ago, there died at Amersfoort (Holland) Hesr M. Abrahamson, who after leaving some handsome legacies to several Jewish charities in Amsterdam and the Hague, bequeathed the bulk of his fortune, amounting to several hundred thousand guilders, to the Palestine Committee in Amsterdam, for the benefit of the charitable institutions in Jerusalem and other cities in the Holy Land. Only a few months ago the same gentleman sent the sum of 80,000 guilders to Jerusalem for the erection of a Jewish hospital in that city.

(St. Joseph (Mo.) Evening News.)

HON. GEORGE WENDLING CRITICISED.

Heathen Philosophy as Presented in the Drapery of Modern Christianity.

Having heard the lecturer (George R. Wendling) of National fame on the evening of March 15; for the sake of truth, I beg to notice a few ideas as presented by the great orator.

As all will remember, his discourse was founded on the solemn query, "If a man die shall he live again?" Job xiv. 14.

Here he left the question, and it remains to-day as unanswered before that audience, as it was before his lofty flight of fancy hushed the waiting audience into silence.

With glowing eloquence he portrayed man as a dual being and gracefully laying his hand on his breast told his hearers "this is not me, it is only the machinery which I propel." His was not the language of Job, from whom he chose his subject, for he says to the same verse from which he quoted, "All the days of my appointed time will I wait till thy change come. Thou shalt call and I will answer thee." In xvii. 13 Job says: "If I wait, the grave is my house," and in xix. 25 he says: "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God. Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold and not another."

This was the firm unwavering faith of the patriarch of the land of Uz. He fully believed that he would live again, for he says, he himself shall behold his Redeemer. If he did not die he could not possibly live again. To live again, a thing, or being, must have lived once and died, and then be resultated or it cannot be said to live again. This is an axiom so plain that it needs no argument. Job in speaking of himself speaks of an unit. The person who spoke was the very same individual who would wait in the grave as his house. It was the man Job who would answer the Almighty when he called. Now, if as the philosopher said, he was in the immediate presence of God, why should he call him? Why did he not tell us that his immortal soul would go to God, and his body to the grave? Simply because he knew that he was a mortal man, and could enjoy a future life only by being raised from the dead. All Bible students know that this doctrine is plainly taught in the Sacred Word.

We will not presume to follow the gifted orator through all his lofty flights of fancy and his meanderings after divers authors and their unfounded opinions, because being uninspired they have no weight. We leave them all in the Platonic school of philosophy and vague speculation, and pass on to notice only his deductions from Revelation, as from this source he drew the subject of his discourse. In this volume alone is found the solution of the weighty problem, which he in vain tried to solve, "There is a spiritual body." He quoted this clause, cut loose from its entire connection, and repeated it over and over, applying it to our present condition. Now I earnestly request any and every one who may read these few thoughts to turn to 1 Cor. xv. 35, and read carefully to the 55th verse inclusive, and you cannot fail to see the utter absurdity of Geo. R. W.'s position, viz: that we at the same time possess a spiritual body and a natural body.

Paul, in his letter to the Corinthians is showing them the glorious truths of resurrection, and he illustrates them by a grain of wheat. In verse 36 he says: "Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die." (It must die before it can live again,) showing that the grain cannot possess the old seed which was sown and the new germ at the same time. Nature is consecutive in all her works. Again in verse 42 he says: "So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption. It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body. And so it is written, "The first man, Adam, was made a living soul, (it does not say an immortal soul) the last Adam was made a quickening spirit." How be it that was not first but which is spiritual, but that which is natural and afterwards that which is spiritual?

From a careful perusal of the foregoing passage of Scripture, it will be readily seen that the orator of the evening wrested the portion of Scripture suited to his theory from its legitimate connection, and vaguely misconstrued its true import to serve the purpose of the hour. Better not take Scripture at all than try to make it a stepping-stone to vain philosophy and heathen dogmas. As well might we say the balmy airs and gorgeous hues of summer now regale our senses; as well might we say the heir is now in possession of the inheritance willed to him on, or at the death of the testator, which is only his prospectively, as to say, we now are in possession of a spiritual body.

That was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural. The one succeeding the other. They are never mentioned as existing at the same time. Faith in Christ and obedience to his Gospel, are the necessary conditions whereby a spiritual body may be obtained by a resurrection from among the dead.

Very true there is a difference between mind and matter; but that fact does not prove that mind is immortal. That which is immortal cannot die, and yet the Almighty Himself declares "the soul that sinneth it shall die." Ezek. xviii. 4 20. Webster defines death, "extinction of life." Again, we are told in Psa. cxlvi. 4: "His breath goeth forth; he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish." If the Word of inspiration assures us that the soul that sinneth shall die, and that the thoughts perish, who will dare to say that immortality is subject to death? "Shall mortal man be more just than God?" Job iv. 17.

Why try to meet infidelity with sophistry, while the professed standard bearers of the cross sit by in silence?

What is truth?

CARRIE WILLIAMS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Editor Resilitation:—I doubt not but yourself and others will join me in the heartfelt groaning of the intercessory Spirit in Christ for the manifestation of the sons of God. Oh, how long? When it shall please God to bring about the auspicious hour may we all be found of Him in peace, without spot and blameless.

At present we are in medias res—in the midst of affairs,—culminating slowly, but surely to the grand catastrophe which shall wreck the kingdoms of the world and transfer them to the Son of Man and the saints. Even so come Lord Jesus. But while we are thus desirous we must not forget our duty in waiting patiently, and while waiting patiently we must not lose our zeal for the Divine manifestation. The time will come, though it be long. Our duty is to wait. In order to its discharge we should see what sign we are under and have a clear view of approaching events. The waning of the crescent is signal, but not a full orbed sign for the reason that its continuance is dependent upon foreign alliances.

Mortgages and promises, beside the Jesuitical working of the great powers avail themselves of every advantage. It will therefore pass through the full measure of its chronological cycle.

England is the next sign. She is working for herself, though unwittingly preparing the way for the restoration of Judah. This she will do when the time comes. Not only the pressure of circumstances but the potent energy of the prophecy will prompt her to engage in the work; because she will see it in the light of a military necessity to fortify Jerusalem and to build up Judea. In connection with England comes France; and after her Russia. These four horns of the Gentiles are to be swept away from the land of Israel like thistle—down before the wind when the time comes for the Lord to make good his promise and to remember the land.

Jerusalem and Judea are the objects of interest at the present. Judah can not be restored before '63 and the sanctuary cannot be cleansed until after the battle of Armageddon.

Thus you see we have an extensive work before us, which will require time to perform it.

We should not let our desire for the revelation of the future so ride our minds as to put us in a fluster to the neglect of present opportunities of usefulness. If we are called to the kingdom and glory of Christ Jesus we have a talent to improve and it certainly will be a full reward, to all our toil, and a happiness unequaled—to have the ringing voice of the Master sounding in our ears, Well done!

There is to be a great deal of fighting before the Master comes.

The four powers mentioned will lead the way when they get ready. At present things will be managed diplomatically. But when the prophecy is to be fulfilled then there will be storms of war unequaled in the annals of time. Grace, mercy and peace to you and yours.

BREVITIES.

The old family Bible that belonged to "Mary, mother of Washington," is still kept in a branch of the Washington family in Virginia. It contains the family register, recording the birth of George Washington, February 22, 1732. The binding has a cover of cloth woven by his mother.

The attention of the Russian Government is considerably occupied with the theological seminaries of that country, which seem to be hot-beds of Nihilism. The clergy forms in Russia a distinct class, and the theological students, who are clergymen's sons, are kept in strict confinement within the seminary walls, where they lead a most unhappy life. Without this restraint it would be impossible, it is said, to recruit the ranks of the clergy. When they leave college their hearts are full of hatred for a Government which has treated them so harshly; they readily listen to revolutionary suggestions, from whatever quarter they may come, and upon returning to their native villages become apostles of Nihilism. It is hardly expected, however, that the Government will endeavor to check the evil otherwise than by violent means—a course which will inevitably make matters worse.

Among the stories which are told at St Petersburg of the attempts made by the Nihilists to penetrate into the Winter Palace is the following: Gen. Gourko, when Governor of St. Petersburg, had the right of entering at any time into the Emperor's room without being announced. Once, however, the doorkeeper, seeing something unusual about his appearance, stopped him, saying that it would be necessary to inform the Emperor of his arrival. The General objected at first, but, finding that the doorkeeper only grew more suspicious, ultimately agreed to his being announced. The doorkeeper then told the Emperor of his doubts; upon which the latter went to a writing table in his room, which was connected by telegraph with Gen. Gourko's residence, and telegraphed, "Where is Gourko?" "At home," was the reply. This, of course, settled the point; the false Gourko was at once arrested, and turned out to be a member of the Revolutionary Committee.

THE CHILD AND THE MOCKING-BIRD.

A little child in Jacksonville, Fla., was in the habit of playing upon the piazza of her father's house. Near by a mocking-bird had its nest in the orange trees, and the child would throw crumbs to the bird daily. After a while the child was taken sick and died. While the child's body was lying in the coffin the bird was seen to perch upon the slat of the window-blind, pour forth one of its most brilliant songs, and then flit away. Some hours after this the body of the little bird was found dead upon the floor of the piazza, and was placed upon the coffin of its little friend and was interred with it in the same grave.

THE NORTHAMPTON ELECTION.

The vicar of Northampton, the Rev. B. B. Hull, was announced to attend the annual meeting of the Northamptonshire Band of Hope Union held on Thursday night. The reverend gentleman did not attend, and in a letter explaining his absence, said: "I am reminded by a note which I have received that I had promised to take part in the Band of Hope Union meeting. I am very sorry not to fulfill an engagement, but I feel now that I cannot possibly attend the meeting. I have always desired to co-operate heartily with Nonconformists in every possible way, and have hitherto found no difficulty in doing so. But the case is now entirely altered. Now that the Nonconformists of this town have declared that they put politics before religion in choosing such a man as Mr. Bradlaugh as their representative, I feel it impossible to join them any longer. To ally myself with those who have returned Mr. Bradlaugh would, in my eyes, be to make myself a partaker in the insult they have thereby offered to Almighty God. I write this in no spirit of bitterness, but in all sorrow that our common Christianity should have been so disgraced, and that Nonconformity should have come down from the high religious position it once occupied and have identified itself with atheism, and worse than atheism."

The world may remember very little about us a year after we are gone. No thought, no deed may be connected with our names beyond some narrow circle of loving hearts. There may be no place for us in any record written with a man's pen. But what does that matter if our names, dear friends, are written in the Lamb's Book of Life, with this for sole epitaph—"A disciple?" That single phrase is the noblest summary of a life. A thinker? a hero? a great man? a millionire? No, "A disciple." That says all. May it be your epitaph and mine!

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the Seal "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

J. P. WEETHEE.

1. Christ's Narration Continued.—We have now followed Christ's narration through four periods, and find no terms used in the history except such as have a plain and literal construction. Such as historians have used in tracing the same chain of events. These four periods follow Christ's prophetic history through seventeen and one-half centuries. The fifth period does not extend through more than one century.

Fifth Period—The Signs of Christ's Coming.—Are they literal? On the proper understanding of this question rest the theological views relative to the return of the Messiah.

1. Reasons for the Literal Interpretation.—1. Christ's literal coming must have been in the minds of his four disciples when they asked the questions, "When shall these things be? and what the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the age?" Jesus, the Mount of Olives, the disciples, temple, the stones were all literal—real persons and things—no vision; Christ begins a plain, historic narration.

2. The events of the first four periods did literally transpire, demonstrating the literality of the narration; and clearly establishing the fact that a literal meaning was intended.

3. Periods being, in plain language, given, and fulfilled in the same literal manner; no reason can be given why the historic narration of the events should not mean to be understood and explained in the same way.

4. The signs that preceded the overthrow of Jerusalem were literal—really what they were called,—"fearful sights," "great signs," "Jerusalem compassed with armies." All these things did really occur. Why, then, in the fifth period, depart from the literal narration? Why make it figurative?

5. No attribute is ascribed to any object, that does not belong to it, as of the sun, moon and stars, so of all the other objects.

6. We are not forced from the literal construction, and we are bound, therefore, by the rules of construction, to give this part of the narration its literal interpretation.

2. Classes of Signs.—Physical signs; —a. In the heavens above. b. On the earth beneath. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken." Matt. xxiv. 29. Four terms demand special notice—sun, moon, stars, heaven, powers. Sun, moon and stars are in heaven. The powers are of the heavens.

With Matthew's account let us compare the parallel records of Mark and Luke: "But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars of heaven shall fall, and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken." Mark xiii. 24, 25. "And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth, distress of nations with perplexity, the sea and the waves roaring, men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken." Luke xxi. 25, 26. Peter quotes Joel: "And I will shew wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath, blood, and fire, and vapors of smoke; the sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come." Acts ii. 19, 20. Here is the battle ground between Spiritualism and Literalism. How did Christ intend to be understood when using the words recorded by the three evangelists?

"Tribulation."—St. Matthew says: "Εὐθέως δὲ μετὰ τὴν θλῖψιν τῶν ἡμερῶν ἐκείνων" —"By and by." Luke xvii. 7. "Shortly." Luke xxi. 9. It means very soon. Mark uses these words: "Ἀλλ' ἐν ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις, μετὰ τὴν θλῖψιν ἐκείνην"—But in those days, after that tribulation. Luke omits the expression. After stating that the tribulation would continue during the times of the Gentiles, he says, "And there shall be signs in the sun." " "

Matthew and Mark use the word "tribulation." Luke gives its meaning in these words: "For there shall be great distress, in the land, and wrath upon this people. And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Luke xxi. 23, 24. What, then, did Christ mean by this tribulation? One school of expositors limits it to the fall of Jerusalem under Titus. In this error originates the false interpretation of the signs, and also the dangerous mistake relative to the return of the Savior.

What were six months suffering compared with eighteen centuries? And what were the sufferings of Christ's followers before and in the destruction of Jerusalem, in comparison with their tribulations under Pagan and Papal Rome? That tribulation has, therefore, a much wider range. It includes the sufferings of Jews and Christians through the Pagan and Papal persecutions. With this construction the signs belong to Christ's second, personal return. With these introductory statements let us examine the signs themselves.

The physical signs are in the heavens above, and in the earth beneath—signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth, distress of nations with perplexity, the sea and the waves roaring. Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth, for the powers of heaven shall be shaken." Did Christ here mean what he said? Did he mean the literal sun, moon, and stars, or had he some other meaning? Here is the issue. If he meant what he said his words need no further explanation; they explain themselves; if he had some other meaning he would have stated it to his disciples. The fact that he did not give any other meaning, and that they did not ask him how they should understand his language, is clear proof that the Savior had no other meaning.

We are told that sun, moon, stars, heaven, sea and earth have, sometimes, another meaning—a figurative meaning. Sometimes a symbolic meaning. There is a natural world, and there is a moral world—a political world—a religious world. Suppose this be granted; is that evidence in itself that Christ so used them in his literal narration—exceedingly literal up to the signs? It does not by any means follow.

Let us examine certain passages understood by many expositors to be figurative. "Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate; and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it. For the stars of heaven, and the constellations thereof, shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine." Isa. xiii. 9, 10. "And they shall be gathered together (as) prisoners are gathered in the pit, and shall be shut up in the prison, and after many days shall they be visited. Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients, gloriously." Isa. xxiv. 22, 23. "And when I shall put thee out, I will cover the heaven, and make the stars thereof dark; I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give her light. And all the bright lights of heaven will I make dark over thee, and set darkness upon thy land saith the Lord." Ezek. xxxii. 7, 8. "And I will shew wonders in the earth, blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke, the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood before the great and terrible day of the Lord come." Joel ii. 30, 31. Peter quotes this from Joel as applicable to the Christian dispensation,—the advent of the spirit marking its beginning, and the other signs its close? Let Isaiah and Ezekiel be compared.

We shall quote one other passage, as we desire to present the figurative view as distinctly as the subject will allow. "All the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll; and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling (fig) from the fig tree." Isa. xxxiv. 4. The view is clearly stated by Sir Isaac Newton: "The figurative language of the prophets is taken from the analogy between the world natural, and an empire or kingdom considered as a world politic. Accordingly the whole world natural, consisting of heaven and earth, signifies the whole world politic, consisting of thrones and people." On this principle, the dissolution of the host of heaven must mean, the overthrow of thrones and governments; and the falling of stars, the subjection of kings and rulers. The rolling together of the firmament as a scroll of parchment, must therefore, imply the removal of the existing powers, political or ecclesiastical, as a finished scroll.

In order fully to understand the language of the prophets we must consider their surroundings, and consider the circumstances under which Christ's narrative was delivered. Isaiah's language is poetic, and abounds, like all poetry, in highly figurative language. Still, there are expressions in the passages already quoted that belong to the future rather than to the past. It is found in Isa. xiii. 1. Vision of Babylon. He saw those in a vision; for, even the fall of Babylon was, at that time, nearly two hundred years in the future, consequently the language is symbolized. In the mind of the spirit, the entire duration of Babylon—literal and mystic—was present. Why, then, should he present to the prophet simply its literal history and overthrow? Why not allow Isaiah and Ezekiel views as far into the future as those exhibited to John in the isle of Patmos? Verse 19 would apply to what John saw, and it would apply to the mystic as well as the literal—as the great oppressor of the typical and the antitypical people of God.

Whatever be the extent of the visions of Isaiah and Ezekiel, the surroundings of Christ would require his language to be literally understood. Christ had the whole scope of the physical, and political worlds before him, also the ecclesiastical world—and he has given us the phenomena that would take place in each of these worlds. He keeps them in their various departments—the physical signs in their department. Political signs in their division, and the ecclesiastical, or church signs in their department.

We have always understood that Christ predicted the total destruction of a literal temple, by a literal power. That literal event had its literal signs, physical and national. He spoke then of a great tribulation followed by another cluster of signs. If the tribulation was the fall of Jerusalem, then these signs being tokens of that event, would have been before that tribulation; but Christ said that they would be soon after, and not before. The signs which we are now considering, go before, and point to his return, and not to the fall of Jerusalem. Keep in mind, that Christ's narration sketches two great events, the fall of Jerusalem and his coming; and that each event has its appropriate signs, given for special purposes, to warn his disciples living in the vicinity of each event, that they might make the necessary preparations.

We shall now examine each sign in each of the departments, physical, political or national and moral, and show that no attribute is ascribed to either one of the signs, that does not belong to it; and, that as a matter of necessity, it must have its literal construction.

Changes Mortals Must Pass Through Before They Can Inherit the Kingdom of God,

J. M. STEPHENSON.

Behold, I shew you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed. 1 Cor. xv. 51.

There are just four changes necessary that a mortal, sinful man, may be qualified to inherit the kingdom of God.

1. That intellectual change involved in faith. Faith is the result of evidence. It is the function of the intellect to analyze evidence and decide according to its preponderance. Paul reasoned logically when he said, "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." Rom. x. 17.

Again, he says, "For with the heart, (mind,) man believeth unto righteousness." Verse 10. The literal heart cannot understand or believe testimony, therefore the apostle uses the heart for the mind. Of the same import is the following language of David: "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple." Psa. xix. 7.

To convert a man from one thing to another is to convince him by cogent evidence addressed to his intellect, that one thing is wrong and the other right. Thus, to convince the judgment and to make wise the ignorant, sustain the relation to each other of cause and effect. This agrees with the declaration of Paul that faith cometh, or is produced by hearing the word of God. Thus, testimony and faith sustain the relation to each other of cause and effect. But all testimony is addressed to the intellect; therefore, it is the function of the intellect to hear and decide upon the evidence, pro and con. To have faith, therefore, the intellect must be enlightened. This is the true philosophy of all intelligent faith. The mother and grandmother of Timothy understood the true philosophy of faith. Thus they enlightened his juvenile mind with the teaching of the Holy Scriptures "which were able to make him wise unto salvation." His faith, therefore, was produced by hearing the word of God. It educated his intellect or enlightened his mind, which are words of the same import. One writer observes that speech, hearing and faith are inseparable. What profit in one having the power of speech if another had not the power of hearing, and why should he have the power of hearing if he had not the intellectual faculty of analyzing and deciding upon the merits of what he hears—or the intellectual faculty of believing what convinces his intellect is true, being in accord with an acknowledged standard of right and wrong? Like cause, like effect, is one of the simplest axioms of philosophy. 1. No evidence, no faith. 2. Strong evidence, strong faith. In all cases the faith will be the reflex of the evidence. Only upon the hypothesis that the Bible is sustained by the strongest and most cogent evidences can we have the strongest confidence in its high claims as a revelation of the Most High God. Man exercises the same intellectual faculty in believing the Koran that he does in believing the Bible—in believing the biography of Socrates that he does in believing the biography of Christ. The difference in faiths does not consist in the exercises of different faculties, but the different objects, or kinds of evidence. The same heat that will harden clay will soften wax. This does not prove opposite qualities of heat, but the opposite condition of the material upon which the heat operated. The same word, which, if received in a good and honest mind and heart will enlighten the mind and soften the heart, if rejected, after having been understood and appreciated it, will darken the intellectual perceptions and harden the heart. These opposite results do not prove opposite qualities or principles in truth (for all truth is an unit), but the opposite conditions of the minds and hearts of those upon whom it operates.

Thus, the gospel is a savor of life unto life to those who believe and obey, and a savor of death unto death to those who reject it. The same mercy hardened Pharaoh's heart which would have softened it had he heeded its warning voice. These results are just as legitimate as that he who sows tares should reap tares, or that he who sows to the wind should reap the whirlwind. Casual thinkers sometimes confound these intellectual and moral results with decrees. To profound thinkers, these opposite results prove, beyond controversy, the intellectual and moral power of man to accept or reject the truth and thus write his own life or death warrant. All responsibility is suspended upon this intellectual power to choose the right and reject the wrong. Promised rewards is the motive which calls forth the grandest and noblest efforts of man. Faith is the mainspring of all intelligent action. Thus, Paul says, "But without faith it is impossible to please him; he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Heb. xi. 6.

1. He "must believe, and he must come;" thus recognizing man's intellectual power to investigate the evidences of the existence of God, and the understanding of the promised reward of faith and obedience.

2. The necessity of faith. "Without faith it is impossible to please him." This corresponds with Christ's language in the great commission. "And he said unto them, go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." Mark xvi. 15, 16

3. The motive that draws men or prompts them to come to God is the promised reward. Hence, an intelligent understanding of the gospel—the thing to be believed—is a necessary requisite to an intelligent faith. This intellectual change is involved in the following language of Peter: He called upon the people to "Repent and be converted." Acts iii. 19. That is, change your mind and conduct. An intelligent conviction of sin, is the result of evidence addressed to the intellect. Sin is the transgression of law. 1 John iii. 4. Paul says, "By the law is the knowledge of sin." Rom. iii. 20. Again, he says, "I had not known sin but by the law." Rom. vii. 7.

Thus, an intelligent understanding of the law is necessary to a conviction of sin, and conviction of sin is necessary to contrition, and contrition is necessary to confession and reformation. Therefore, before there can be that "Godly sorrow which (as a cause) worketh repentance" there must be a knowledge of the law with an intelligent conviction of the fact that we have transgressed it, as essential prerequisites of that great moral change which is called repentance. Peter had convinced the Jews by the stupendous miracle God had wrought by him, in healing the man who had been lame from his birth. He also appealed to the resurrection of Christ from the dead in whose name this noted cripple had been made to walk. He had further charged them with having "killed the Prince of life whom God had raised from the dead; whereof they were witnesses," and then closed by saying, "And now, brethren, I wot that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers. But those things, which God had before showed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer, he hath fulfilled." Acts iii.

Having presented the most overwhelming evidence to convince them of the most heinous sin, he called upon them to repent and be converted, that their sins might be blotted out. Thus, two great changes are necessary in order to the remission of sins, namely, (1) intellectual, produced by evidence causing conviction of sin; (2) repentance, or turning away from sin, caused by conviction and contrition on account of sin. The same results were produced by the same apostle on the day of Pentecost. By an appeal to the oath and covenant of God necessitating the resurrection of Christ from the dead, thousands were convinced that they had crucified their own Messiah; and they cried out as the demonstration of such conviction, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Thus, we read, "Now when they heard this they were pricked in their hearts (or convinced of sin) and said unto Peter and the rest of the apostles, men and brethren, what shall we do?" Acts ii. 37. Peter did not command them to believe, because he had the evidence before him that their intellects had been convinced, or that they had believed the testimony adduced. Thus, he referred them to the two great moral and legal changes, subsequently to the great intellectual change involved in faith, in order to the remission of their sins. See Acts ii. 38.

We read "that when the prodigal son came to himself and said, how many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger! I will arise and go to my father and I will say unto him, father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee." Luke xv. 17. As the result of reflection upon the surrounding circumstances his intellect was convinced that something must be done speedily or he must perish. The evidence inspired confidence that his father might receive him if he could convince him of the sincerity of his repentance. The sequel demonstrates that he was not mistaken. This intelligent conviction was produced by past evidence of the goodness and mercy of his father, otherwise he would not have made the effort.

Thus, again, an intellectual change produced that great moral change called repentance. That an intelligent understanding of the word is necessary to salvation, I will prove by quoting a few more texts of Scripture. Christ said, "When any one heareth the word of the kingdom and understandeth it not, then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in the heart," or mind. Matt. xiii. 19. We read in Acts viii. 30, 31, "And Philip ran to him, and heard him read the prophet Esaias, and said understandest what thou readest? And he said, how can I except some man should guide me?" The following expresses Peter's evidence that Cornelius and his household believed the gospel. He said: "The word which God sent unto the children of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ (he is Lord of all). That word I say you know, which was published throughout all Judea, and began from Galilee, after the baptism which John preached." Acts x. 36, 37. The word which began to be preached in Galilee, and which was published throughout all Judea was the gospel of the kingdom. See Mark i. 14; Matt. iv. 23; ix. 35; Luke viii. 1.

Paul, when referring to the condition of Gentiles before they had been enlightened by the gospel, says, "That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope; and without God in the world." Eph. ii. 12. Paul's advice to Timothy is of the same import. He says, "But continue thou in the things which thou hast learned, and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them; and that from a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus." 2 Tim. iii. 14, 15. Thus, faith in Christ Jesus is an effect produced by the knowledge of what the Holy Scriptures have taught concerning him. Peter informs us how we may obtain the same faith of the apostles and the saints of all ages. He says, "Simon Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ, to them that have obtained like precious faith with us through the righteousness of God and our Savior Jesus Christ; grace and peace be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God, and our Lord Jesus Christ." 2 Pet. i. 1, 2. God's order is, 1st. grace, 2d. knowledge, 3d. righteousness and 4th. peace.

On the occasion of the anniversary of Francis Joseph of Austria, the city of Spalato, Dalmatia, celebrated the re-opening of the aqueduct which brings water from Salona to the city, and which was built by the Dalmatian Emperor Diocletian. The curious feature about the affair is that, notwithstanding the sore need of water under which the city has always labored, the aqueduct had never been repaired and had therefore been unavailable for fourteen centuries.

SELECTIONS.

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

"The Regeneration of Palestine"... Mr. Gladstone and the Anglo-Turkish Convention—Turkey's Continued Decline—The Jews and Their Affairs.

AN INTERNATIONAL SURVEY OF PALESTINE.

The Jewish Chronicle says:—"The special edition of the 'Survey of Western Palestine,' has been fully subscribed for, without advertisement or any appeal, to the general public. The map is ready, and is only kept back for the memoirs which are to accompany it, and of which there are twenty-six—twenty by Lieut. Conder, and six by Lieut. Kitchener. The American Association for the Exploration of Palestine have placed in the hands of the committee of the fund their map of Eastern Palestine with the accompanying memoirs, which have been compiled by the Rev. Dr. Selah Merrill, of New York, whose investigations of the Valley of the Jordan formed the subject of our leading article on August 8 last. So the English and American works united will comprise the largest and completest map of Palestine in existence, and will form a truly grand international undertaking. The finances of the society are in a highly prosperous condition. Not only has it been extricated from debt, but it has a balance at the bank of £522 17s. 11d. In addition, the society has become possessed during the fourteen years of its existence, of a very valuable property, consisting of a large collection of antiquities, photographs, the copyright in three books, a great quantity of plans and drawings, and—the most valuable possession of all—the memoirs, map, plans and drawings of the survey of Palestine. In order to defend this property from piracy, the society is about to be registered as a limited liability company. All this is very satisfactory. . . .

A mere glance at the full and varied contents of the four quarterly statements for 1879 will suffice to show how deserving of support these objects are. The year's work has resulted in the compilation of original articles on some of the most important subjects in connection with Palestine. Its pensantry, colonization, present condition, roads, water supply, irrigation, populousness, and bridges are all treated of, and they must possess a deep interest for those who are anxious to advance the welfare of our co-religionists residing in the Holy Land. Again, 'Artificial Tels,' 'Gerizim,' 'Zoar,' 'Jacob's Well,' 'Hagar's Fountain,' 'Plain of Shittim,' besides the articles in the present number on which we have dilated are all of primary importance to the Jewish student, as tending to confirm his belief in the book and his attachment to the faith, which are both so closely bound up with the topography, physical features, antiquities manners and customs of the Holy Land."

PALESTINE, PAST AND TO COME.

Finally, a contributor in the Jewish Chronicle writing on "The Regeneration of Palestine," has the following passage in his second article:

"In the days of Jerusalem's greatness there might have been seen by any one looking across the gorge to Olivet, not only the olive and the vine and fig, but the myrtle, and the pine and the white blossoming almond. Jerusalem is to-day a Jewish poorhouse or prison, and the Mohammedan holds the key. 'Trod down by all in turn, Pagan and Frank and Tartar, sounds the dread anathema; trodden down, beneath the oppressor; darkness shrouding thee. From every blessed influence of heaven, thou art thou lain for ages, ironbound as with a chain; thus art thou doomed to lie. Yet not for ever.'

Palestine, now lying low in the dust, may be restored to more than its pristine grandeur and glory. It is a land of mountains and plains and valleys. It has within itself almost every variety of soil and climate. The productiveness of the soil is amazing, wanting only water and culture. The olive and the fig and the vine grow luxuriously upon the mountain sides, and without artificial irrigation. When thus adorned with verdure, the scenery will be most picturesque, and whether seen in the sunlight or by the pale light of the moon, under a clear Oriental sky, it is not difficult to realize in imagination what it once was under a high state, of culture, or what it will be in the future, 'when the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose.' The maritime plain is a natural wheat field, the plain of Esdraelon is not only fertile and easily watered, it is a line prepared by the hand of nature for a railroad across the Peninsula; the Jordan Valley is tropical and will bear tropical fruits, and with irrigation from the mountain springs and from the Jordan river, it will yield large exports of untold value, for which the markets of the world are waiting. There is wanted only a beneficent government, and patient industry, and all these things shall come to pass. The amelioration of the climate is dependent upon the education, and moral, spiritual and physical elevation of the people who inhabit it. Man's mission upon earth is 'to dress it and keep it,' to subdue it, and to make it subservient to his interest. Its reclamation, after having been degraded, is by a return to normal conditions, so that soil and air and temperature and water may conjointly and harmoniously work for the highest good; for until now, the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain, waiting for the promised redemption. In view of the broadest generalisation of facts, it is not a mere figure of speech or an Oriental symbol, that the earth and the whole inferior creation is in correlation with man, the anointed superior and head. 'Of earthly sights Rome ranks as the third; Athens and Jerusalem are the other two; the three people of God's election—two for things temporal, and one for things eternal.' Thus says Arnold. Not Rome, but Jerusalem is to be the eternal city. True religion restored to its birth place, will bring with it every other blessing; industry, thrift, enterprise, good government, art, commerce, order, and general prosperity, not of the people only, but of the soil and climate also; an amelioration of the conditions of man's environment; grateful shades for the summer, protection from the rude blasts of winter, . . . rains in their season, and abundant harvests. The dew shall descend on the moor, Carmel shall rejoice, and the Cedars of Lebanon shall clap their hands. The old abundance is yet sleeping in the soil of Palestine, and it needs no miracle, but skilful husbandry and the blessing of God, to bring back the beauty and the wealth of the early ages of the Holy Land."

THE CHANCE FOR THE JEWS AT HOME.

Speaking of the city improvements in Rome consequent on the downfall of the Papal power and the establishment of a Constitutional government, the Jewish Chronicle says:—

"The enclosure which has witnessed the oppression of the unfortunate Jews for centuries, is to be swept from the face of the earth, those dingy and dirty and dismal houses, wherein our co-religionists had lived and married and died from father to son for untold generations, are to disappear from the Italian capital. To add to the irony of fate it is intended, it is said, to erect a Palace of Justice on the site of the demolished Ghetto! Justice, tempered with mercy, is to flourish where injustice and oppression and cruelty had ruled for centuries. The Ghetto, as most of our readers are aware, is situated in one of the most squalid and unhealthy quarters of Rome. It is subject to miasma, fever, and periodical inundations from the Tiber. The Jews under the rule of the Vicars of Christ, were until recent times forbidden to live beyond its precincts. In those narrow and gloomy streets, our co-religionists, to the number of four or five thousand, earned with difficulty a scanty livelihood. Cut off from the rest of the population, huddled together in an insufficient space, they mostly gained their bread by huckstering and trading. They were not allowed to exercise the liberal professions, a Jew being unfit to prescribe for a sick man, or to plead in the forum. A few well-to-do merchants and bankers certainly existed, but they dared not show signs of opulence, and the mass of the Jewish population was steeped in poverty. At sunset the gates of the Ghetto were closed, and the unfortunate Israelite found beyond them was punished by law, in addition to the risk of being attacked and ill-treated by the populace. The paternal government of the Popes must have loved its Jewish children, for it did not spare the rod. The Jews had, at stated periods, to run races for the diversion of the mob, and those who lagged behind were urged on with whips amidst the derisive shouts of the onlookers. When the late Pope ascended the throne he initiated his reign by some liberal reforms. Among these he relieved the Jews from several barbarous usages, and the gates of the Ghetto were thrown open. The reforms of Pius IX. did not last long, and Mazini's predictions as to the incompatibility of liberalism with the Popedom were verified. On the return of the Pope, supported by French bayonets, the Jews gradually sank to their former oppressed condition. It was left to the government of Victor Emanuel to raise the Jews from their unhappy state. United Italy knows no distinctions among its citizens. At the entrance of the Ghetto there is still to be seen a church, wherein a certain number of Israelites were constrained annually to hear a sermon on the beauties and superiority of Christianity. Sir Isaac L. Goldsmid interceded on one occasion on behalf of his co-religionists, and we believe he procured a remission of the distasteful obligation. That Church and the Ghetto, let us hope, will soon disappear and with them the memory of past times and bitter oppression. Rome has witnessed the election of a Jewish mayor, and Signor Samuel Alatri has governed as chief Magistrate the city wherein his presence was only tolerated in one of its quarters. A still more remarkable spectacle will be the erection of a Palace of Justice on the site which had once been occupied by the Ghetto of Rome."

The Effect in Turkey of Gladstone's Success.

CONSTANTINOPLE, April 23.—The unexpected result of the elections in England has produced a profound sensation throughout the East. A belief has heretofore existed in Turkey, not unlike that prevalent in the Southern States prior to the war, when cotton was called King and England was supposed to be its obedient servant, that the existence of the Ottoman Empire is essential to the safety of British India, and that the policy of the English Government must of necessity be pro-Turkish and anti Russian. The advent to power of a new school of politicians, with a programme opposed to the traditional policy of British statesmen, has consequently produced the utmost consternation and bewilderment in official circles here.

The idea of an Anglo-Russian alliance for the settlement of the Eastern question is one so utterly novel that the Turks fail to realize the results which accrue from it to the fate of their empire. They are thrown out in all their calculations, and have to provide for an entirely new political combination. The most immediate effect has been a change in their attitude toward England. It has now become plain that the reluctance which has been shown to receive advice from the British Government, and the obstacles which have been raised to all measures of reform, have contributed to the downfall of the late Conservative Administration. Had Lord Beaconsfield's Government been able to point triumphantly to the efforts made by Turkey to carry out the spirit of the treaty of Berlin, and frankly to enter upon the path of reform with the advice and assistance of England, it is possible that the elections would have resulted very differently. As it is, the Eastern policy of the Conservative Government has been a complete failure. One of the strongest weapons in the hands of the Liberals has been the taunt that the Philo-Turkish party in England have been deceived and betrayed by their friends, and that results have justified the predictions of those who called the Turk "unspeakable." It is, therefore, feared here that a new and uncompromising policy will be adopted toward Turkey, and that a concerted action will be arrived at between England and one or more European powers, by which the Porte will be coerced into those measures of reform which the English Government has contented itself hitherto with mildly recommending. In anticipation of this unpleasant contingency, the Ottoman Ministry are beginning to bestir themselves in the hope of depreciating any such interference, but in so vague and feeble a manner that I fear it will not be of much avail. The internal evils have got almost beyond cure, and they have been increased rather than mitigated by the financial measures which have recently been adopted.

The most appalling accounts of famine and distress reach us from all parts of the empire, and telegrams appealing for help are raining in from the provinces. In Armenia especially, whole villages are starving to death, and even money if it could be sent to them, is of little use, for there is no corn to buy. The consequence is that this destitute population will be quite unable to pay any taxes, and a large diminution of revenue will of necessity result. Many parts of the country are almost given over to brigandage, people being driven to organized robbery as a means of self-preservation. While Moslems and Christians are alike starving in Asiatic and some parts of European Turkey, the Christian Slavs of Eastern Roumelia and Bulgaria are not backward in contributing their share of horrors, in the shape of "atrocities." In the district of Kirjalli, we have accounts of the male population of some of the Moslem villages being stripped and severely beaten; of a hundred and four women and girls violated, some of whom were brutally mutilated and murdered; of five villages burned, and of wholesale appropriation by Christians of Moslem property. In Bulgaria, the Moslem population is being starved and driven out of the country by the oppression and injustice of the local government. Serious riots take place between the Greek and Bulgarian inhabitants of Eastern Roumelia, the latter being determined, if possible, to expel from the country, by a process of ostracism, their Greek coreligionists. From Albania the news reaches us that the population of the districts about to be ceded to Montenegro are in revolt, and are determined to resist to the uttermost by force the transfer of their territory; from all which it is clear that the Eastern question will provide abundant occupation to the new Government in England as well as to the Porte.

Vague rumors also arrive from Arabia and the Hedjaz of a movement on a large scale among the Bedouin Arabs who have been excited by the recent assassination of the Grand Shereef of Mecca, and who are also suffering from want, and have upon more than one occasion levied large contributions on some of the towns on the banks of the Euphrates. There is, moreover, the Greek frontier question still to be settled, and there can be little doubt that it will be solved in the way least satisfactory to the Turks, who will probably now be compelled to cede to Greece, in addition to the territory already partly agreed upon, the valuable province of Janina, against the cession of which to Greece the Conservative Government in England firmly protested. The strongly pronounced Slav and Hellenic sympathies of Mr. Gladstone and his adherents will now be allowed full play, and will be curious to watch the attitude which will be adopted by Germany and Austria under these new circumstances. The Slav population of Bosnia and Herzegovina recently annexed by Austria complain bitterly of the treatment to which they are subjected by their new masters, and profess that if they cannot be independent they would rather be Russian than Austrian. Whereas, the late Conservative Government in England was distinctly committed to a German and Austrian alliance, as opposed to a Russian, French and Italian combination, the Liberal Government is no less distinctly committed to a Russian, French, and Italian combination, as opposed to a German and Austrian alliance, and in addition to this, to a policy of protecting and freeing Christian nationalities in the East. The claims of Slavs, Greeks, and Armenians will it is to be presumed, therefore receive their immediate attention. Indications are not wanting that the German and Austrian Governments are already alive to the dangers of this change of front, and are seeking to detach Russia from France upon the old basis of a tripartite holy alliance. The disappearance from the political arena of Prince Bismarck's great enemy, Prince Gortchakoff, may facilitate this reapproachment, but it will be found probably beyond even the German Chancellor's power to reconcile the conflicting interests of Austria and Russia in the Slav nationalities; each will desire to control them, while England will strive for their uncontrolled independence. One of the first efforts probably on the part of the Liberal Government will be to bring about the annexation of Eastern Roumelia to Bulgaria, and the hopes of the Slavs are so highly excited in this direction that addresses have been pouring in upon Mr. Gladstone, congratulating him on his success at the late elections.

Meantime rumors are rife here of a change in the Cabinet. The policy of the present Prime Minister is recognized by all patriotic and far-seeing Turks as totally inadequate to the emergency with which he has to deal, and his method of conducting public affairs so far has not been such as to inspire confidence. It is earnestly hoped that before long he may be replaced by a man more competent to grapple with the present critical state of matters, supported by a Parliament which should to some extent share his responsibilities with the Prime Minister, and the names of Khaireddin and Mahmoud Nedim are in everybody's mouth. We have been so long on the eve of important changes and great events that it seems futile to go on predicting them, but the impression is so general that the present situation is too strained to last, that I should not convey a true idea of public sentiment if I did not refer to them.

Prophecies of the Past and Future.

Some years ago, I stood one day on Mount Zion, in Palestine; and with a stalk of barley in my hand, which had been plucked from its furrowed slopes, I read that prophecy—given when the mountain was well-nigh covered with palaces—"Zion shall be ploughed as a field." Micah iii. 12. The divine oracle was fulfilled to the letter before my eyes.

Another day, in Jerusalem, I saw some masons erecting a church whose foundations, though the original city stood upon a plateau of rock, had been laid fifty feet deep in the vast mounds of rubbish; and, turning from the building, I took at the Scripture—also written in the days of her splendor—"Jerusalem shall become heaps." Mic. iii. 12. Again the oracle stood accomplished literally before my eyes.

A third day I wandered over the smooth, sand-covered hill on which erst had risen the proud towers of Gaza; and, among the broken remains of pillars which here and there could be detected in the loose sand, I pondered the oracle of God—"Baldness is come upon Gaza." Jer. xlvii. 5. Another prophecy, uttered when the city stood yet in its glory, was fulfilled not less literally before my eyes.

A fourth day found me sauntering amidst the handful of shepherds' tents which now were scattered among the imposing ruins of Ashkelon; and, opening my divine guide book, I read—"Ashkelon shall be forsaken, and the sea-coasts shall be dwellings, and cottages for shepherds and folds for flocks." Zeph. ii. 4, 6. It was yet another oracle accomplished to the very letter.

A fifth day, I rode ankle deep in the street of the poor fishing village of Sur—the site of the seaport of the once magnificent Tyre; on the neighboring rocks I saw the fishermen's nets spread out to dry; for miles along the shore, I searched in vain for some well-defined fragments of the ancient city, finding only a literal of naked rock. And as I gazed on those scenes, I listened with awe to the voice of the Seer, as in vision had stood surrounded by all the city's grandeur—"Behold I am against thee, O Tyrus! I will also scrape her dust from her, and make her like the top of a rock. I will make thee a terror; and thou shalt be no more; though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again, saith the Lord," Ezek. xxvi. 3, 5, 21. Once more the divine word was fulfilled before me to the letter.

Day after day, I traversed that strange land, finding it vacant, without a people—whilst everywhere in other lands I had left behind me innumerable Jews—a people without a country. And I read—"Ye shall be plucked from the land whither thou goest to possess it; and the Lord shall scatter thee amongst all people from one end of the earth even unto the other." Deut. xxviii. 63. Yet again the oracle was accomplished literally before my eyes.

In the presence of these most distinctive prophecies, and of those not less distinctive fulfillments, I found myself arrested by two other singular distinctive prophecies concerning Israel's future.

The one was—"Thus saith the Lord God, behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the nations whither they are gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land; and I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one King shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all." Ezek. xxxvii. 21, 22.

And the other was—"I will bring again the captivity of my people; . . . and I will plant them upon their land; and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I gave them, saith the Lord thy God." Amos ix. 14, 15.

I knew that neither of these prophecies had as yet been fulfilled; not Ezekiel's, because never since the death of Solomon, have the two kingdoms been yet incorporated into one; and not Amos', because never yet have the Jews been restored so as not again to be scattered. I had before my eyes, moreover, the Jewish people, preserved through so many ages as a distinct nationality without country; and I had not less vividly before my eyes that one country kept for so many centuries without a people. In the view of these two dove-tailed facts of God's providence, and of those so explicit declarations of God's word, no other conclusion can be come to, but that the Jews are yet to be restored literally and nationally to their land.

MOUNTAINEER'S PRAYER.

Gird me with the strength of Thy steadfast hills!
The speed of Thy streams give me!
In the spirit that calms, with the life that thrills,
I would stand or run for Thee.
Let me be Thy voice, or Thy silent power,—
As the cataract or the peak,—
An eternal thought in my earthly hour,
Of the living God to speak.

Give me of the brook's faith, joyously sung
Under clank of its icy chain!
Give me of the patience that hides among
Thy hill-tops in mist and rain!
Lift me up from the clod; let me breathe Thy breath;
Thy beauty and strength give me!
Let me lose both the name and the meaning of death
In the life that I share with Thee!

The wealth of heaven never perishes, never departs, never ceases, never brings with it care or envy or blame, destroys not the body, corrupts not the soul, is without ill-will, heaps not up malice, all which things attend on earthly wealth. That honor lifts not men into folly, doth not make them puffed up, never ceases nor is dimmed. Again, the rest and delight of heaven endureth continually; ever-being immovable and immortal, one cannot find its end or limit. Nothing which comes to an end is much to be desired; whatever ceases, and to-day is, and to-morrow is not, though it be very great, yet it seems little and contemptible. Then let us not cling to fleeting things which slip away and depart, but to those which are enduring and immovable.—S. Chrysostom.

THE AURORA.

Polar snow is known to contain five-fortieths of iron, which must have descended from the atmosphere. In the snow north of Spitzbergen, Nordenskjold detected iron, cobalt, and phosphorus. Facts like these appear to have suggested a theory of the aurora borealis to Prof. Grinemann, of Gottingen. He believes that large masses of iron particles describe a path round the sun, and when the earth crosses their path some of the particles are attracted by it, especially at the poles. When the particles strike the atmosphere the friction thus produced causes them to ignite and become luminous, following exactly the behavior of meteorites.

POETRY.

Musings.

C. S. M.

Sweet Comforter, Oh leave me not
In this late hour of fear;
Let thy "still voice" yet breathe within,
And be in presence near.

Long have thy whisperings led my feet,
Through peril, and through shade;
And now, in this strange closing strife,
Let not thy teachings fade.

I see outstretched, thy parting wing,
Beyond earth's dying sun;
And know the mission of thy grace
To man, is almost done.

But linger with the waiting few,
Who would not grieve thy love;
And let thy presence speak in power,
Till they are called above.

Thou leave us not. Oh leave us not!
We hang upon thy will;
Our spirits cling about to thee,
Oh, be our leader still.

A FREAK OF NATURE.

We translate the following from La Union Democrata, of San Luis Potosi: Adjacent to the hacienda of Santa Catarina, about twenty leagues east of this city, a very remarkable freak of nature has occurred, the facts concerning which we have received from a gentleman who visited the scene. On the 7th instant the people of the hacienda and vicinity were aroused by a startling noise resembling thunder. Upon assembling to see what was the matter, it was soon discovered that a small mountain in the immediate vicinity had sunk into the earth, and it must have gone out of sight like a flash. Our informant, with others, made observations, and learned the aperture thus opened was 200 meters in length, 150 in width, and its depth from 130 to 150 meters. It was with great difficulty the rim of the cavern was approached as all about there were great yawning fissures which threatened to open still wider. To miss a step there was a danger of finding a grave in the depth beneath. Some stones, weighing about two pounds each, were thrown into the cavern, and it took from nine to ten seconds before they struck bottom, their contact with the surface beneath making a great report. After these brief observations the exploring parties retired hurriedly from the scene, as the earth was trembling and shaking as if upon volcanic. The location of this strange phenomenon is situated in the tierra caliente (warm region), and mesquites and palm trees flourish all about. Whenever any portions of the earth along the rim of the cavern fell into the depths immense clouds of white dust issued forth. This dust was carried about by the winds and made all the trees in the vicinity perfectly white. Speculation is rife as to whether the mountain sank owing to the earthquake influences, or was the result of gas explosions. It could not be attributed to the former very well, as no shocks were felt in the neighborhood.

ALARMING MORTALITY.

PARIS, May 17.—The mortality of this city during the past week creates alarm. Thirty-three persons died from typhus, seventy-one from small-pox, thirty-one from measles and fifty-eight from croup.

The disastrous conflagration at Milton, Pa., last Friday night, destroyed nearly $2,000,000 worth of property, including over 600 houses, several churches, a number of hotels and several factories. With this and the recent extensive conflagrations in the oil regions, Pennsylvania has suffered enormously by fire this spring—the aggregate losses exceeding even those by the recent extensive forest and marsh fires in New Jersey, by which many miles of country were swept by flames.

LETTER DRAWER.

Editor Restitution:—A word of encouragement for the brethren of the One Faith; we are getting along finely in this part of Michigan; the Lord is blessing his people here and adding to their numbers through the labors of Brother Myres and Brother McCrodan and myself. Seven embraced the faith at Hammond and put on Christ by baptism. I held meetings four weeks near Fisher Station on the Indiana railroad; the interest as good as I ever saw. The opposition was very sharp. The Methodist minister told the people no wonder we Advents understood our Bible. It was not like other folks'. We made it to suit ourselves. But everything that was said and done only seemed to advertise our meeting. Congregation large, and increased to the close of meetings. Result: Seven baptized, and more expect to be soon. I would say to the preaching brethren, let us go to work in earnest; stop contending about questions which only gender to strife and divide God's people, and try and convert men to the gospel. People are perishing for lack of knowledge all around us, and would embrace the truth if they knew what it was. Let us do all we can to get the truth before the people, and the brethren should understand their duty in this matter and make some sacrifice for their Master's cause. Some men professing the One Faith can find several dollars to buy tobacco with in the course of a year, but not a farthing to buy tracts to scatter among the unlearned, or to pay an evangelist to carry the truth into new places. These things are wrong. Let the preaching brethren cry the necessity in each congregation of earnest work, and sacrifice on the part of the brethren that the truth may find its way into new fields. Let each brother and sister remember that it took some effort to bring the truth to us individually, and how we rejoiced in it; and now there are thousands of others who would be glad to rejoice in the blessed hope of a near coming Savior and his glorified reign on earth if they only understood the blessed hope. Let each remember they have a duty to do, and the Judge will hold us strictly responsible as stewards. He that has been faithful over a few things will be made ruler over many things. Let us be careful how we use our Lord's money.

Editor Restitution:—When the prophets spoke the words of the Lord to the people they did not use a strange language or give words new meanings. They used words which their hearers understood, and used them in the sense in which their hearers used them. If we read a name in the prophets, that name means to-day what it meant when written. But when men are inventing theories or are supporting such inventions they add meanings to God's words, a thing they would not dare to do to the words of any historic or scientific author.

He First Loved Me.

I love Jesus, not of myself alone. He first loved me. There came a thought into my heart, something whispering, I am not as I ought to be, and with it pressing hard on my, conscience I heard the word, "None good; no, not one," mysteriously. I knew I was lost; the spirit of love taught me it, and over the darkness of my natural life came light. A cloner saved. The narrow way I had entered. Oh! what peace is mine! In myself sorrowful. In Christ always rejoicing. I understand life now. Christ in me, and myself of nature a warfare, yet always victorious (in the right. The "flesh warring against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh." They are contrary one to the other, and, indeed, must be the flesh is unto death the spirit unto life. Can I fail? Oh! no. I love Jesus. Love keeps me. When I do wrong I know where to place it, —"to condemnation." Jesus saves to the uttermost. Blessed Jesus we wait perfection's issue when we shall see thee. Oh! I love Jesus; I long to see him; to be made like him. Then, then human weakness will be swallowed up of divine strength. My brother, my sister, we will trust Jesus more. He died in love and now lives in love for us! We can be more content. Quietness in Jesus works activity. Every light shines! Unseen to human eye the heart trusting Jesus. Faith in him to-day, brings its open power. Let us be willing and obedient, loving Jesus. You, in your home, neighborhood, town, city or country, and our loving Jesus in heart will be our shining good works for outward influence. To-day God's long-suffering waiteth, not willing that any should perish. I want to be "gentle unto all men," apt to teach, patient. In meekness, instructing those that oppose themselves; if God, peradventure, will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth. O! to be careful, is my thought, to avoid "foolish and unlearned questions." These do gender strife. We will be ready for every good word and work, because we love Jesus. Come, Lord Jesus, come.

Messiah Cut Off,

From pulpit and press we hear and read of Messiah being "cut off in the midst of the week," but not one sentence can we find in Holy Writ to justify even such an inference. From the fact that Messiah was cut off after the seven and sixty-two, we infer that the "one week," the seventieth of the seventy in the week intended, although separated, cut apart and designed as the period allotted for a distinct series of prophetic events. If Messiah was cut off in the midst of the week, then was he cut off on the day that the daily sacrifice is taken away and the abomination that maketh desolate set up! If Messiah was cut off in the midst of the week, then the forty-two month's reign of the anti-christ began on that day! The week in which Messiah was cut off being a week of seven years, therefore, from the "cutting off" to the end of the week would be three years and six months, at the end of which is the resurrection of the dead and eternal judgment! That "one week" begins by the confirmation of the (a) covenant between a Roman prince and the Jews. In the midst of the week the daily sacrifice is taken away and the abomination that maketh desolate set up by the Roman "prince that shall come," and at the end of the week all the wonders of resurrection and judgment are accomplished! The 2300, 1290 days, and the "times" are but a part of that "one week" and are embraced and included within the limits of the week. No sophistry, no logical conclusions from assumed premises can invalidate the God-given fact. The time is near, "it hasteth greatly." The Pyramids, seven overlappings and impending walls bear testimony.

BREVITIES.

The condition of the mohair flocks all over Asia Minor is causing the greatest concern. The intense cold (the snow in many places having been four to six feet deep, and rendering it impossible to reach the animals) is causing the death of hundreds of thousands. Angora and two other districts report already a loss of 30 per cent., and the mortality was continuing.

In a suburban cemetery of Warsaw were interred, a few weeks ago, the remains, of a venerable Pole, whose claim to be the oldest inhabitant of that city had been undisputed for several years previous to his demise. This patriarch had completed his 118th year, when he was summoned to his fathers; and, as during his abnormally protracted existence he had suffered no family bereavements, except that which robbed him of his wife, eighty-five years ago, his body was followed to the grave by such a procession of mourning descendants as, at least with respect to its numbers, has probably never before attended the obsequies of a defunct Christian. No fewer than 236 of his children and his children's children, even unto the fourth generation, streamed into the churchyard to bid a last adieu to their progenitor. The death of a person who had many grandchildren when the battle of Waterloo was fought, and whose early personal memories included such historical figures as Maria Theresa and Frederick the Great, is a note-worthy circumstance.

THE POWER OF A CYCLONE.

In discussing the two cyclones which visited the Bay of Bengal in October, 1876, Mr. Elliott, meteorological reporter of the Government of Bengal, incidentally gives some idea of the cyclonean forces which are developed by such storms. The average "daily evaporation" registered by the Bengal instruments in October is "two inches." The amount of heat absorbed by the conversion of this amount of water daily over so large an area as the Bay of Bengal is enormous. "Roughly estimated," said Mr. Elliott, "it is equal to the continuous working power of 800,000 steam engines of 1,000 horse power." A simple calculation will show that it suffices to raise aloft over 45,000 cubic feet of water in twenty-four hours from every square mile of the bosom of the bay, and transport it to the clouds which overhang it. When we extend the calculation from a single square mile to the whole Indian Gulf, the mind is lost in the effort to conceive the force which, in a day's time, can lift 50,000,000 tons! Yet it would be easy to show that such figures, fabulous as they seem, do not adequately represent the cyclonic forces of a single storm.

A GIANT INDIAN.

A farmer, residing near Montague, N. J., while digging holes for peach trees on his farm, a few days since, unearthed the bones of an Indian—probably a chief. The thigh bones are nearly three feet in length, while those of the other parts of the frame are as large in proportion, indicating a person not less than eight or nine feet high. Beneath the bones were also found two pipes, twelve brass arrow-points, nineteen spiral-shaped pieces of brass, a flint arrow head, and a quantity of red paint powder. The largest pipe, which resembles a blacksmith's tongs, is of pewter. The bowl rises to the height of ten inches, while the handle is about seventeen inches long. From the upper end of the bowl extended two small projections, on which are fastened the miniature statue of a pair of owls.

SELECTIONS.

[Christian Herald.]

Approaching Perihelia and Catamiflics.

The science of astronomy has, in all ages, engaged the attention of the poet, the philosopher, and the divine, and been the subject of their study and admiration. Kings have descended from their thrones to render it homage, and have sometimes enriched it with their labors; and humble shepherds, while watching their flocks by night, have beheld with rapture the blue vault of heaven, with its thousands of shining orbs moving in silent grandeur, till the morning star announced the approach of day.

The study of this science must have been coeval with the existence of man; for there is no rational being who has for the first time lifted his eyes to the nocturnal sky, and beheld the moon walking in brightness amidst the planetary orbs and hosts of stars, but must have been struck with admiration at the splendid scene, and excited to inquires into the nature, physical influence, and destination of those far-distant orbs. It is generally known that extraordinary atmospheric phenomena may be expected during the period from 1880 to 1887. So long ago as May, 1879, the London Times directed the attention of its readers to the fact that the four largest planets in the solar system, viz: Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, and Neptune, would be in perihelia—which means nearest to the sun. Such a position of these planets has not taken place coincidently for more than one thousand eight hundred years. Rev. Dr. Cumming, a Presbyterian minister at Glasgow, points out in the Prophetic News for March, at two different times during the Christian era there has been a concurrence of the perihelia of three of these five planets; and these dates were marked by "awful and destructive pestilence." . . . .

Now, the fact is this, a vast magnetic atmospheric ocean surrounds our globe. The meteors which are seen occasionally falling to the earth are electric scintillations. The radiance and warmth which the sun imparts keep the electric planetary zones in perfect action. It is well known that the great force which vitalizes and preserves animal and vegetable life is all-ramifying, imponderable electricity. It is a principle which is ever operative and never quiescent.

The planets nearest the sun have the most energetic electrical elements; those farthest removed from the great solar orb have the least. It is possible, nay, demonstrative certain, that the position of the four major planets may and does disturb the electrical equilibrium of our planet, and, as Prof. Elias Colbert has shown in the Christian Herald for March 24th, every other planet is affected similarly and in exact proportion to the squares of their distances.

The changed condition of our atmospheric air resulting from many causes which interfere with or minimize the customary amount of radiance and warmth, necessarily proves eminently destructive to life and health on the earth.

Records of devastating epidemics may be traced as far back as history extends. Plague, famine, and pestilence have destroyed whole races of mankind; the conquering army and the vanquished have alike been swept away. In the middle of the fourteenth century the Black Death devastated Europe and Asia. Reliable statistics place the total loss of life in Europe at from one-third to one-fourth the population, and in Asia it was still greater. The air over the sea was infected, and ships were seen drifting about the ocean, their crews, to the last man, having perished. Swarms of locusts darkened the air, and spread themselves over the land in many parts of Europe. A perpetual succession of famines and floods reduced the people to the deepest misery.

The Black Death was both heralded and attended by extraordinary convulsions of nature. Earthquakes were most frequent immediately before the outbreak, and volcanoes displayed unusual activity. At Venice the plague immolated three-fourths of the inhabitants, and the remainder secured immunity only by flight to the islands. Hecker says, "Of the planetary influence which was considered to have originated the great mortality, physicians and learned men were as completely convinced as of the fact of its reality."

Is it not more than possible that when the Lord Jesus Christ signified the premonitory signs of the fast approaching end of the present age, He referred to the startling events which the planets in their perihelia indicate.

The Planet Jupiter.

Jupiter is a morning star, and by far the most important object for observation among the planets during the month. It cannot be too strongly impressed upon the minds of students of the stars, that the four great planets are all approaching their perihelia, and bringing about a condition of planetary affairs that has not occurred for 2,000 years. Jupiter reaches the goal first, arriving at perihelia on the 26th of September. Such is the eccentricity of his orbit that he will then be 46,000,000 miles, or about half of the whole distance of the earth from the sun, nearer to the great central fire than when farthest away. He is also at that time almost at his nearest point to the earth, coming into opposition with the sun eleven days after perihelion. The earth is then directly between him and the sun; but the earth is farthest from the sun in July, and will be at considerably more than her mean distance in September, when Jupiter is 46,000,000 miles nearer. It may easily be seen that when at opposition the earth is at or near her greatest distance, and Jupiter at his least distance, from the sun, the two planets will be almost as near together as they can be. Such will be the case next October, and the giant of the system will soon give evidence of the fact in his increasing size and brilliancy, being brighter than he has been for nearly twelve years.

Jupiter, as his mighty mass plunges toward the sun, gives evidences of mighty forces at work among the chaotic elements of his cloud-surface. A spot has been on his disk for nearly a year, elliptical in form, red in color, and with a diameter of 20,000 miles. No observer understands the cause of this huge rift. It may be an opening in the cloud atmosphere disclosing the more solid matter beneath, and it may be something beyond human ken. About the 22d, it is hoped that the planet will be again in favorable position for the observation of the red spot, and patient investigators will not be wanting to make the best of the opportunity. This beautiful planet may now be seen in the eastern sky serenely unconscious of the excitement induced by his movements, rising at 3:45; at the end of a month he rises at 2 o'clock, nearly two hours and a half before the sun.

HYMNS OF THE ADVENT

is the name of a new Hymn Book, just out, compiled by Chas. C. Burker—compiler of the "Hymns of the Morning"—and published by W. N. Pile, Springfield, Mass.

As an appendix he adds a selection of "Martin Mymns" (words only) to some music is familiar as a household word. Those of our brethren who have been asking for "Hymns of the Morning" for some time, can now be supplied with this new book, which is superior to the old one in that it embraces all of it and many new and beautiful songs. Those having the "Christian Psalmodist" and no music book will find the exactly what they want.

POETRY.

To Brother F. H. Athey.

W. J. CROCKETT.

We have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren.—John.

When life was in its summer leaf
Thou came to the Heavenly King,
And at his feet a golden sheaf
Of trust, and love, of full belief
Thou laid in humble offering;
Then did thy heart rejoice and sing,
And faith sprang up as buoyant wing.

We walketh together—ere in love
We shared earth's joy and pain;
And leaning on the Arm above
And praying loosed still to prove
An everlasting gain:—
Our hearts took up the glad refrain
The Lord will soon return to reign.

Have clouds since then obscured the sky
And grief stood by thy side?
O trust—the garb of poverty
Hides not from His clear searching eye
The worth that shall abide
The shock of time, the scoff of pride,
And is eternity inside.

Our days of journeying soon are past
But their departure brings not tears,
For by the love of Jesus blessed,
We know that everlasting rest
Is nearer through the flight of years.
Ah how this thought the faithful cheers,
And to their souls the Christ endears.

My brother may the peace of God
That passes all we know,
Linger around thee and afford
Refreshment on His weary road
In mercies ceaseless flow:
Oh may thy faith and patience grow
Until He doth thy crown bestow.

COMMUNICATIONS.

The Mission, Work and Nature of the Holy Ghost.

But let us notice some other functions of the Spirit office. He gives life credence and energy to the word, "For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance." 1 Thess. i. 5.

"And my speech and preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom (here we have man's wisdom again set in contrast with God's, with which the church and world is glutted,) but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power, that your faith should not stand (be,—margin) in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God." 1 Cor. ii. 4, 5.

"The kingdom of God (i. e. in the sense of its principles which is to persuade it and in the sense of proclamation of its laws and in their revelation to the proper preparation of men to inherit it) is not in word (alone) but in power," "in the demonstration of the Spirit and power." 1 Cor. iv. 20.

"And take the helmet of salvation and the sword of the Spirit which is the word of God." Eph. vi. 17.

Now some one disposed to confound the word with the Spirit and virtually say that there is no Holy Ghost, (Acts xix. 2,) thus making no distinction between them. They do not believe that there is a divine afflatus and extraneous power apart from the word, which has any influence upon us, stoutly affirming that all the Spirit we get is generated within us simply by perusing the word, the same as you would partake of the spirit of of the author of any book, which you might attentively read. They lay great stress upon that expression of our Lord's in his prayer to the Father, "Sanctify them through thy truth, for thy word is truth," not accepting that this word alone is rendered effectual to this end by its being sanctified that it might sanctify through the power of the Holy Ghost, not accepting that the Spirit is the quickener and takes the dead letter as it were and transcribes it in living characters upon the believer's heart, thus rendering it the incorruptible word which begets us to God by which we are born anew, and which liveth and abideth forever, not accepting that this is the motive power of the Word, and that there is no life in it without.

Will those brethren, or friends, tell what moved those mysterious wheels of which the prophet speaks, which ran so swiftly and uniformly and ever and anon "were lifted up from the earth" so wonderfully?

If it was not but for "the spirit of the living creatures (or "the Spirit of life"—margin) in the wheels," Ezek. i., it seems that there was a mutual understanding and perfect harmony subsisting between those wheels and the spirit of the living creatures, they always acted in accord. "And when the living creatures went the wheels went by them, and when the living creatures were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up; whithersoever the Spirit was to go, they went," etc. Now this is a fair illustration of the Word of God and the Spirit. The wheels would seem to represent the Word, the Spirit of the living creatures the Holy Ghost; and as the wheels might be motionless without being moved by living creatures, so the Word of God would prove ineffectual to the end of saving men without being energized or moved by the power of the Holy Ghost, and as nothing could be accomplished but by a mutual co-operation of both the wheels and the Spirit of the living creatures, so nothing might be effected in the work of salvation but by a mutual co-operation of the Word and the Holy Spirit, the parent of that Word.

Here the Word is shown to be the sword of the Spirit, and not the Spirit itself. Now we understand that this sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, cannot effect anything with respect to preparing men for the proper enjoyment of the kingdom of God, and of Christ, and of his glory, unless the Spirit of life from God gives it keenness to its edge and point that it may pierce the sinner's heart and cause him to repent, and cut the saint from all his earthly moorings.

It is said in Heb. iv. 12 that "The Word of God is quick (living) and powerful, sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and joints and marrow," etc. But we inquire what makes this two-edged sword? What makes it perform such wonderful execution? We answer, the Spirit of God, that gives the sword or Word its efficacy and power. The Word instructs and directs, the Spirit enables us to better appreciate that Word, to hide it in our hearts that we may not sin against God. Psa. cxix. 11. It gives us power and a disposition to lovingly and cheerfully comply with its injunctions and act out its precepts and reduce its divine principles to daily practice, for we believe it to be morally impossible for men in their unregenerate state to cheerfully and willingly conform to the requisitions of the Gospel and mete out the demands of the words the truth of that Gospel, save they are aided by the Spirit of the living God. Another important feature of it should not be overlooked.—It helpeth our infirmities and this agrees with what we have just remarked. "Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities, for we know not what we should pray, as we ought; but the Spirit itself (observe the Spirit itself) maketh intercession for us with groanings which can not be uttered." Rom. viii. 26. And it is through the aid advocacy of the Spirit that we are enabled to overcome and attain unto life eternal. "For if we live after the flesh we shall die, but if we through the Spirit (die) do mortify the deeds (i. e. cure them, bring them into subjection to Christ) we shall live." Rom. viii. 13.

But the magnitude and omnipotence of its work are seen, when viewed as a creator and regenerator which we shall now briefly notice.

The interesting conversation between the angel Gabriel and Mary previous to the point we wish to come at, we shall pass over. "And the angel answered and said unto her, The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." Here is creditive power displayed even to the generation and bringing forth of the Holy Child Jesus, begotten of the Holy Ghost. I know that some are disposed to question the divine inspiration of this passage, but we shall have to let stand where it is, and as it is; as it is fully sustained by other Scriptures whose doctrine authentically is not disputed in the least. But the work of the Spirit is no less powerfully demonstrated in the requickening of the dead in trespasses and sins, and infusing in them the new life in Christ.

Again, its almighty energy and the obvious necessity in the work of saving men is apparent, when we learn that it was through the agency of this alone—the all-quickening Spirit that the Lord Jesus was raised from the dead and endowed with the power of an endless life, and that this same power, to the same extent which was there and then exerted in his glorious resurrection, is also brought into like requisition to the regeneration of mankind and quickening them together with Christ, and raising them up together with him in heavenly places. But to the proof.—"Therefore after I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints, cease not to give thanks for you making mention of you in my prayers. That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the Spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him. The eyes of your understanding being enlightened, that ye may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of his glory, of the inheritance of the saints. And what is the exceeding greatness of his power to usward who believe accolding to the working of his mighty power which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead and set him at his own right hand in the heavenlies." And then the apostle proceeds addressing the saints at Ephesus, "You hath he quickened .... together with Christ .... and hath raised us up together and made us sit together in the heavenlies in Christ Jesus," etc. Eph. i. 15-20; ii. 5, 6.

Here we see God doth accomplish this work, not himself personally, (although from the simple reading of it some may understand it in that sense) but through the agency of the Holy Ghost, as we read, "How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the Eternal Spirit offered himself without spot unto God," etc. It was by and through this he offered himself. It was through this he was resurrected as the apostle affirms,—concerning his Son Jesus Christ which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh. And declared to be the Son of God with power according to (or through) the Spirit of holiness by the resurrection from the dead. Rom. i. 4; Heb. ix. 14. These facts staring us in the face, we cannot fail to attach the most supreme importance to the work of the Spirit. It enlightens, reproves, admonishes, convinces, convicts, leads the sinner to see his sinfulness before God. It washes, cleanseth from sin, justifies, sanctifies and finally glorifies. Again, it renews, it begets, regenerates, assimilates the soul unto the likeness of the image of him who promised its procession from the Father, it is that sublime agency which accomplishes the New Birth in Christ Jesus as he repeatedly and most solemnly avers. "Verily, verily I say unto thee, except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God," and it is that agency which will ultimately in the last day change these mortal bodies into incorruptible and immortal ones ever glorious like the shining body of Christ the glorified one, agreeably to inspired teachings. "But if the Spirit of him that raised up Christ from the dead, dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal bodies (how?) by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." Rom. viii. 11.

Again, it puts the cry into our hearts "Abba Father," it seals us which is the perishing stroke of its work, upon us anterior to the resurrection in the glorious Epiphany of the Redeemer. It is through this alone that we obtain "The earnest (or pledge) of our inheritance." As the apostle informs, "Now he which establishes us with you in Christ and hath anointed us is God," who hath sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts. "After that ye believed ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession." 2 Cor. i. 22; Eph. i. 13, 14. It is also a blessed Comforter to the church, a true Voucher, or Vicegerent, and acts as our Advocate with Christ who is the greater Advocate until he return to earth in glory. "And I will pray the Father and he shall give you another Comforter (or Advocate) that he may abide with you forever, even the Spirit of truth." John xiv. 16. (Observe the Spirit of truth i. e. the word). But notwithstanding all the work here attributed to it, the inconceivable greatness of its work yet remains to be accomplished; the master stroke of its irresistible energy yet is left for scenes in the sublime future to be signally displayed in the regeneration of a world, in the complete removal of the cause of sin and the final restoration of this fallen planet to its primal state and more than original splendor, for as the earth in the beginning was "without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep, and the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters."

In obedience to the divine mandate transforming darkness into light, deformity into beauty, disorder into harmony, constructing from the chaotic and conglomerated mass a beautiful world of untold delights of infinite variety to please and gratify those in happy innocence and sustained purity. So again will that Omnipotent Spirit of the the living God, or Holy Ghost, move in its mighty pulsations in the appointed time upon the face of the waters of this sin-cursed and diseased world—this chaotic mass of ruin and woe, and death, in consequence of sin. So will it move in the magnetic power to restore that which was lost, when the present heavens and earth (or economy) will pass away with a great noise amid the thunders of the last days, and the elements of the old and decayed system will be melted down with fervent heat, and a new heavens and a new earth will be the glorious outcome wherein shall ever dwell righteousness, truth, and peace. When the morning stars again as at the first will resume their songs of joy together and all the sons of God, and the angels of heaven will quitedly shout aloud for joy.

"Then let this present system end,
The ruinous earth and skies;
The new Jerusalem descend,
The new creation rise."

And this we find as hinted at in Psa. civ. "Thou sendeth forth thy Spirit, they are created; and thou renewest (or restorest) the face of the earth. The glory of the Lord shall endure forever; the Lord shall rejoice in his works. The sending forth of his Spirit here and renewing the face of the earth, we find synchronizes with the time when he looketh on the earth and it is represented as trembling, his touching the hills and they smoke, and sinners are being consumed out of the earth and the wicked annihilated.

A few more words under this head. Some would confine the Spirit's work to the apostle age, affirming that when the Christian church became fully inaugurated, and the last words of the holy inspiration were penned, that the Spirit's work was finished, its mission was fully accomplished. But from such an opinion which we conceive to be a serious error we must dissent, and do contend being amply supported by divine testimony, that the Spirit's work in its immediate action and influence upon the church does not cease, but its action runs parallel with the preaching of the Word to the end. The promise "lo, I am with you alway even unto the end of the world," has an "Amen" to it which means "even so." The Savior here meant the Holy Ghost which he promised to send, which should remain with the church, until he come again. So that his work is a continuous and uninterrupted work, even until the last sinner is brought into the saving fold of Christ, until the last saint is sealed for eternal glory, as far as it appertains to this age.

It was necessary that the early church should need the immediate influence of the Holy Ghost that she should "be filled with the indwelling of the Spirit, that God should dwell in her, and walk in her, that her members collectively should form "a habitation of God through the Spirit," that she might "walk in the comfort of the Holy Ghost." And that her ministry should should not only be good men, eloquent, and mighty in the Scriptures; men having clear eyesight in reference to divine things; men full of faith, but also endowed with the Spirit's power, "full of the Holy Ghost." See Acts ii. 3; v. 32; Eph. iii. 16; Rom. viii. 11-27; 2 Cor. vi. 16; Eph. ii. 22; Acts ix. 3; xi. 24; xviii. 21; ix. 17, 18; vi. 5.

In order to preach the Word effectually and with holy and humble boldness the Spirit's aid is indispensible. See Acts iv. 31; vii. 55; xi. 15, 24; xiii. 9, 11. Yes, when the church is perfected in Christ, when "we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, with a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ" unto the "dispensation of the fullness of the times when God shall gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are in earth," and the church is presented "faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy," until then the Spirit's work will not cease. Eph. iv. 10-13; i. 10; Matt. xviii. 20; xxviii. 20; Jude ver. 24. We might have adduced a host of passages more in addition to the array already offered touching the work of the Spirit, and the fact that there will be no cessation of his work so long as there remains one sinner to be saved, so long as there is a saint yet to be made perfect in Christ Jesus. But let it suffice under this head, only that the divine blessing of which we have been treating here may be added in the conferment of the gift of the Holy Ghost and work upon us. Amen.

WILLIAM SHEPHERD.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Editor Restitution, and My Dear Brethren in "the Faith":—I came across the following extracts from Prophetical Landmarks, by Horatio Bonar, written out by Col. W. H. Larkins, which I find very pertinent and I think may be of interest to others of like faith as myself:

1. Israel's history, past and future, occupies no narrow region in God's written Word. Besides, the prophecies concerning Israel are a key to the rest. A large class of expositors are setting themselves against the literal application of the prophecies to Israel; even some who preach the near advent of our Lord, and hold fast literally, in so far as that is concerned, make no scruple to spiritualize all that the prophets have forespoken concerning the children of Abraham in the flesh. (Page 272).

2. None maintains that all Scripture is literal or that all is figurative. The literal, then, is the rule, and the figurative the exception. (P. 275).

3. In all cases we are bound to adhere to the literal unless we can show reasons for departing from it.

4. A literal fulfillment is often just as spiritual as any others, and it is a misapprehension of the true scope of Scripture to suppose that because some interpret literally, therefore they do not interpret spiritually. (P. 277).

5. We have no objection to the spiritual provided the literal is found untenable. (P. 278).

6. But till it be found so, we shall continue to hold it. And all we ask is, that such a spiritual application be founded on a literal application. (P. 279).

8. They do not. They believe that Israel will not only be converted, but that they will be restored to their own land. (P. 280).

9. We must take for granted that the literal is the true and the sole meaning till we can give some reason for departing from it. In so far as prophecy has been already fulfilled, it has been a literal one. Take the predictions regarding the Messiah. (P. 294). Take again the prophecies which concern Babylon, Nineveh, Tyre, Moab, Ammon, Edom, Egypt, or, lastly take the predictions regarding Israel. Have not all these been literally verified? And shall the curse pronounced on them (Israel) be fulfilled to the very letter, and not the blessings? (P. 295).

10. The expression "The Throne of David" often occurs in prophecy, and it is difficult to understand what the spiritualizing exponents make of it. It must at least mean the sovereignty of the Messiah over the literal Israel, (p. 297), and has reference to the peculiar exercise of His dominion over the nations of Israel, (p. 298), and one passage appears to me very strongly in favor of the literal view. "Lord, wilt thou, at this time, restore the kingdom to Israel?" Acts i. 2. (P. 299).

11. Again, the expression "Israel of God" (Gal. vi. 16) has been generally interpreted as meaning spiritual Israel. I should be inclined to suggest that the apostle may really be speaking of the literal Israel. (P. 304).

12. Literal fulfillment in the New Testament rule. That since Christ and his apostles quoted and interpreted literally, we ought to do the same. (P. 305).

13. There is no authority in the New Testament for spiritualizing the names Judah, Israel, Jerusalem, Zion. (P. 310).

14. Jerusalem occurs eighty times in it, all of them unquestionably literally; Jew above one hundred times, and only four are even ambiguous, as in Rom. ii. 28; Israel and Israelite above forty times, and all literal; Judah and Judea above twenty times, and all literal. (P. 309).

15. In those prophecies which preserve the well-known distinction between Judah and Israel or Judah and Ephraim, we must interpret Israel, Zion, etc., literally of the Jewish nation, or church, or land. (P. 318).

16. When the unfulfilled prophecy is the carrying on or conclusion of one chain, the first part of which has been literally fulfilled or is fulfilling; if in the first part Israel just means Israel, of course in the latter, and onward to the end, it just must mean the same. See Jer. xxx., xxxi. (P. 319).

17. Make Zion or Israel to mean the church of Christ and whole chapters of the prophets are one mass of confusion. (P. 318).

18. When reference is made to their Egyptian bondage, or the captivities, in the beginning of a prophecy, the conclusion of it must concern literal Israel, and refer to a literal deliverance. (P. 320).

19. When God says he will set his hand a second time to recover the remnant of his people, it must be literal Israel that is meant, and a literal restoration foretold. (P. 320).

20. In such cases we do not see how a figurative interpretation can for a moment stand. Where one verse plainly foretells their restoration to their own land, and the next their spiritual conversion to God, it seems to us a perversion and confusion of all language to say that both mean the same thing, as, for instance in Ezekiel's prophecy (xxxvi. 24-28) regarding the blessings to be poured out on Israel in the latter days. (P. 321).

21. Concerning the new covenant to be made with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah (Heb. viii. 8), it has been argued that because this is the New Testament covenant that therefore Judah and Israel must mean the church of Christ! (P. 323). As well might it be argued that when the prophet speaks of the promise to Abraham regarding the blessings which were to flow to him and to his seed through the coming Savior, Abraham did not mean Abraham, but the church of Christ. The apostle had been speaking of the old covenant made with Israel at Mount Sinai, and he comes to show that all this was to be abolished, and in its place a new covenant was to be made with that Israel with whom the former had been made, which was done away in Christ. This was his object, and the drift of his argument, if literally understood. (P. 326).

22. It was in the first place with literal Israel that this new covenant was to be made, and so we find it to have been. Messiah when he came "confirmed the covenant with many for one week." Dan. ix. 27. He confined his own ministry to the Jews. He commanded his first apostles to do the same, and in his last commission to them he told them yet to begin at Jerusalem. (P. 327).

23. Such passages have been misinterpreted, and furnish no ground for that spiritualizing application of the prophecies to the church of Christ, on which many dwell. One would imagine, from the eagerness manifested in endeavoring to wrest such promises from the literal Israel, that the hope of a Gentile depended upon his being able to show that such predictions did really and primarily concern himself. Alas for us, if our salvation rests upon our being able to show that Israel in prophecy means the church of Christ! What Gentile sinner could ever venture to build upon a hope so insecure? We have promises of our own innumerable, promises stable as the everlasting hills, and radiant as the everlasting stars, which secure to us all the unsearchable riches of Christ. And besides, we have, in another and more honest way, all Israel's blessings. They are not blessings conferred to Israel, just as Abraham's were not conferred to him, though promised more directly to him and to his seed, according to the flesh. There is not one promise made to Judah from which we may not extract blessings to ourselves. And if in Israel's promises we learn more of our Father's love, and know that Israel's God is our God too, then we can thus feed more upon the riches of his grace, and can say, "It is enough." (PP. 328, 329).

From my humble position, what I may say can add nothing to the force of the conclusions in the above; but my heart is in harmony with the positions taken, and I am looking and constantly watching for the dawn of the glorious day, when the King shall rule in righteousness and the nations shall know that the Lord has sanctified Israel when his sanctuary is in the midst of them forever more; and my prayer is that he may come quickly, gather his bride, and return to the Mount of Olives to set up his kingdom which shall stand forever. I hope to meet with all the faithful in the glorious immortalized Royal "Household" of "God" in the "city of the Great King."

Your brother in Christ,

Editor Restitution:—For the information of those interested will you please publish the fact that the church in Philadelphia has removed from 8th and Locust streets to the N. W. corner of 13th and Arch streets, where any brethren or friends will be welcome? It gives me pleasure to state that our little society is in a prosperous and healthy condition. We are entirely free from "cranks" and "isms," and the spirit of intolerance that has done so much to shatter the church, and I trust that the spirit of mutual love and forbearance which pervades the brethren may continue until our Lord shall come. It was our pleasure a few weeks ago to assist four young friends to put on Christ through the waters of baptism—Edward Melville, Carrie Work, Minnie Dull and Emma Lawton.

Brother H. V. Reed has been with us for the last four or five weeks, and to those who know him it is needless to say that his visit has been to us all a source of great pleasure; and on his return to the west he has the assurance that he has made many new friends, and carries with him the love and esteem of all with whom he has come in contact. We are in hopes, however, that we may have him here again shortly, not as a visitor, but as a resident; as an invitation has been extended to him to make this "city of Brotherly Love" his future home, which we have reason to believe has been favorably received. There is great need here in the east for the labor of some man of ability and tact, and we know no man who is so well calculated for labor in this particular field as Brother Reed; and should he and Sister Reed conclude to make their home with us we can assure them a hearty welcome and cordial support, and we have every confidence that the cause of Christ would be advanced.

Sincerely,

SAMUEL WILSON.

Editor Restitution:—I write you a few lines that you and the brethren may know the prospects at Hamlet. Brother H. R. Carter commenced preaching on the night of April 17th, and continued preaching until he had delivered thirteen sermons, meanwhile, on April 22d, we organized a church of thirteen members, with Brother H. Roberts, elder; and, since that time there has nine more united with the Church of God at Hamlet, Ind.

Yours in the One Faith,

JOHN A. ROOSE.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Practical Christianity.—No. 4.

And Moses said to the whosoever shall not be offended in me. Matt. xi.; Luke vii.

Important and burning words of truth, they increase in weight an hundred fold, when we consider their origin coming from him who spake as never man spake, and taught as never man taught; he who uttered these words was the Christ, the anointed of God, to redeem man and restore the fallen planet, earth, to its allegiance to the God of heaven from which it had revolted and fallen. Stupendous and most magnificent scheme! What! to raise man from his low degradation into which he has fallen, he who was made in the image and likeness of the God of heaven, but now degraded to a level with the brute creation to again become the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty; eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive the thing that God hath prepared for them that love him, it cannot be expected that we, with our dwarfed intellect, our dark vision, (for we see through a glass darkly only in part) can set forth God's wonderful works in their grand sublimity as we shall realize them when fully restored to the image and likeness of him who created us.

It is our privilege to contemplate, to study, to wonder and to adore, to watch, to patiently wait, and fervently pray for God's kingdom to come and his will to be done on earth as it is done in heaven. This indeed is a great privilege; will we improve it? will we accept the situation? will we comply with the condition and abide our time, and not be offended in Christ? There is a wide difference amongst religionists who are and who are not in Christ. This point we shall try to settle by the unerring word of truth.

He that hath my word let him speak my word faithfully. If they speak not according to this word its because there is no light in them—Bible.

To the readers of THE RESTITUTION we need not say one word about the first principles of Bible Christianity, or how men are made, or become Christians; there has been so much said and written upon it, that it has become as familiar as a, b, c; but to the new readers, and those outside of the body, we have to repeat and give them line upon line. It is not a hobby nor do we own up that we cannot talk or write upon other subjects, but the most fatal mistake lies at the starting point, or in laying the foundation on the rock Christ Jesus; nor do we admit that there need be any mistake in laying well the foundation. The word is so plain that men, though fools in other things, need not mistake or err therein. If some one of our half brethren would take up the stumbling blocks out of the way of poor perishing men and women, the light would shine less obscure, and we should not be met with the hackneyed excuse Oh there's Bro. John and brother many more, they were baptized away back in the dark ages of the sectarian churches when they believed in a sky kingdom; the flying off to heaven at death, that the church was the kingdom; and that man had an immortal soul in him, that was the man proper, and at death it took its flight to regions beyond the bounds of time and space. Don't tell an intelligent Bible reader that men believing such a conglomeration of unintelligible jargon could have any clear conception of the Gospel of the kingdom of God, or its requirements, in order to an obedient faith.

The Scriptures are good for every thing, or they are good for nothing. If we did not understand their requirements when we were baptized, no matter how sincere we were, or if we ran into and preach with the eloquence of Paul or Appolos our baptism is not valid, and we are or all such the most to be commiserated—intelligence, honesty and sincerity, and are very different things; let us individually settle.

a. What did you believe? Oh I did not have any belief, I was sprinkled when I was a baby. What is your faith now? I believe that Spirit is the essential baptism: that water baptism is to be understood in an accommodative sense—one way just as good as the other, or none at all, if he is only a Christian he will go to heaven sure.

b. Please tell the brother of the Abrahamic faith what was your belief? Oh I was a full believer in the doctrines held by the Baptist church; I need not state them, you have named them in the foregoing.

I understood just enough to induce obedience. Very good for a and b. Come, Bro. C., please enlighten the brotherhood; you claim to be one of the first believers of the one faith. Oh I was so ignorant I did not know what a Millerite was. I thought they were men that built mills! Astounding intelligence!! And yet he could say to Bro. W., Oh I perceive you don't understand the Gospel. We might name a score of like cases, but we forbear. To be in Christ intelligently, honestly and Scripturally and remain in him, and not be offended in him is blessed indeed; yea, it is above and beyond all estimate or calculation.

"Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me."

The word "offend" is used in a very broad sense. We cannot give a tithe of the things that come within its meaning; to use it in its largest latitude would be to apply it to every body and every thing that does not accept Christ as the first and last, or the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end; touching the creation, the redemption, and the perpetuity of the world, and the race of men that inhabit it. In a definite sense, it applies to those who are in him, who are offended because of persecution and trial, because of the straightness of the way they go back and walk no more with him. It were better for such had they never been born. Most graphically does the apostles speak of such; they return like the dog to his vomit, and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire. Paul says it is impossible to again renew such unto repentance, seeing they crucify the Son of God afresh and put him to an open shame. What fearful words!!! It applies to those who are nominally in him, who belong to the body but make his cause and his truth a secondary matter; they will assent to everything, and do some things for Christ after they have served themselves.

Yes, they must get rich, even at the sacrifice of the truth, and the suffering cause of Christ. How fearful the word of Paul; "They that will be rich fall into temptation, and into a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition!" Careful observation shows that those who get riches suddenly do not get them honestly. By what rule shall we judge, for the church—the law of Christ? Cæsar will take care of his own household.

NEWELL BOND.

The Sum.

The heading—The chief point—The argument—of all that we have spoken is that we have such an High Priest. Heb. viii. 1-13.

He, Jesus, is such an High Priest as is described and illustrated in the foregoing chapters of this epistle. Nay, further, he is such an High Priest as is taught and inwrought into the primary structure of the ancient Scriptures,—in the Law, the Psalms and the Prophets. It is as the foundation and "head-stone" of the gospel system. Gen. xiv. 18-20; Isa. ch. i. 1; Zech. iv. 7; vi. 13; Matt. xxii. 44; Heb. v. to vii.

It is to the gospel as the head to the body—as the sun to the whole account—because it ensures and enforces the whole.

Hence, "he is such an High Priest as became us." Such an one as is essential to the crowning consummation of God's all comprehending purpose. Eph. i. 10.

He is higher and in advance of the Aaronic priesthood in the sanctuary of Israel in the wilderness, as the heavens are higher than the earth! That was circumscribed to Israel and the land of promise till Christ the seed should come. Gal. iii. This belongs to the heavens. It is supreme—like "God over all and blessed forever."

It is not limited to man and earth, but in its loftier range it embraces "angels, principalities and powers in the heavenly places!" Furthermore, to express its boundless amplitude to our feeble apprehension, we should notice that our gospel age is, itself, but the outcome of the clustered types of the one anniversary—"day of atonement." It is the perfection of the church of the first-born. It is the antitypical atonement for Israel, John vi. 51; and beyond all this, it comprehends the full measure of divine promise to the whole creation. Rom. viii. 21; Eph. i. 10. When the sum of all is will be answered; when earth will have become the counterpart of heaven, and "God be all in all"—the recognized source of all good to all the universe—then "the God of peace" will have abiding and universal peace forever.

"Now of the things we have spoken, this is the sum." What, then, are its correlatives—its essential though subordinate results?

1. Those who believe, become allied to this heavenly system of which Christ is the head. He is "the Son," and they are through grace, constituted a joint-sonship. Rom. viii. 14-23.

2. His all perfect one offering, hath forever perfected them that are sanctified. Heb. x. 12-22. It is a sovereign policy in grace!

3. His intercession avails for them, each and all, as it did for Peter and the apostles, and all who believe in him through their word." Luke xxii. 32; John xvii.

4. His resurrection as "the head of the body"—the church—assures the resurrection and glory of all its members. 1 Cor. xv. 12, 13. "The first-fruits" is the pledge and pattern of "the harvest."

5. His inheritance is theirs, as the Bride takes the name and home and patrimony of the Bridegroom. Eph. v. 32; Rev. xix. 7-9.

6. His reign of power and glory—to restore and to bless—is theirs; "for it is the Father's good pleasure to give them the kingdom." They reign with him. Luke xii. 32; Rev. xx. 5, 6.

7. Thus, his sovereign destiny, in all its correlations of glory, wealth, wisdom and power will be theirs for the millennial age, and "the age of ages." Amen. Rev. xx.; Dan. vii. 18 and 27; Eph. iii. 21.

Then, subordinate to all these honors and glories of "the first-born—the called, the chosen and the faithful"—we have "the new covenant with Israel and Judah"—the unrulled remnant of the Gentiles, and a rescued creation, all reconstituted under Christ and his co-heirs in the kingdom. Isa. xxv. 6-8; Rom. viii. 14-21; Eph. i. 10.

The bloom and beauty, the freshness and fragrance, the new life and verdure of earth, with its promise of a bounteous harvest, demonstrate still the goodness of God to his creatures in our present sinful and perishing state. How much more will he do for man and earth restored? Then all material and moral grandeur, all created and divine perfection, will combine to show how good the creature will be that God will take pleasure in! Then earth will have become the counterpart of heaven! Matt. vi. 10.

IN FEAR OF THE DEVIL.

The Papal journals at Rome are loud in their protests against the operations of the colporteurs. They complain that men walk about the streets supplying the people with Bibles at a nominal price, and that these Bibles are not only purchased, but read. It reminds us of the agitation Demetrius the silversmith excited among his fellow-craftsmen in Ephesus when the preaching of Paul their "craft was in danger of being set at naught." Acts xix. 27-28.

SELECTIONS.

The Investigator

"Death Is No Punishment."

When "death," the threatened penalty of sin, is explained by us to mean literal ending of life, judicial excision from conscious being, men are wont to reply, "That is no punishment;" or in words to the same effect. Our own experience hardly warrants us to pronounce it a sinner's objection, rather is it one common with those who fear God, and are anxious that no excuse should be furnished to the unsaved for continuing in their perilous state. The temper in which the objection is advanced is not always commendable; but, overlooking that, knowing how much forbearance is needed by ourselves, we frankly concede that piety and a regard for what they reckon the supreme interests of the unconverted, is at the bottom of their opposition to doctrines advocated in journals like the one in which this article appears. Such being the case, we prize the opportunity, though created by our will, of reasoning with them in a brotherly style. Indeed, there is something in their attitude that rather excites our admiration. We are thankful for all who earnestly resist whatever in their eyes appears calculated to lessen the power of religion, and to mar the success of gospel efforts. In a word, we are bound to give them credit for sincerity, and it is a pleasure to do so.

But then we naturally expect, as a matter of justice and charity, that a similar extension of credit should be yielded to ourselves. We also are inspired with an abiding concern for the stability of religion, and the salvation of our neighbors. Do our opponents wish us to be silent because we differ from them? Might we not as fairly ask them to be silent because they differ from us? Do they expect us to make confession of insincerity when we are conscious of loyalty to Christ, or that having framed, as they likely imagine we have done, a theory of our own, we are resolved to urge it on the acceptance of others, whatever harm may result to the cause of truth and the interests of the Redeemer? Suppose we should place them exactly in the same position, and charge them with similar inconsideration, would they like to be so treated, so shamefully misrepresented? We are willing to hear them, let them be willing to hear us. We have a common guide—the Bible—and only arguments drawn from its pages can uphold our faith. Dictation on either side of a grave dispute is inadmissible. We plead, we offer proof, we entreat them to examine the ground they occupy, and, having pursued this course we feel that our duty is done.

In the spirit of the lines just written, we now return to the objection. And the first thing we have to remark is, we do not understand our opponents to maintain that it is improper to include death among the punishments, whether inflicted by injustice, human or divine. We are pretty certain "Death is no punishment!"—cannot really mean what the exclamation seems to express. For, if life is a boon from heaven, it must be a punishment, yea a sore punishment, to be deprived of it because of guilt. Man, savage or civilized, admits this. Governments recognize the fact and the persuasion when they appoint death to be the capital, the great, infliction; and almost everywhere it is the award of treason, murder, and military disobedience, in certain circumstances. Life is sweet, and every breathing creature recoils from death as a dreadful evil. All our self-preserving instincts rise full-armed to resist its approach. Nature is stronger than theology. And, if life is a valued possession, and if immortal life would be an unspeakable inheritance, to be cut off utterly, violently, and for ever from existence would be a real, and verily, an awful retribution.

Much of the difficulty, we venture to suggest, which perhaps some experience in considering death, and death prolonged for ever, as a punishment, arises from the habit of regarding punishment as equal to, or as necessarily involving anguish, varying in the degrees of its intensity. But punishment is a generic or class word, and embraces several kinds of retributive infliction that involve pain, and at least one the chief form of punishment—Death, which as used, disqualifies a man for enduring pain, as for enjoying happiness. While a man is able to feel one pang, common sense teaches us that he is not dead. So that, were one put to death for transgression, that is a punishment to him, however long he may remain in the insensible condition; if for a year, it is punishment to last for a year; if he is never to be recalled by a resurrection to life, or conscious existence, his punishment is one to last for ever. To be dead, therefore, is to be beyond, or incapable of, consciousness. If he were ordained to suffer for twelve months, or during eternity, he would be aware of the fact he is undergoing punishment while his sufferings continue, since he could not suffer without knowing it. But if he is to die, and remain dead, or out of existence, for twelve months, or during all future time, he cannot know, as the living acquainted with his fate would know, that he is punished, inasmuch as to be numbered with the dead is to be incapable of consciousness, or of understanding this,—that he is beyond consciousness. And yet he is punished, though perfectly unable to realize his penal doom while it remains on him, or so long as he continues as if he "had never been," which is simply death otherwise expressed.

Rather we conjecture the objection to mean,—Death is not to be spoken of as a punishment, compared to another once more adapted to show God's hatred of sin, and to urge men in quest of mercy whilst it is to be found. That other is the inconceivable horror of unending misery, which has been taught for ages throughout all the provinces of Christendom. Now, we hold, and few of our thoughtful opposing friends will differ from us in this, that death eternal is punishment; we also admit, along with the same friends, that hopeless misery is punishment, and assuredly a much more terrible kind of it; but suppose that, after comparing the two, we make a preference, what bearing would our selection have on the actual arrangement? For us the proper question is, not which of the two, the Eternal King ought to have chosen, but which of them has he chosen; in other words, what has he threatened? Choice in the matter we have none. God alone fixes the penalty of sin. Being infinitely just, kind and wise, he is absolutely qualified to determine what is the direst award for human transgression, meaning thereby the one calculated most effectually to establish his authority over his subjects, and to impel men towards his Son, who is presented as the only Deliverer to the world. What has God threatened? therefore, bounds and ends the enquiry. Be it interminable woe,—where is that, we beg to ask, thundered, except from the creeds and the pages of theology, in the ears of sinners? The Bible contains no such alarms. Its language is exactly the reverse. The wicked, it affirms, are to die, not to live; to perish, not to be preserved. "The end of these things is death!" Who, if he meant to express a condition of pain, would select the word death, which is the negation of suffering? Suffering is a state of life, death is the cessation of life. When a poor agonized fellow-creature is dead, don't we mean the storm is over—that he is out of pain? The Bible was not intended to mislead those to whom it is delivered; but if the common notion of future punishment was true, it might be successfully maintained against all comers, that the sacred volume, out of which our opponents have extracted a secret concerning God's threatenings and judgments we cannot reach, is of all books the most deceptive. Why so? Because it employs the words "death" and "destruction" and "perdition," when describing the end of impenitent human beings, in a sense the very opposite of the ordinary and universal meaning of these terms, and never once tells us that they are used in such a singular way throughout its pages.

When "death"—death in "the Lake of Fire," is the penalty, we may be confident that it is the most appropriate form of vengeance; and in preaching it as "the wages of sin"—as the result of wilfully and persistently rejecting Him who is the Divine Life Giver, we shall best unfold the character of God, as the All-Merciful and the All-Just, and move men by a calming terror to lay hold on the hope set before them in the Gospel. The popular "hell" is a failure, as it could only turn out. It is time once more to try Heaven's own plan, and better, far better, results may in reason be expected. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." John iii. 16.

SENTENTIOUS PARAGRAPHS.

English Proverb: Forgiveness and a smile are the best revenge.

When the darkest hour came to our Lord, he went to his father in prayer. His disciples can do no better than to follow his example.

He that seeks the Lord with the heart, shall find the Lord to the joy of his heart: "He that seeketh, findeth."

I often wonder, as with trembling hand
I cast the seed along the furrowed ground,
If ripened fruit for God will there be found;
But I can trust.

Outward good things are no sign of God's special love. The sun of prosperity shines upon the brambles of the wilderness, as well as upon the flowers of the garden; and the rain falls upon the just and the unjust.

Sometimes the black storms of trouble blot out the bright stars from the sky of enjoyment, and then the faint heart feels the blackness of darkness overwhelming it; but just then the Savior rebukes the wind and bids the waters be still, and faint heart startsanew on its journey to the celestial city.

Hark! the tidings,—"Christ is coming
Rise, prepare his feet a way;
Let your lamps be trimmed and burning,
Gird your loins to watch and pray."

Perhaps nothing proves so certainly how we are related to the unseen world as our prayers. If they be tedious and irksome, cold and tasteless, it is a sure proof that our delight is not in God, and that we love him chiefly, if not only, in the reason; that we are living, if not lives of sense, at least of intellect and imagination, rather than of the will. So long as we are in this state, however much this world may lose its hold upon us, the next has not as yet won our hearts.—Dr. Manning.

BEYOND.

Never a word is said,
But it trembles in the air,
And the truant voice has sped,
To vibrate everywhere;
And perhaps far off in eternal years
The echo may ring upon our ears.

Never are kind acts done
To wipe the weeping eye,
But like flashes of the sun,
They signal to the skies;
And up above the angels read
How we have helped the sorer need.

In due time the light which is sown for the righteous, and the gladness which is sown for the upright in heart, shall spring up, and they shall reap the harvest. If this life be the seed-time of the future, how can I expect to reap in another world other than I have been sowing here? How can I trust to be saved then, unless the seed of salvation be growing in my soul now? How can I hope for eternal life unless the earnest be begun here.

"Sown in the darkness or sown in the light;
Sown in our weakness or sown in our might;
Gathered in time or eternity,
Sure, oh, sure will the harvest be."

UNUSED TALENT.

Did you ever find lying in some neglected spot, buried among the grass, perhaps, some old tool, which you remember sharp and bright and useful, but now covered with rust and useless? The rust and the dull edge have come of its long rest. Had it been constantly used, it might have been broken, but it never would have been that dull, useless thing while it lasted. It is just so with human beings. Inaction is worse for them than hard work. Unused talents rust. The mind that is never sharpened grows dull. One who has not done what he might, finds his power gone at last. Sometimes, when mind lies useless and hands are folded, the soul rusts also.

A Card to the Brethren.

Having accepted the invitation of the brethren in Henderson county, Kentucky, to labor with them in the word and doctrine in a series of meetings, covering the first two weeks of the ensuing month of July, 1880, the undersigned will be able, if the Lord will, to respond to the wishes of the household of faith in the adjoining regions, in the like employment, in the last half of July, and early in August, on the single condition of the brethren who may desire his services, being at charges with him, in defraying his traveling expenses to and fro.

Letters on the subject may be addressed to me at Stephens City, Frederick county, Va., until the 27th of June, after that, at Henderson, Kentucky, care of Paul A. Blackwell.

Bro. Wiley Jones, of Norfolk, Va., will, I hope, be with me in Henderson, but I do not know as to his subsequent movements.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. L. OHLER, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, MAY 26, 1880.

CALLS from home, and a pressure of business, have compelled some delay in attending to certain requests. Hope to have more time at our disposal in a few days.

HOPE to have some news from Jerusalem before long. A special agent has gone to explore the present condition of affairs in Palestine, under the auspices of Eastern brethren and friends. We shall make every effort to keep our readers fully posted on Eastern affairs.

ACCORDING to our notice last week we went to Pierceton on Saturday last, and preached three discourses; one on Saturday evening, and two on Sunday. After the morning discourse on Sunday we repaired to the water and baptized Bro. J. McGonegal and wife. The Methodist friends kindly gave us the use of their house of worship, on Saturday evening and Sunday 4 p. m.

Things That Must Shortly Come to Pass.

Among the sublime events of the near future there are two that press themselves upon our attention. The first of these events is graphically described by the Apostle Paul, in his comforting words to his bereaved Thessalonian brethren—1 Thess. iv. 16, 17—in this language: "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." For distinction's sake we will term the first event

THE RAPTURE.

In the language of an able author, R. A. Purden, this event is thus delineated:

"The second coming of the Lord is divided, as we have often said, into two stages. He first descends from the highest heavens into the 'air,' and there he continues for a length of time amounting perhaps to several years. After a certain number of years he descends from the air into the earth, and his feet shall stand upon the [illegible] on the east. 1 Thess. iv. 16; Zech. xiv. 4.

"The word 'air,' which is used by St. Paul in the Thessalonians, need not be understood of the atmosphere of our earth. The earth's atmosphere, made up of a respirable fluid, reaches hardly fifty miles above the surface. It need not be supposed that the Lord will approach so near the earth at the first stage of his descent. Science has proved that there is a thin and imperceptible fluid which spreads out through the whole region of the stars; so fine that it cannot even absorb the light which travels from the sun to the earth, 100,000,000 of miles, and producing no effect except upon the light of the stars, after a progress of millions of millions of miles. Yet this refined fluid is 'air' as strictly as our own atmosphere.

"It is no more than a kind of atmospheric air infinitely rarefied. But it is not, we may suppose, the atmosphere of the highest heavens; consequently, when the Lord descends from the highest heavens toward the earth, he is described as descending into the 'air'—although it may not be the 'air' of our earth, but the 'air' of the STELLAR universe—and his distance from our world may be even then as great as the distance of one of the stars, though less than that of the heaven of heavens.

"St. Paul tells us in 1 Thessalonians iv. 16 what is to occur when the Lord descends into the air. 'The dead in Christ shall rise first: then we who are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord.' At the first moment of the Lord's descent the departed saints shall rise from the grave. By some secret power their bodies shall be extracted from the dust and raised up again more alive than ever.

"We need not necessarily suppose any disruption of the grave—any mark left upon the surface of the ground—to indicate that the resurrection has taken place. The grass may grow, the tombstone may remain undisturbed, yet the body which lay beneath may have risen again. The world at large may be unconscious of any resurrection. 'Here lieth the body' may be engraven upon the tomb, when that body may be far away among the stars. Divine Power may work its miracles without deigning to admit the ungodly to its councils. The dead bodies of the saints may pass from the scene of death as invisibly as an exhalation from the sea under the power of the mid-day sun.

"'The dead in Christ shall rise first.' From this we conclude that all the departed saints shall rise at the first resurrection, which is therefore called the resurrection of the just. But only 144,000 living saints, who are watching for, and believing in, the speedy personal coming and reign of Christ, will be caught up in this first translation or removal of saints to heaven. Other unwatchful though real Christians will be left behind to pass through the [illegible] years' great tribulation. Rev. iii. 14-22, xii. 6-17, xiii. 5-7, xvi. 12. And [illegible] close they will, together with numerous additional converts, be caught up to heaven in the second translation, just before the marriage of the Lamb," Rev. xix. 7; vii. 9-17; xiv. 16; Matt. xxiv. 31.

When that day of God, that ushers in a new dispensation, dawns upon the world, tens of thousands will be missing—vanished from the living multitudes in a most mysterious manner—one taken and another left! In the companionship of labor two are working in the field—when suddenly one vanishes forever, leaving the unsaved Christless sharer of his toils in many bewilderment. Two slumber side by side in the same bed—the new life electrifies one into deathless incorruptibility, and an angel escorts the transformed saint to the presence chamber of the King. Of the two women grinding at the mill, the daughter of the Lord Almighty is all at once missing from the sight of the one whose heart and hopes were anchored in earth. So silent, so secret, and so lightning-like quick was the translation as to be imperceptible to human senses. What the speculations of the world may be regarding this "extraordinary disappearance" or how the "unaccountable mystery" may be discussed, we can only surmise. But the removal of the saints from the earth, whether sleeping or waking; whether in one or more translations, is preparatory to the second grand event which we may distinguish as

THE MARRIAGE OF THE LAMB.

We give the description in the eloquent language of another:

"When the marriage of the Lamb takes place, the marriage is in heaven, not upon earth. Far above in the azure sky, in the golden fields, in the soft and lovely light from the face of God, above the blood-stained earth, above the sun itself, in the pure unsullied air, the marriage of the Lamb takes place. Above the thick, black smoke of apostate Christendom, above the ruins of all human pride, above the eagle's flight and the terrific mountain cliffs, the saints in their glorious bodies shall stand in unimpaired serenity.

"They have no fear of death; they are no longer affected by material laws; the elements have no power over their bodies; to them it will be as natural to rise as it is to us to fall. As the Bride of the Lamb they are gifted with his attributes—glory, immortality, and light. With the purity and swiftness of the sunbeams, will the force of lightning, with an inward spirit as perfect as the body, they stand in the centre of celestial life, the brightest, choicest of that world of brightness. Angels themselves must give precedence to the Bride, and yield up to her the inmost circle around the throne. There in the place of honor in heaven stands the church before the throne of the Lamb, as a Bride standing at the altar.

"Taking the multitude of which the church or Bride is composed, God then takes in his hand the Golden City, the New Jerusalem, in that hand which holds the heavens, and lets it gently descend over the multitudes of the church, like a veil of golden network over a bride upon her marriage-day; and with that golden veil he covers and envelops all the millions of the church; the veil descends to the feet like that of an eastern bride, and nothing but the veil is seen. A multitude of persons, but a single veil for all, and so the diversity of persons is changed into a unity of aspect.

"The millions of the church are thus brought forward as one individual bride under the encircling veil of the golden city. The ceremony is finished, the marriage is completed; and those whom God hath joined together, shall no man and no created thing be able to put asunder. The whole idea and essence of the marriage of the Lamb is a perfect and eternal union between the Divine Man from heaven and the men of dust and ashes from the earth. It is the taking up of a people out of the dying world and absorbing them into union with the Lord of life.

"When the marriage of the Lamb has taken place, it is followed by a banquet, the most magnificent, we may be assured, that even heaven itself has ever seen. It is called the 'Marriage Supper of the Lamb.' Rev. xix. 9. What a feast will that be! Imagine all the splendors of eastern kings, of Imperial Rome, of over-civilized Europe, and what are they when compared with the splendors of the marriage of the Lamb?

"Those present at the august and imposing ceremonial tread on gold; the foundations of the banqueting-room are jewels beyond price; the light of the banqueting-room is the light of God's countenance!

"The last supper of the Lord with his disciples was in the earthly Jerusalem, at a humble table in an 'upper room,' and darkened by the heaviest cloud that ever fell upon human hearts—the shadow of the cross. But the next supper; how different! In the golden city, in the upper skies, at a table decorated by all the skill of heaven, covered with celestial light, with the cross behind and a happy eternity before them, the disciples in resurrection bodies will again sit down to supper with their Lord.

"The splendors of this Marriage Supper of the Lamb can neither be imagined nor described, nor its divine music, nor its celestial conversation. The golden harps shall be strung, and the immeasurable vault of heaven shall be filled with the melodious voices of glorified millions—a voice as perfect as their beauty; and a song shall be raised, which shall pierce the clouds, and bring back harmony even to the earth: 'Hallelujah, for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth!' 'They shall hunger no more, neither shall they thirst any more, neither shall the sun light upon them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them to living fountains of water; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.'"

Dear readers of THE RESTITUTION, will it be ours to enjoy the blessedness of being among the called to "the Marriage Supper of the Lamb?" Will it be ours to enter the pearly gates, and walk upon the streets of pure transparent gold within the gem-built walls of the New Jerusalem? A day far grander than that that heard the songs of morning stars is soon to dawn. A requiem, more transcendently glorious than that genesis that inspired the golden harps of the sons of God, when Eden bloomed out in the loveliness of creation's morn, is soon to be wrought by the hands of him who will make all things new. In this world we never meet; may we greet each other in the world to come.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Coming Age—Its Proximity—Christ's Narration Continued—Signs of His Coming—Physical—Signs in the Heavens Above—Signs on the Earth Beneath—Signs in the Sun—Signs in the Moon—Signs in the Stars—Signs in the Sea—Signs Among the Nations—Moral Signs.—No. 20.

J. P. WEETHEE.

The Physical Signs are divided into two classes—those in the heavens, and those on the earth. If Christ did not intend the two locations, why should he say, signs in the sun and in the moon, and in the stars, and on the earth—distress of nations with perplexity, the sea and the waves roaring? Why should the spirit through the prophet, say, "heavens above," "earth beneath?" If they were moral and all belonged to the earth? Did not a literal star (Gr. ἀστὴρ—Heb. כּוֹכָב ooker - kochab) direct the wise men to Bethlehem? and are not physical signs more readily understood than figurative signs?

1. Signs in the Sun.—Does the Savior here mean the literal sun? or did he intend his four disciples to understand something else? Had he not the power of language to convey by a word his exact thought? Why, then, use a word that expresses one thought, when he meant another without any explanation? If he intended by "sun," the Roman empire, we should have [illegible] that distinctly stated, [illegible] would follow: Lord, what do you mean by the sun? Are we to understand by it the sun that gives us light and heat? We are illiterate fishermen. If you do not mean what you say, tell us what you do mean? for we want to understand the signs of your return. Our Savior would have taught them his meaning, as he did in his parables.

The word sun, we admit, does not have a uniform meaning. It may have a symbolic meaning, as in visions; but has it a symbolic meaning in Luke xxi. 25? If such was the intended signification when used by Christ, he would have been obliged to say so.

Let us examine its Scripture usage. The Greek word used by Christ, is ἥλιος, from ἕλη, helios. In Hebrew it is שֶׁמֶשׁ shemesh—literally, sun—the great luminary of day. Is that its usual and literal meaning? The word שֶׁמֶשׁ is used about 153 times in the Bible. Of these 140 texts can be declared literal without any doubt. In Gen. xxxvii. 9, the sun is seen in vision. "And he dreamed yet another dream, and told it his brethren, and said, behold, I have dreamed a dream more; and, behold, the sun, and the moon, and the eleven stars, made obeisance to me." This was explained—the sun was his father, the moon his mother, and the eleven stars his (Joseph's) brethren. Psa. lxxxiv. 11. In this passage God is a sun by a metaphor. It is fully explained.

In Joel ii. 10, it is literal and refers to the obscuring of the sun by an army of locusts on their flight. Verse 28 is also to be interpreted literally, since, on the day of Pentecost the spirit was literally poured out, which marked the commencement of the Gentile dispensation. Why, then, should not the signs which mark its concluding events (verse 31) be literal also? Such an interpretation is required.

The application which Peter makes of this passage—This is that which was spoken by the Prophet Joel, "And it shall come to pass in the last days (saith God) I will pour out of my spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams; and on my servants and on my handmaidens will I pour out in those days, of my spirit; and they shall prophesy; and I will show wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; blood, and fire, and vapor of smoke; the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come." Acts ii. 16-21. A part of this quotation, only, is applicable to the day of Pentecost. "These are not drunken as ye suppose." What you have seen are not the effects of "new wine." Verse 13. Seeing it is only the third hour of the day; but these are the effects of the Holy Spirit predicted by Joel. What would the darkening of the sun and moon and falling of stars disprove relative to their being drunk or sober? One division of the signs belonged to the introduction of the Gentile times, the other division to their close, but both divisions to transpire before the coming of the great day of the Lord. The sun is a symbol in Rev. viii. 12. "And the fourth angel sounded, and the third part of the sun was smitten, and the third part of the moon, and the third part of the stars; so as the third part of them was darkened, and the day shone not for a third part of it, and the night likewise." Rev. xii. 1 is also symbolic, or, rather metaphorical. The woman, symbol of the true church, the gospel of the Son of God—crown of twelve stars (apostles), with the moon—the Jewish under her feet. These were seen in vision, and, therefore, symbolic. The surroundings of John in the Isle of Patmos, and Jesus on the Mount of Olives were exceedingly unlike.

That the sun is literal in Christ's narration is evident from the language that he had previously applied to that empire—the "abomination of desolation"—"Jerusalem compassed with armies." He has applied literal terms to the Roman, why should he in the same historic sketch make use of language so obscure, and, therefore, so liable to be misunderstood?

"Sun" and "nations" are in the same sentence. "Nations" is a term, admitted to be literal. The nations are upon the earth, intimating that the sun is not upon the earth. In other places declared to be in heaven ABOVE. We are pointing applied to the sun that requires a departure from the literal construction, and as that is its meaning in 140 passages out of 153 we shall say that sun in Luke xxi. 25, means the same luminary that now has the name. The disciples so understood the language of our Savior or they would have solicited some explanation. This one point is sufficient to decide upon the literal interpretation of the word.

It is said, there shall be signs in the sun. What signs, and have they taken place? are questions now in place for discussion; for, as these were to be indications of Christ's near approach, if they have not transpired, then is the Savior's return not at the doors; but, if they are in the past his glorious epiphany is upon us. This becomes a practical question. Joel says, "The sun shall be turned into darkness," (darkened). There is no indication that the sun was to be blotted out, but only darkened, for a time. The darkness was to be something more than an ordinary eclipse, otherwise it would excite no special notice, and would not therefore constitute a sign. Since, to be a sign, requires that it should produce the impression on the minds of some that it was intended as a sign.

Has the sun been supernaturally darkened? for Christ said that the sun should be darkened. Matt. xxiv. 29; Mark xiii. 24.

Within one century (May 19, 1780,) it has been supernaturally darkened. It was known throughout New England as the "dark day." It was not an ordinary eclipse, it continuing too long, and the moon not being in the right position. The night, also, was exceeding dark. It had the chief element of a sign, since it produced the general impression, that the Son of Man was about to return. It may be objected that that sign was not sufficiently general. To this we reply, that signs to be such, do not require that they should extend over the world, or be seen by mankind generally. Some are required to believe on the testimony of others. Christ said to Thomas, "Because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed; blessed (are) they that have not seen, and (yet) believed." John xx. 29.

We have dwelt at considerable length on the literal interpretation of the word sun. That being established, our interpretation of the words moon and stars will follow the same law of construction.

Signs in the Stars.—Matthew records two features: 1st, "The stars shall fall from heaven;" 2nd, "The powers of the heavens shall be shaken." A third phenomenon may be added, viz.: "The sign of the Son of Man." The first is specific; the second, more general; the third simply a sign in heaven. What it is cannot, perhaps, be definitely stated. When seen, it may produce on the minds of those that are looking for Christ's return, the full conviction that it is truly the sign predicted. While speaking of the signs, physical and moral, we desire the reader to keep these two questions constantly before his mind:

a. Has the natural world exhibited the predicted phenomena? Has it presented the general aspects stated by Christ?

b. Is the moral world in the state that was named in the narration? If the general features harmonize with the descriptions, we are prepared to say that they are fulfilled; if not, those not accomplished must be regarded still to come.

1. The stars shall fall from heaven.—Has this sign taken place? The objector says, no! "Real stars are fixed—suns to other systems, and in size, each is, perhaps, a million times the magnitude of this earth." Real stars are of two classes, fixed, and falling. The falling is as truly a star as the one that remains. All stars move, but all do not fall. Those that appear stationary are only relatively so. The star that went before the wise men was as certainly a star as Arcturus, or any one of the Pleiades. We speak of shooting stars, using the same word, star, as when describing the fixed stars. Shooting stars have been noticed for centuries; but not till the 13th of November, 1833, did they fall in such numbers as to constitute an extraordinary event. Prof. Olmsted, in his work on astronomy, has the following: "The remarkable exhibition of shooting stars which have occurred within a few years past, have excited great interest among astronomers, and led to some new views respecting the construction of the solar system. Their attention was first turned towards this subject by the great meteoric shower of November 13th, 1833. On that morning, from 2 o'clock until broad daylight, the sky being perfectly serene and cloudless, the whole heavens were lighted with a magnificent display of celestial fire-works. At times, the air was filled with streaks of light, occasioned by fiery particles darting down so swiftly as to leave the impression of their light on the eye, (like a match ignited and whirled before the face,) and drifting to the northwest like flakes of snow driven by the wind; while, at short intervals, balls of fire, varying in size from minute points to bodies larger than Jupiter and Venus, and in a few instances as large as the full moon, descended more slowly along the arch of the sky, often leaving after them long trains of light, which were, in some instances, variegated with different prismatic colors.

On tracing back the lines of direction in which the meteors moved, it was found that they all appeared to radiate from the same point, which was situated near one of the stars (Gamma Leonis) of the sickle, in the constellation Leo.

This shower pervaded nearly the whole of North America, having appeared in almost equal splendor from the British possessions on the north, to the West India Islands and Mexico on the south, and from sixty-one degrees of longitude east of the American coast, quite to the Pacific ocean on the west.

Throughout this immense region the duration was nearly the same."

His conclusions were that they originated beyond the atmospheric; that they consisted of light combustible matter; that they moved with great velocity; that they were bodies of large size, sometimes several thousand feet in diameter.

Their cause is unknown. On the minds of many it produced great alarm. It had all the elements of a "SIGN."

NEWS ITEMS.

A RUSSIAN CITY FLOODED.

ST. PETERSBURG, May 16.—There was a violent storm at Tiflis on the 14th inst. The rain fell in such torrents that the town and suburbs were flooded. Great damage was done to property. The rain having washed an immense quantity of locusts' eggs together, the inhabitants are embracing the opportunity by taking active means to destroy them.

FAMINE.

LONDON, May 18.—Rev. B. Labaree, the well-known American missionary at Oorroomiyah, North Persia, where the famine chiefly prevails, writes: "Grain is selling at eleven times the ordinary rates. Rye has risen enormously, and the people are living largely on scanty roots. Robberies are becoming alarmingly frequent. The reports from Kurd'stan, received from helpers among the mountain Nestorians, is equally distressing. From this city (Oorroomiyah) to Tigris the famine is alike severe. May the Lord have mercy upon the land."

ISRAELITES IN RUSSIA.

WASHINGTON, May 21.—The house to-day passed a resolution, introduced by Mr. Cox, calling upon William M. Evarts for all correspondence in the state department relative to the expulsion of Israelites who are citizens of the United States from Russia. According to information received by Mr. Cox, the Jews in Russia are subjected to infamous persecution, chiefly because a few Jewish Nihilists have been discovered in St. Petersburg.

Advices from St. Petersburg state that Russia has decided to recall her charge d'affaires from Pekin and place her subjects in China under the protection of the United States. This means war between the two countries.

The drought prevails in Jamaica, West Indies, and cattle and live stock of all kind are dying for want of water.

CONSTANTINOPLE, May 24.—Famine rages in Van, Alashkad and Bashkalith, where deaths are innumerable.

BRADFORD, Pa., May 23.—The town of Edenburg, in the lower oil country, was visited by a destructive fire last night. About eighty stores and dwellings were burned. The fire had its origin in the United States Hotel, an empty structure, and was the work of an incendiary. The time consumed was two hours and a half, and the total loss, at a low estimate, is $200,000.

The Catacombs of Rome

Having a desire to see the catacombs, of which there are so many about Rome, we chose those of St. Calixtus in the Appian Way. A mile and a half from the gate of old St. Sebastian we came to a double wooden gate in a high brick wall. The guide came at last, after our rapping, and took us over the field to a small opening in the earth, down which we descended about fifty feet. At the bottom of the steps each of us took a wax taper. Soon we found ourselves in a damp, narrow passage two and a half feet wide and about eleven feet high, the either hand were niches cut in the soft rock for the bodies. We walked through passage after passage, through a perfect labyrinth. Lose your guide and you are lost, for these catacombs have never been fully explored.

Every little while we would come to a small chapel that could hold twelve or fifteen persons. These rooms would be plastered, with traces of painting on the walls, representing Christ with lambs on His shoulders, and Moses in the wilderness. The peacock was also painted on the ceiling representing triumph. We had seen this fowl in mosaic on the walls and floor of St. Marco in Venice and other churches, and wondered where it came from, until we saw it here. Looking into some of the niches, from which the closing stone had been removed, we could see the bones of some old Christian buried long ago.

A most important discovery of new catacombs has been recently made in a lane that leads from the Via Appia to the Via Ostiensis, not far from the Church of St. Paul, outside the walls. The catacombs were around and under the old church of Santa Petronella, all traces of which church have been lost for five centuries. The church is mentioned in some old chronicles, but these were supposed to be false until verified by these recent discoveries.

The importance of this new discovery is this: that here are tombs of Christians dating from year 80 A. D. These are the first catacombs that have been discovered (I believe) of so early a date. They have not yet been fully explored, but are now just being opened up. Here all the Christian symbols carved upon stone have been found as in other catacombs (with the exceptions of fresco paintings), thus proving that the Christians were, as Tacitus says about this time, "Ingens multitudino." The importance of these new catacombs in confirming Christian history is very great, and they show conclusively that our faith was no growth of a myth, but that Christ was worshipped from the first.

Upwards of sixty different catacombs have now been discovered, and according to that great authority in such matters, Michell de Rossi, they cover an area of 625 acres. "In order to form an accurate idea of their extent it must be borne in mind that the passages were one above another, as many as five being thus sometimes disposed. The highest of these lie 22 to 25 feet below the surface, while the lowest are 40 to 50 feet deeper." The total length of these underground passages if placed in one line would be about 545 miles, and we must remember that none of these catacombs have yet been fully explored.

On the Via Ostiensis not far from these newly-discovered catacombs, is the place where Paul suffered martyrdom. There is a church with beautiful mosaic floor, and with halls inlaid with precious marbles, built over the spot. This is undoubtedly the veritable spot, as Eusebius speaks of this fact. Inside the church there are three fountains, from one of which you drink, and there are little bottles here for the faithful to take away water in, if they choose; for the legend has been grafted on that those three fountains sprang up miraculously where the apostle's head touched the ground as it rolled from the block.

Near here, about a half a mile, is the Church of St. Paul, built over the catacombs in which he is buried. This church was burned a few years ago, but it is now being rebuilt in a style of great magnificence, all the reigning sovereigns of Europe sending gold and precious marbles and wood.—Henry T.

POETRY.

The Adieu.

To Thee, when called awhile to part
With friends or kindred dear,
To Thee we raise each drooping heart,
And tell each rising tear;
For thou, oh God, art ever nigh
To hear thy children when they cry.

The Lord in mercy condescends
To those who ask His love;
Calls them his children and his friends,
And writes their names above.
His bending ear, His smiling face,
Are present at the throne of grace.

As children of a father's care,
Thy blessings we implore;
As friends of Jesus, We would share
Thy presence evermore.
'Tis this alone can cheer the soul,
And every rising grief control.

If thou art with us when we part
With friends or kindred dear,
To fill with joy each drooping heart,
And banish every tear;
How easy then to bid adieu!
For Jesus smiles and Heaven is true.

LETTER DRAWER.

Editor Restitution: I take my pen in hand to write a few words for THE RESTITUTION, to let the brethren and sisters know a little what I am trying to do in the Master's vineyard, and first I thank the kind friend for sending me the paper, for I am not able to pay for it. I am one of God's poor one's—and for which I do not blush. I have spent all my life in the ministry otherwise, I might have had thousands laid up for what some call a rainy day. However I have not one red cent. I spent last year in North Michigan, preaching the kingdom. I mention no names of places—I would say to the dear friends be faithful. I believe the bride will one of these days be taken away from the storm; now imminent. I have got back from a three months tour down east. And find our youngest son at the point of death, with the consumption, still I can say Father thy will be done. I ask an interest in the prayers of the brethren. I must say I am truly glad that we have been favored with the articles from Brother Moncrieff and Shepherd. This is what we as a people need. I hope to meet you all soon in the kingdom. KESWICK W. DEVERELL.

Kenwick, Ont,

Editor Restitution: I cry out with David, "O send out thy light and thy truth, let them lead me, let them bring me to thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles. But wars are determined and garments rolled in blood before this desirable end can be realized. The auspicious era of the world's blessedness is far in the future. Jehovah is a man of war, and his vicegerent will have to play the part of a mighty conqueror before he speaks peace to the nations. During his absence affairs will be conducted under the operation of secondary causes. England and France will combine against Austria and Russia, and Constantinople will be the subject of their strife. As soon as the Turkish power is removed from Jerusalem and the land of Judea, the way will be open to England to carry up Judah as a present to the name of the Lord, and to establish her in the enjoyment of civil and religious privileges.

England will hold the supremacy in Judea, and France will strengthen herself in Palestine and Syria.

Hence the restoration of Judah being planted upon her own soil, she will flourish and grow, and become renowned in the earth; and will soon be an object of admiration and of envy among the nations. The prosperity of Judah will be a cause of war. This grows out of the nature of the situation between Judah and England, as affording to England an undue amount of strength, and hence Austria and Russia with fresh recruits from Germany, Italy and Rome will drive the English and French fleets out of the Mediterranean, and set themselves down before the walls of Paris. Thus France will be driven home and her mother will again hear the roar of artillery, and the heart-strickened damsels weep over their lovers.

France will succumb to superior force and join the ranks of her adversaries at the winding up of the war on the continent. The great city will be divided into three parts, Rev., (the old Roman territory) and from thence the combined army will sweep over Egypt and move against Jerusalem. In the meantime the Son of man comes and the saints are raised up from the death state in which they had been held for so many ages, and prepared to raise the seige. The city is set free and Gog with his Magogian forces falls upon the mountains of Israel. Thus we have a bird's eye view of the course of events to the battle of Armageddon. We have no measure of time in reference to the coming of the Son of man.

All we know about it is that in an unexpected hour he will be here; wherefore he now saith to all who have ears to hear, "Blessed is he that watcheth," "and in such an hour as you think not, the Son of man cometh." This is reliable, and of the utmost importance to those who know the truth. One might sconce with the martyr for the stake and bless God for the flames that are not everlasting rather than to make shipwreck of the faith, or on being weighed in the balance to be found wanting; awful thought! Shall I alone who may be saved, shall I at last be lost?

If now I have found grace in thy sight O Lord, I beseech thee to show me thy glory—to fill me with thy fulness, to qualify me for thy service, and to keep me faithful till thy coming, that all the time and at the last I may be found watching. If there be any note in glory sweeter than the rest it will be the "well done thou good and faithful," uttered by the Master but to be put to shame before the universe of God, to be cast out into outer darkness, to weep, to wail, to gnash the teeth, to be chased out of the world, and to be pursued by a thunderbolt of divine wrath into sightless ruin accompanied with the sound of the Master's words; "Thou wicked and slothful servant." Alas! poor me! Let him that assuredly stands, take heed lest he fall. But the darkness is past and the true light now shineth, and if we walk in the light. . . . we have fellowship one with another, and truly our fellowship is with the Father and and with his Son Jesus Christ.

SELECTIONS.

[Signs of the Times.]

The Sun is Setting.

The sun of mercy is setting. The time of probation is fast closing. If we desire to do anything in the service of God, it must be done soon. The night comes when no man can work. It approaches more swiftly than we are aware. Our life also hangs by a brittle thread. Our existence is one of uncertainty. The gates of hades are wide open. Every hour carries thirty-six hundred human beings to the tomb. We must not marvel if the angel of death should knock at our door next.

Wonderful events are transpiring around us in nature, among the kingdoms and nations of this world, and among the people of God. The prophetic chains are being completed, link after link. The signs of the times illuminate the pathway of the saints. The warning voice of God is sounding with solemnity. The last message of mercy calls for earnestness and uncommon diligence. The remnant of God's people have slumbered too long on the enchanted ground. The sun of mercy is fast sinking. The night of sorrow—the day of judgment—approaches with giant-steps. The lukewarm will soon be spewed out of the mouth of the Lord

Awake! awake! If you want to serve God, serve him now. If you intend to suffer with Christ, do it now. If you mean to gain the victory over the corrupt desires and habits of the old man, make a full surrender now. Make no delay. Take hold of this matter in earnest. Be honest before God and to yourself. Otherwise you may soon be placed on the left hand, and be compelled to listen to those terrible words: "Depart from me, ye cursed!"

Satan is often moderate when he can advance his own devices. He does not ask for the whole heart, only a small corner—a little room for a small throne. His request does not appear so unreasonable. You may sympathize also some with him on account of old acquaintance. How long shall this continue? You undertake a dangerous work. You are in danger of losing the crown of glory.

Are you prepared for the coming of our Lord? Answer the question, yes or no. If you are not prepared, how long will you wait before you wash your robe in the blood of the Lamb, and cleanse your character from the stains of sin? How long before you will fill your soul with heavenly love, so that you can rejoice to meet the coming King? What will you do when your lamp goes out? What will all your sacrifices amount to when at last you sink into the lake of fire?

Do you say that you can do no more than you do? Consider this seriously. Your Savior tells you to resist unto blood, striving against sin. Remember what he has done for you. Behold his sacred head, crowned with thorns. Behold him in the agony of death, groaning under the burden of your sins. Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away (or beareth) the sins of the world. Listen to his last agonizing cry: "My God, my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" Do you think Jesus had to put forth strong efforts to bear your sins? Then you must also make strong efforts to overcome them

Consider how you can toil and endure to advance your temporal interests. Do you show as much diligence in spiritual things? Are you more interested in preparing to meet your God than to attend to your earthly affairs? Then you can labor for the Lord, and you can pray in earnest. Then you can break through all darkness and hindrances. Then you will not rest before rays of precious light from the sanctuary illuminate the mind. Then you can suffer with Christ and labor for him, when the heart is warmed up with his infinite love. Then you can subdue self and glorify God in trying to awaken sinners.

Dear reader, the sun of mercy is setting. If you mean to do anything for Jesus, do it now before it is too late. May God sanctify you wholly, and your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Value of Oriental Discoveries.

Men, full of enthusiasm and energy, have pushed their investigations extensively in Egypt, Palestine, Mesopotamia, etc. They have done this with great success, and by excavation largely, have brought to light greatly valued and for ages buried relics of antiquity. And, as these explorations have been mostly in lands covered by the events and scenes of the Old Testament history, it is pertinent to inquire how far these discoveries have contributed to confirm or elucidate the ancient Scriptures.

1. They have set at rest the question whether the Jewish annals are not made up chiefly of myths, that is, conceptions of men ages after the times to which they refer. The very existence of Moses, Joshua, David and Solomon has been denied. But monumental discoveries largely united in producing the conviction that these sacred writers did actually live in the times claimed for them, and did state facts and events as they actually occurred. The monumental remains in Egypt give most decisive evidence of their construction at the times assigned—not a few of them giving names, facts and dates in perfect harmony with the Bible record. Names of rulers, countries and cities constantly appear in those hieroglyphic sketches which forbid a doubt concerning their own antiquity, and confirm most satisfactorily the claims of the Bible as being a faithful record.

2. German and other critics have scoffed at the supposed ignorance of Moses of the countries, facts and circumstances of the age assumed to be his. But the researches of Belzoni, Rosellini, Wilbridge and others, have shown that all Moses wrote was in exact correspondence with all we know of these countries and circumstances from other quarters. Deciphered hieroglyphics have come to the rescue of ancient Scripture narrative and compelled the belief that Moses and other sacred writers of his and subsequent ages were the honest and truthful men they claimed to be.

A grand series of Assyrian sculptures in the museums of Paris place before the beholders the mighty warriors of antiquity, before whom Judah and Israel trembled.

It seems well worthy of our most profound gratitude that in our times, when infidel criticism has run riot in assaults upon the Bible, and some have feared that the foundations would be destroyed, and nothing left of the Bible, that at this very juncture the most remarkable monuments of antiquity should be unearthed, and should give such a striking confirmation to the Christian faith in the Scriptures. When the voice of man grew faint and feeble then "the very stones have cried out." It is scarcely too much to say, that faith has, for the present, been saved by these discoveries, which divine wisdom reserved for an age when they were most sorely needed.

Prophecies Concerning the Land, Nation, and King of Israel, Not Yet Fulfilled.

Sir:—If you think an occasional letter on the above, from the pen of an old student of the prophetic Scriptures, would be of sufficient general interest to warrant its publication in the New Era, I can assure you it will afford me pleasure to write it, for the sure word of prophecy, which lightens up the future as a light shining into a dark place, has for many years been to me a cheering and comforting theme; especially the numerous unfulfilled prophecies which reveal the future of the land, nation, and King of Israel. The student of prophecy can see the future as clearly as the student of history can see the past; and with the poet can testify:—

"Sweet is the harp of prophecy; too sweet
Not to be wronged by a mere mortal touch;
Nor can the wonder, it records be sung
To meaner measure, and not suffer loss.
. . . . . .
Oh, scenes surpassing fable, and yet true,
Scenes of accomplished bliss; which who can see,
Though but in distant prospect, and not feel
His soul refreshed with heavenly joy?"

A vivid portrayal of a scene is sometimes called a word painting. Well, the Word of God, spoken by the inspired seers of old, so vividly depicts things to come that it may be said to abound with word paintings, chiefly of Israel's future. Each a gem, and yet, as it were, a scrap, whose purport and connection all who read do not perceive. Just as one acquainted with our Park may pass through it and not notice its many distant objects, so may a reader of the Bible go through it and not notice the verse here and the chapter there, wherein the future of God's land, nation, and King, are revealed. Not one grand, connected, panorama-like picture has the Spirit in the prophets painted, which any and every one might look upon, but here a little piece, and there a little piece, which only those who study them can appreciate, and see to be parts of a wondrous revelation of a Divine purpose, the contemplation of which—though but in distant prospect—rejoices the hearts of believers. The sweet Psalmist of Israel, the chief perhaps, of the Spirit's artistic scribes, was so full of Israel's future, and so longed to see it, that he recorded the following beautiful prayer:—

"Remember me, O Lord, with the favor that Thou bearest unto thy people: O visit me with thy Salvation, that I may see the good of thy chosen, that I may rejoice in the gladness of thy nation, that I may glory with thine inheritance." Psa. cvi. 4, 5.

When that prayer shall be answered David shall be no longer dead and buried, but raised up, and a living witness of Jehovah's goodness to his chosen people, rejoicing in the gladness of God's nation, glorying with Israel, his inheritance. His eyes shall see Jerusalem "a quiet habitation," and "the King in his beauty." Isa. xxxiii. 17, 20. He shall see Judah and Israel restored, and become one nation in their land, under one King. Ezek. xxxvii. 22. He shall see the Lord Jesus "on the throne of his glory," and the apostles upon "twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Matt. xix. 28. He shall see the accomplishment of Zephaniah iii. 14, 15. "Sing, O daughter of Zion, shout, O Israel, be glad and rejoice with all thy heart, O daughter of Jerusalem; the Lord hath taken away thy judgments, he hath cast out thine enemy; the King of Israel, even the Lord, is in the midst of thee, thou shalt not see evil any more."

There is a gem of a picture! Happy all they who shall witness the future it depicts! Zion, Jerusalem and Israel, are called upon to be "glad and rejoice" with all their heart. Why? Because the Lord's judgments, which had desolated Jerusalem and her land, have been withdrawn; because Israel's latter-day enemy and oppressor has been cast out; and the Lord (Jesus) the King of Israel, being in ther midst, they shall henceforth see evil no more! The horn of salvation raised up by God in the house of his servant David, over eighteen hundred years ago, has at the time appointed of the Father, accomplished that Divine purpose of which all the prophets spoke, and Israel being delivered out of the hand of their enemies, shall thenceforth "serve God without fear, in righteousness and holiness, all the days of their life." Luke i. 69, 75.—Omega.

THE SPOT ON THE SUN.

The sun-spot cycle is in full action. The huge blazing surface of the sun is dotted with spots in all directions. They throng the solar domain, sometimes appearing singly, then in groups, and then in rows. A large spot surrounded by smaller ones seems to be the favorite form of manifestation. Some of them are large enough to be seen with a spyglass, and some so small as to require a telescope of high power to bring them into view. We can form little idea of their immense size. The whole territory of the United States is smaller in dimensions than many of the sun-spots now visible, and some of them are larger than our whole globe. No astronomer has ever discovered the mysterious law that controls their appearance or the part they really play in the affairs of the solar system. It is well established, however, that they occur in maximum force once in about eleven years; that they are connected with the meteorological condition of the earth; that when they begin to appear in great numbers, as at present, seasons of excessive heat follow in their train, and then they are usually attended with grand displays of northern lights. Professor Piazzi Smyth announces the reappearance of the aurora in Scottish skies after an absence of several years, and predicts a season of excessive heat before summer begins. The cyclones and tornadoes in the west seem to give proof of unusual elemental disturbance. Under these circumstances there is nothing to do but to watch and wait. Ages of observation may enable the astronomer of the future to unravel the mystery that surrounds the solar spot cycle, but there is little probability that the problem will be solved for many generations to come. Intelligent observers can take notes as well as trained astronomers. There are three phenomena to be especially anticipated—the occurrence of severe storms, the approach of a great heat wave and a flaming of aurora banners in the northern skies.

In that glorious morning of the resurrection the saints shall put on their new fresh suits of flesh, richly laid and trimmed with glory. Those bodies which in the grave were dust and rottenness, when it delivers them back again, shall be shinning and excellent pieces, absolutely and everlastingly freed from infirmities, deformities and natural necessities.

RESTITUTION FUND.

ARBOR, Fulton Co., Ind., Nov. 29, 1879.

Editor Restitution:—With your permission I will make an appeal to the brotherhood for help to support THE RESTITUTION for the year 1880 and locate its weekly visits.

Now, dear brethren, I call upon one and all who feel themselves able, to donate to the cause of Christ the small amount of $100 between this and the first of January.

Dear brethren, we could do this, with a few exceptions, if we just thought so. I am well aware that some brethren have contributed nobly, but I make this appeal in a special manner to those who have heretofore done nothing as a free-will offering.

Dear brother, do not say, I am too poor! Perhaps you are selling that noxious weed, tobacco, in some form. Consider for one moment: are we who claim to be the chosen of God so poverty stricken that we cannot support a weekly paper.

We do hope that every one will respond to this appeal. Please let us hear from all those who can not or will not pay the $100, and will they please give us their reasons. I am also a poor man. My name is Abraham Pontious. I am 39 years old and have a large family to support. I have a small farm of 80 acres. I farm and work at the carpenter's trade to support my family. I use neither tobacco nor intoxicating drinks.

And, dear Editor, I will enclose $1 to commence on. I read THE RESTITUTION, and the Bible, and I hope to meet you all in that coming kingdom. So, farewell. ABRAHAM PONTIOUS.

POETRY.

A Few Short Years.

A few short years—and then,
What changes Time hath wrought!
So strange they seem, we scarce can deem
The world, our life, ourselves are aught
But one long fitful dream.
The clouds that fly
Across the sky,
Waves tossed upon the sea,
Shadows that pass
Before a glass,
Our fitting emblems be.

A few short years—and then
Where are the hopes that shone
When youth with flowers encrowned the hours,
And earth can but one music tone
Of joy for us and ours?
The rainbow's hues,
The morning's dews,
The blossoms of a day,
The trembling sheen
On water seen
More stable are than they.

A few short years—and then
Where is the ad'mant chain
That passion wrought, and madly thought
Nor time nor change could ever strain
Till life's last strife was fought?
A rope of sand,
A gossamer band;
The filmy threads at e'en
The spider weaves
Amongst the leaves
A firmer bond had been.

A few short years—and then
Where is Ambition's pile,
That rose so high against the sky,
O'ershadowing all around the while,
With its proud beast might vie?
A shadow's shade,
A card-house made
By children for their play;
The air-blown bells
That folly swells
May vaunt a surer stay.

A few short years—and then
Where is the mighty grief
That wrung the heart with torture's art,
And made it feel but its relief
Time's hand could ne'er impart?
A storm that's burst,
And done its worst.
Then left the heaven more clear;
A night-mare dread,
With morning fled.
These sorrows now appear.

A few short years—and then
What of our life remains,
The smiles and tears of other years,
Of passion's joys, of sorrow's pains,
Ambition's hopes and fears?
A faded dream
To-day they seem,
Which memory scarce can trace—
Set seal'd they're set
Shall Time not yet
Eternity efface!

COMMUNICATIONS.

Daily Living.

The Christian will live by much looking to God. Prayer is a proof of faith, but waiting is a greater proof. In all prayer, let there be thanks for God's power and goodness, and with all the rest, for blessings expected. Faith is not vain, that is thus proved by thanksgivings. While there are seasons of unutterably intense longing and earnest pleading, yet none should lapse into despairing cries. It is better to stop, than to go on with these. God may pity but can not love a desponding mood. Be sure and be receptive. Have the heart like an open cup, upright. Recognize the gentle Spirit, etherial, dew-like, electric, the medium of intercourse. It is the Divine power, intelligence and love. Desire the glory of God, more than self-interest, as a faithful servant. Desire God for what he is, more than what he gives. Remember the relation of the Father and the Son, and have their harmony strong in the heart.

Let repetitions in prayer, be careful and thoughtful, and not heedless, as if God had not heard, which denotes lack of faith. Restlessness is a drawback, whether it be looked at chiefly as a fault or a misfortune. There is great need of resting in God. The Christian should learn to rest on the rock, which at first is but faintly felt with the feet. Do everything in God or in Christ, even to the smallest things. Be not a fool to try to do what God only can do. Let God have an open way to bless. Beware of an objecting frame of mind. Feed on Christ,—inspire him into the soul. Acknowledge God's skillful and splendid management. Some truly feel as if they were dying for the lack of a visit from Jesus. When Jesus comes, all things come. The deepest humility of faith is the best condition of receiving blessings. Faith is itself precious, because it binds one to Christ. We desire God to govern us,—yet, alas! how often we have chafed at his restraint!

Live, or die, I plant all on the rock Christ.

How often does man in youth prove weak, vain, and unholy! Yet he is admonished by slips,—by sin and its bitter fruit, to turn to Christ. There are many spots on the Christian road where the air and sunshine are welcome and refreshing, but the way is narrow, narrow. Jesus Christ loves what he has bought and wrought,—saved and blessed. I not only want grace and glory, but a heart ready to receive it. He who is well instructed knows that the will of God is of exceeding great preciousness and value. May God's righteousness toward and in us, be thus complete that sin can not molest or injure. O, the dreadful power of doubt and fear, and a condemning conscience! Do nothing rash. The Psalmist prays—"teach me good judgment and knowledge, for I have believed thy commandments." I observe that faith came first, before the others. How much trust for a moment, and then faint! In the heart that can trust, is power. Resentment and unbelief are close kindred. How many that with dry eyes, have crying hearts! What a pest is a throb of impatience!

If we do not delight in anything, it is clear we do not delight in God. He who delights in God must find it hard to be unhappy. That is right hoping which is in the line of God's will. That is vain wishing which is in the way of self will. Unbelief accepts gifts slightingly or querulously. Unbelieving and murmuring groans, are wastegates of grace. No men who ask grace, at the same time resist it? Whatever is not of faith, has in it some poison, that works out in pain. The way to receive, is with appreciation, appropriation and gratitude. A syringe draws all slowly—so a heart, if the gate be narrow, receives oil of grace. When rejected by men,—then hope in God. Three (evil) things in a row, doubt, despond, despair.

"Do you believe up to the hilt? If not, we cause much unbelief."—Spurgeon. Faith is victory; righteousness, rest. True faith survives momentary withholding. Better than the vanity and dissipation of wishing, is the appropriation of believing. In fainting, still believe. In struggles of faith, back! snarling puppy of resentment! I cut short all, and compass all, by coming to Christ. The mark of his blood-cleansing is on the believer. Experience of sin, is to inspire hatred of it. Faith's motto,—close cleaving to Jesus, and oneness with him. What a joy to have God thick on us and look on us! Sinning weakness faith. Laws have their course, and men suffer in some way from their evil courses. God by hiding himself excites our pursuit of him and keeps us from presumption. If we do not realize promises, it is because we do not depend on them. A great blessing is most fit, after earnest seeking. As God delays, he keeps an ever expanding infinity of joys to come. In seeking earnestly good from God, we learn the greatest good is in God. God sees that as we need, so we ought to know we need him most.

I received God to my heart, last year, last week, yesterday—and do so receive him now. Some will believe only so far as they can see. God is a desirable debtor, on account of his truth and power, touching his promises. We owe everything to God, the best and greatest of creditors. Often unbelief proves grinding work,—while faith is a work of ease and pleasure. Without faith before a blessing, how much will there be after it?

(From my note-book of experience.)

A Few Thoughts on the Things That Jesus Conversed With His Disciples After His Resurrection.

The same Jesus that slept in the grave, and was resurrected the third day, talked with his disciples, eat with them, and conversed about things that had taken place before his death. On one occasion, at the Sea of Tiberius, while they were fishing, Jesus had dinner prepared for them, fish, honey and bread. Jesus said, come and dine. Oh, dear reader, how would you feel for Jesus to say, come and dine? That kind voice asked Peter who had betrayed him (Peter feeling guilty of what he had done before Christ's death) said, Lord which is he that betrayeth thee? and what shall this man do? Listen to the kind answer, although he had suffered death by Judas betraying him, and Peter denying him, Jesus said, Peter, lovest thou me? Peter said, yea Lord, thou knowest that I love thee. Peter saith, what shall this man do? Jesus said, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Jesus then forewarned Peter of the death he should die; that when he was old another would gird him, and lead him where he would not.

Tradition tells us Peter was crucified, and at his request, with his head downward, because he had betrayed the Lord. Oh! what great faith he had, and who would not to converse with Christ and know he would only sleep for a time, and then be made alive forevermore. On one occasion as the disciples were making a visit into the country, Jesus appeared and walked with them and asked them, What communications are these ye have one with another, and are sad? Cleopas answering, Are you a stranger in Jerusalem, and have not known the things that have come to pass in these days? Jesus said, What things? Concerning Jesus of Nazareth, a Prophet mighty indeed, and certain women said he was alive. Then Jesus said, Oh fools, and slow of heart to believe all the prophets have spoken. Ought not Christ to suffer these things and to enter into his glory? And beginning at Moses and all the prophets he expounded unto them, in all the Scriptures, the things concerning Himself. And when they went in to dine, he was known unto them in the breaking of bread, and their eyes were opened, and they knew him, and he vanished out of their sight. Oh! what great joy. A few hours ago they were sad now, although it is night, they arose up to return to Jerusalem to spread the glad tidings. When they arrived they found the eleven. The first words they spoke were, The Lord hath risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon. They told what things were done in the way, and while they were yet conversing Jesus stood in their midst, and he said unto them, Why are ye troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? Behold my hand and my feet. But Thomas, one of the twelve, was not with them when Jesus came; the other disciples said unto him, We have seen the Lord; but he said unto them Except I shall see in his hands the prints of nails, and put my fingers into the prints of the nails, I will not believe. And after eight days His disciples were within and Thomas with them; then came Jesus, the doors being shut, and stood in their midst and said, Peace be unto you. Then said he to Thomas, reach hither thy fingers, behold my hands, thrust thy hand into my side and be not faithless, but believing. Thomas said, My Lord and my God. Jesus said, Thomas, because thou hast seen, thou hast believed. Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed.

Oh, what cheering words to the waiting Bride. The church hath not seen Jesus, but believe he is alive and waiting, longing, praying for his return. They are gloomy now, but soon they will be like the apostles, their grief will be turned into great joy. Being seen of his disciples forty days as he led his disciples out as far as Bethany, the disciples ask him, Will thou again restore the kingdom to Israel? He said unto them, It is not for you to know the times or seasons which the Father hath put in his own power. He did not tell them, as the clergy of to-day that Israel will never be restored, but at some future time the kingdom would again be restored to Israel, and when he had spoken these things he was taken up and a cloud received him out of their sight, and two men stood by them in white apparel and said this same Jesus will come in like manner as you have seen him go into heaven. Yes, the same Jesus will come again. Zechariah, the prophet, says, and one shall say unto him, What are these wounds in thine hands; then he shall answer, Those with which I was wounded in the house of my friends. Yes we will behold the wounds in his hands, and to all those that love his appearing he will give eternal life, and will eat and drink with them.

We read in Psa. lxxii. 8 11. He shall have dominion from sea to sea and from the rivers to the ends of the earth, and that all kings shall fall down before him. His name shall endure forever; His name shall be continued as long as the sun. All nations shall call him blessed; no more shall the poor cry for bread, for he will deliver the needy. Again in Psa. ii. 5-12, Ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. Psa. cx. The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool; the Lord shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion. Rule thou in the midst of thine enemies, Christ will come at the appointed time of the Father and reign in the midst of his enemies.

One more Psalm to show that all nations will be brought into subjection by Christ and the saints. Let the saints be joyful in glory, let them sing aloud on their beds; let the high praise of God be in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand, to execute vengeance on the heathen and punishment upon the people, to bind their kings with chains; this honor hath all the saints. Psa. cxlix. What a great honor this will be to the saints in the future, instead of being tempted, slain, persecuted, imprisoned, and suffering cruel martyrdom. Oh what a great change when they awake out of their long sleep; they will have the honor of being kings and priests and have endless life. David, the sweet Psalmodist says in speaking of Christ, How glad will I be when I awake with thy likeness.

In hope of an endless life when Jesus comes.

SELECTIONS.

Unconscious State of the Dead.

As the interest in the above important question continues unabated, and as it is frequently discussed in the pages of the Rainbow, permit me to say a few words upon it. They will be principally to show that the texts of Scripture chiefly relied upon to establish the condition of the dead as one of life and consciousness cannot possibly be advanced for this end.

Those who hold the conscious state of the dead base their views mainly, if not entirely, upon a very few texts of the New Testament which are supposed to teach it. While there is, I may make bold to say, one text in the Old Testament which with any fair show of plausibility can be advanced for the above purpose, there are some few texts of the New Testament which are perpetually and boldly put forward as absolutely forcing upon us the view that men are really alive when the Scripture speaks of them as dead.

I will not be accused of unfairness when I refer to two passages of Scripture as the very strongest which can be advanced in proof of the conscious state of the dead. They are 2 Corinthians v. 1 8, and Philippians i. 23. While the apparent force of Luke xvi. 22, 23, is, it is admitted, at least somewhat met by the fact that this passage forms part of a parable, and must therefore be interpreted according to the rule of parabolic literature: and while it is also felt that the apparent force of Luke xxiii. 43, may be met either by a change of punctuation or by supposing that the "day" which our Lord speaks of is the day when he shall come in his kingdom; it is by great numbers supposed that beyond any fair question the texts from 2 Corinthians and Philippians establish the point that men during their state of death are most certainly alive. I will then endeavor to show that such cannot possibly be their sense.

What these texts are supposed to say is that when believers are dead, in and during their condition from death to resurrection, they are truly and personally "present with Christ," or "with Christ." While they are not said to be alive or conscious they are supposed to be present with Christ, and therefore to be alive and conscious. Now I fully admit the force of the inference. If the premise is true, the conclusion drawn from it is certainly true. I only say that the premise is not true for this reason, that it would, in that case, prove a great deal too much.

Where is Christ now? He is not in hades. Neither his body nor his soul is in hades. He broke the power of hades and left it forever when he rose on the third morning from the tomb. Acts ii. 27. He is now in the highest heavens. He is now seated at his Father's right hand in glory. 1 Pet. iii. 22.

Now, if Christ is not in hades but is in the highest heavens, and if his people when they are dead are "with him," and "present" with him, it follows as an inference absolutely necessary and inevitable that the dead in Christ are not now in hades, but, on the contrary, are now in the highest heavens.

But is this the teaching of Scripture? Certainly not. Whatever may be supposed of the conscious or the unconscious state of the dead, it will be admitted by every candid and reverent reader of Scripture that, while the bodies of believers are in the grave, their souls, which are very properly taken to represent themselves, are in hades until the day of resurrection. There the soul of Jesus Christ was until he arose, and therefore there the souls of all his people are until their resurrection. Acts ii. 27. The Apostle Paul teaches us the same important truth in 1 Corinthians xv. 51, 55. He tells us there that it is not until the day of resurrection that death is in the persons of Christ's people swallowed up in victory, or that it can be said by them, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, (or hades as it is in the Greek) where is thy victory?"

But if the souls of believers during the state of death are in hades, it certainly follows that they are not in the highest heavens, and therefore are not with Christ. And we are therefore compelled, unless we choose to set one passage of Scripture against another, to put a different interpretation from that often put on the passages in 2 Corinthians and Philippians. We must put upon them the view, not a strained one, that the condition of death, being a condition of dreamless sleep, is regarded as a nonentity to the sleeper. His death and his resurrection, his sleeping and his waking, his departing and his being with Christ, are all supposed to be to him synchronous, because the condition of sleep is infelt and unperceived, and is the action to him but a moment of time.

[illegible] of my readers are inclined to [illegible] matter [illegible] same conclusion in another way. It will not be denied, I suppose, that they who are "present with Christ" see him as he is. What does St. John tell us is the effect of seeing Christ as he is? It is that all who see him as he is should be like him (1 John iii. 2) (see note). What is meant by being like Christ as he is in his glorified state? It is that the beholder of Christ should be glorified too. It is not possible to behold Christ in his glory without becoming like him. And, therefore, if believers during their condition of death behold Christ, it would signify that they had during that condition attained to all they ever were to hope for, that for them the resurrection was past, an opinion condemned by St. Paul as deadly heresy. 2 Tim. ii. 18.

The two famous passages from 2 Corinthians and Philippians then do not teach what they are so commonly thought to teach, a conscious state of the dead. Whatever they teach they do not teach this. I am very glad they do not. I am very glad to see that they do not tell us that believers are awake when they are said to be asleep, or alive when they are said to be dead, or glorified when they are taught in other Scriptures to be yet under the power of death.—Henry Constable, in Rainbow.

Jewish Notes.

The Jewish Chronicle of April 9th, referring to the results of the General Election, says: "Although, as we have repeatedly explained, there is no especial Jewish feeling in politics, yet the probable return to power of the party which first (aided thereto by Lord Beaconsfield) gave Jews political emancipation, is not without grave importance.... The matter which, above all others, is immediately interesting to us, is the influence which a change in the government of this country is likely to have upon the moral, physical, and educational condition of our brethren in the east. Not alone our brethren, but the general population of the Ottoman dominions are in a terribly destitute and miserable condition..... Pledged to continue the foreign policy of the present government, although not to employ the same means to the end, the coming Liberal government will, doubtless, insist on the carrying out of substantial reforms throughout the Ottoman dominions as the price of the continued good will of England; and will peacefully and harmoniously combine with the other European Powers to this effect..... It is to be hoped that the Liberal leaders may see fit to give—if it be only unofficially—some kind of countenance, as did the Conservative authorities, to Mr. Laurence Oliphant's excellent scheme for the peaceful and non-political colonization of a portion of Palestine by our people. Such a sanction would, more than anything else, show that this scheme is wholly of a non-political character—a guarantee greatly needed by the timorous Ottoman rulers, who see the shadow of politics in all regenerative plans. The Liberal party may count upon the assistance of the Jews in all serious efforts towards reforming matters in the east. We have too much at stake to be indifferent in the matter, and too large a proportion of brethren in deep suffering through the present condition of affairs, to remain supine. The people of England—who include the Jews of England—cry out for reform in the east in the name of our common humanity."

The deplorable condition of all classes of the subjects of the Turkish Asiatic dominions forms the subject of a recent interesting letter to the Times from a correspondent at Aintab, who remarks, in closing, that "the geographical position of the country is such that England and the European nations cannot cease their exertions to rescue the country from the dangers that threaten to overwhelm it." The truth of this seems to be impressed upon Lord Hartington's mind, judging from his pregnant remark at Fulham during his election campaign. "Do not," he said, "let any one suppose that this Eastern Question is settled by the treaty of Berlin."

Referring to the recently chartered American scheme for a Palestine railroad, the Jewish Chronicle informs us that it "is proposed to divide and traverse the Holy Land in every direction. The terminal are to be at Cairo, the capital of Egypt, and Mosul, on the river Tigris, near the site of the ancient Nineveh, with branches at Jerusalem, Jaffa, Nablous, Beyrout, Aleppo, Iscanderoon and Diarbekir, if found to be necessary."

The April quarterly statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund states that the great ordnance survey map of western Palestine, on the scale of an inch to a mile, is now being issued to subscribers in twenty-six sheets, in portfolio. "The American have executed an admirable map of eastern Palestine [illegible] possible to incorporate this map with that of western Palestine." This American map "adds considerably to our knowledge of the country, but it is only a preliminary, and not an accurate and exhaustive survey." The objects of the Exploration Society are, however, far from exhausted. Here is their prospectus of future work: "It is recommended that expeditions be sent out to excavate on the supposed sites of Capernaum, Chorazin, Bethsaida, etc, and to examine the eastern shores of the Sea of Galilee, to make a geological report on the Dead Sea and the Jordan Valley; to survey the whole of eastern Palestine; to excavate in search of special points in Jerusalem, and at various places in western Palestine; to explore the cities of the Negeb, or southern country; to explore the Lebanon and North Syria as far as the 'entrance of Hamath;' and to explore Midian."

The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Times, writing April 9d, says: "Since my last letter, the accusations against the Jews as the instigators and associates of the Nihilists have appeared with redoubled intensity in the Russian press, and particularly in a certain organ which, by pandering to the appetites of the lower orders, seeks to obtain a foremost place among its contemporaries." The reasoning of the press on the matter has, he says, "produced in influential circles an impression powerful enough, I regret to say, to put off to the Greek Kalends the measure of emancipation which the Jews had been led to expect from the government."—M. W. S., in Glasgow Messenger.

BREVITIES.

The English Palestine Exploration Society has determined to spend from £1,000 to £2,000 a year in prosecuting its researches in the Holy Land.

THE NAPOLEONIC TREE.

When the Empress Eugenie started for her pilgrimage to the scene of her son's death, she took with her slips from a willow growing in Dean Stanley's garden, to plant at the foot of the young prince's monument in Zululand. The tree in the Deanery garden has grown from a slip taken from the willow over the tomb in which Napoleon I. was interred at St. Helena. The strange tradition is related about this tree, that its condition is affected by the fortunes of the Bonapartes. It is remarkable that on the day of Sedan a large bough fell off, and on the day of the Prince Imperial's death in Africa another bough fell.

A natural electric light above on the house of a missionary in Syria recently. Dr. Jessup, in his latest letter from Beirut, describes a storm which partially demolished a house where he was staying. He had gone to Shmeir, on Mount Lebanon, to administer the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, and slept at the house of a Christian physician whose labors for the physical and spiritual good of the people have been very successful in Syria. During the night a thunder-storm, which had been threatening all day, and from which Dr. Jessup had been mercifully preserved as he crossed the mountain 4000 feet above the sea, burst in great fury over the village, and partially unroofed the physician's house. His host told Dr. Jessup that he went out into the storm and "saw on the top of the lightning-rod a huge star of electricity, apparently as large as a man's head, and it remained several minutes unchanged." The night before, the party had been wondering when such villages as Shmeir would be lighted with Edison's electric light. The doctor now remarked: "We have had the electric light introduced into our village, and without expense."

A PETRIFIED BODY.

PHILADELPHIA, May 16.—Police Officer William Blanford died on June 11, 1874. The body was placed in the Philanthropic Cemetery in Passyunk Road. A day or two ago a son of the deceased man had the body disinterred, with the object of removing it to another cemetery. Four men took hold of the box in which the coffin was placed, and it required their united strength to lift it to the surface. The box was not decayed, and the coffin inside was as bright as on the day of the burial. The silver plate was not even tarnished when the lid was removed. The body was petrified, and in an almost perfect state of preservation. The clothing was somewhat mouldy, and what was once flesh had changed to a hard, stony substance, resembling yellowish marble. The eyes were gone, the lips had partly disappeared, and there was no hair on the head; but otherwise the body was perfect. Even the whiskers on the chin had turned into stone. The body weighed almost 300 pounds. Mrs. Blanford died in February last, and was buried near her husband, her body was undergoing the last final process of decay. Both bodies were removed to Mount Moriah Cemetery.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION Advocates the Bible "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to that end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the judgment of nations—the righteous and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a heavy belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion for the remission of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Coming Age—Its Proximity—Literal Narration of Christ Continued—Fifth Period—Signs of His Coming—Physical—Moral—General Remarks on the Physical Signs—Moral Signs—Political—Social—Religious.—No. 21.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Physical Signs—General Remarks.—It seems to us that too much attention cannot be devoted to the signs given by Christ for the express purpose of putting all upon the watch that they might not be overtaken as a thief. He directs them first to the phenomena of the natural world, as if he would say, I wish you to know when I am about to come again in person to the earth so that you may all have your work well done and be ready to receive me. That you may know my near approach, I will print the message on the face of the heavens and on the earth also. You are familiar with nature; can discern its ordinary phenomena, and, therefore be able to see any extraordinary changes. When nature begins to clothe herself with unusual dresses and appearances, such as draw special attention by their singularity; when these unusual phenomena are seen, in the sun, moon and stars; when extraordinary storms upset the sea,—destroying commerce and wrecking navies; when the stars fall from the heavens, "as a fig-tree casteth her green figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind." Rev. vi. 3. When the physical world assumes such extraordinary visages, you may know that my coming is near—even at the doors.

Moral Signs.—1. Political Aspect.—"And upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth." Luke xxi. 25, 26. Since these characteristics have been seen in the political world in all ages since these words were uttered, it is declared to be no sign. To this objection we answer,—To be a sign, the movements among the nations must be so great and extraordinary as to call the special attention of the "wise."

That Christ's second advent was to be preceded by very great revolutions, is taught by other Scriptures, among which are the following: "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time; and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book." Dan. xii. 1, 2.

1. The invasion of Gog and his utter overthrow upon the mountains of Israel (Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix.) will be attended with untold national calamities. The same is taught in Zech. xiv th. The xvith and xixth chapters of Revelations bring to view the same distress of nations and perplexity.

The times of the Gentiles, in their commencement, and near their close, have very remarkable, and also very distinctive features. "And I saw when the Lamb opened one of the seals; and I heard, as it were, the noise of thunders, one of the four living creatures, saying, come and see. And I saw, and behold, a white horse, and he that sat on him had a bow; and a crown was given unto him; and he went forth conquering, and to conquer." Rev. vi 1, 2. Such is the symbolic representation of the introduction of the Gentile age. Let us turn to the inspired description of its close: "And I saw heaven opened, and behold a white horse, and he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True, and in righteousness he doth judge and make war. His eyes were as a flame of fire, and on his head were many crowns; and he had a name written that no man knew but he himself. And he was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood, and his name is called the word of God. And the armies which were in heaven followed him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen, white and clean. And out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations; and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; and he treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God. And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS. And I saw an angel standing in the sun; and he cried with a loud voice, saying to all the fowls that fly in the midst of heaven, come and gather yourselves together unto the supper of the great God; that ye may eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses, and of them that sit on them, and the flesh of all men, both free and bond, both small and great. And I saw the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered together to make war on him that sat on the horse, and against his army. And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshiped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone." Rev. xix. 11–21.

The book of Revelations is a prophetic and scenic history of the present dispensation. It pictures the agents and the work of the age. It shows very distinctly the contest that Christ will have with the nations while taking possession of his territory and establishing his kingdom. While the events of which we have been speaking, extend beyond the advent, and far into the age of subjugation, still the preliminary movements are anterior to the return of Christ, and, therefore, truly signs.

This will appear evident, when we take into view the fact that all the preparations for the final conflict must transpire before the conflict itself, in which Christ appears. It is the day of God's preparation. Nahum ii. 3.

From Daniel xii. 1, 2, and Ezekiel xxxviii. and xxxix., and Zechariah xiii. and xiv. it would seem that the Jews themselves will be the indirect occasion of much of the national troubles. "And in that day I will make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all people; all that burden themselves with it shall be cut in pieces, though all the people of the earth be gathered together against it." Zech. xii. 3.

It is generally understood that the Jews will dwell in strong numbers in Palestine, before the public manifestation of Christ:

"After many days thou shalt be visited; in the latter years thou (Gog) shalt come in the land that is brought back from the sword, and is gathered out of many people, against the mountains of Israel, which have been always waste; but it is brought forth out of the nations, and they shall dwell safely all of them. Thou shalt ascend and come like a storm; thou shalt be like a cloud to cover the land, thou and all thy bands, and many people with thee. Thus saith the Lord God, it shall also come to pass, that at the same time shall things come into thy mind, and thou shalt conceive a mischievous purpose; and thou shalt say, I will go up to the land of unwalled villages; I will go to them that are at rest, that dwell safely, all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates, to take a spoil, and to take a prey; to turn thine hand upon the desolate places that are now inhabited, and upon the people that are gathered out of the nations, which have gotten cattle and goods, that dwell in the midst of the land. Sheba, and Dedan, and the merchants of Tarshish, with all the young lions thereof, shall say unto thee, Art thou come to take a spoil? hast thou gathered thy company to take a prey? to carry away silver and gold, to take away cattle and goods, to take a great spoil? Therefore, son of man, prophesy and say unto Gog, thus saith the Lord God, In that day when my people of Israel dwelleth safely, shalt thou not know it? And thou shalt come from thy place out of the north parts, thou, and many people with thee, all of them riding upon horses, a great company, and a mighty army: and thou shalt come up against my people of Israel, as a cloud to cover the land; it shall be in the latter days, and I will bring thee against my land, that the heathen may know me when I shall be sanctified in thee, O God, before their eyes. Thus saith the Lord God, art thou he of whom I have spoken in old time by my servants the prophets of Israel, which prophesied in those days many years, that I would bring thee against them? And it shall come to pass at the same time when Gog shall come against the land of Israel, saith the Lord God, that my fury shall come up in my face. For in my jealousy, and in the fire of my wrath, have I spoken, surely in that day there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel; so that the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the heaven, and the beasts of the field, and all creeping things that creep upon the earth, and all the men that are upon the earth, shall shake at my presence; and the mountains shall be thrown down, and the steep places shall fall, and every wall shall fall to the ground. And I will call for a sword against him throughout all my mountains, saith the Lord God, every man's sword shall be against his brother. And I will plead against him with pestilence, and with blood; and I will rain upon him, and upon his bands, and upon the many people that are with him, an overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire, and brimstone. Thus will I magnify myself; and I will be known in the eyes of many nations; and they shall know that I am the Lord." Ezek. xxxviii. 8–23.

The description and overthrow continue through the following chapter. Many inferences may be drawn from our lengthy quotations:

1. The Jews are the people, and the land of Israel the country that are the objects of this invasion by Gog.

2. They are living quietly, and in apparent security—have silver, and gold, cattle, and the products of a lucrative commerce.

3. This land, the people and their wealth, excite the cupidity of Gog.

4. The invasion is on a gigantic scale,—a clear proof that the Jews, the enemies of Gog, were exceedingly powerful, or defended by great national allies; or why bring against the land such countless multitudes?

5. The enlistment and gathering of such a mass from all the east and north, would require great labor and sacrifice.

6. Gog, in his actions, and in all his military movements, indicates that he is under the influence of some fearful forebodings; he does not push his forces (countless as they are) into the plains of Esdraelon, but keeps them among the mountains.

7. There could be no nation, gathering all the north and east into his armies, to invade such an extraordinary land as that of Israel, and to rob such an extraordinary people as the Jews, that would not have had some knowledge of this prophecy of Ezekiel, and, consequently, be under the influence of fear that his forces might be smitten by some invisible agency.

8. The Jews then in the land of Israel, being wealthy, having silver, and gold, cattle and goods, the evidence is in favor of the idea that the Jews, returning to that land, took their wealth with them.

The following is a legitimate supposition: That the policy of the Prime Minister of Great Britain (Gladstone) should carry the idea of universal national freedom, and that it should be decided that a nation should be established in Syria and Palestine as an agent, or commission nation between the east and west—a nation, one in race and interest, but, in language, a Polyglott. What people could fill the bill but the Jews?

Should they accept the agency it would require an immense stock, such as could be furnished only by wealthy Jews such as the Rothschilds and Barrings could command, for what would London, Paris or Berlin be, compared with this new centre of the world? Should they withdraw their funds from the courts of Europe, what would be the financial condition of England, France, Austria, Russia, Turkey, and, in fine, all the nations in Europe, would not their gold and silver be in the hands of the new nation? Russia would have a cause for the invasion.

Practical Christianity.—No. 5.

We unto the world because of offences, for it must needs be that offences come; but we to that man by whom they come. With such a fearful penalty staring us full in the face, who will be offended in Christ, or knowingly or wittingly offend one of Christ's little ones? Yet, how often it is done, and how little we seem to care; with what indifference and how reluctant to make amends for having offended a brother in Christ. How sluggish we are in repairing the breach. It is painfully amusing to witness how many extra excuses men will make rather than frankly confess their wrongs. The King of Israel sets us a good example. After God's prophet had laid his sin upon him he frames or makes no excuse, but frankly confesses his fault,—I have sinned! And, on another occasion, when he had disobeyed the Lord and was brought into a very strait place, he was offered his choice of three sore judgments. He promptly decides,—let us fall into the hands of the Lord, for his mercies are great; let us not fall into the hand of man.

David was a noble specimen or pattern of a man of God. It will pay well to carefully consider and emulate his noble traits of character. Sin leaves a sting behind. His reference to his sin in the cases we have quoted causes a sigh of sadness,—my sin is ever before me,—but his wise choice in falling into the hands of God and patiently enduring the chastisement justly due for his transgressions, shows a manly, yea, a Godlike trait of character, and would eminently adorn and qualify many modern professors to fill their position in the church of God, far better than they do. The king of Israel did not get offended in Christ and go back and walk no more in the way of God's commandments. No; he endured the trial to the end, fell asleep, and was gathered unto his fathers, in the blessed hope, as he expresses it. As for me, I shall behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness.

Let us, in a very brief manner, look at his predecessor, the first king that sat on Israel's throne. God gave Saul to be king at the urgent request of the people in his anger, and took him away in his wrath. The question was asked the writer by an orthodox minister, was King Saul a good man? Yes, was our prompt reply, he had the spirit of God, was amongst the prophets. The record says the spirit of God left him. He had another spirit,—the sequel shows it to be an evil one,—for he seeks counsel from one whom God had strictly forbidden to consult. This is invariably the case when we leave the work and service of God, or are offended in him. Saul was not honest; he was not open and frank as David; he was covetous; he wished to keep the best of the spoils, and tried to hide his greed for gain by a flimsy excuse. Oh, they are for sacrifice unto the Lord. The prophet, as in David's case, confronts him to his face, lays his sin to his charge; but how unlike David! He seeks to justify himself, and says, Oh, I have obeyed the word of the Lord. But the evidence of his guilt was so tangible he could not evade it, but is forced to confess,—I have sinned, and I have played the fool. Its an open confession, but lacks that deep, honest contrition that was so manifest in King David, a man after God's own heart.

In the traits of character in the two first kings of Israel which we have brought before the readers of THE RESTITUTION, there is enough of real solid truth to fill a volume. They both filled a high position. They were both the Lord's anointed. They were both men of ability, and men of valor. A record of their doings is left for our admonition and instruction. We certainly shall be very culpable in the sight of God if we do not profit by a careful study and accept all that is virtuous, noble and good, and reject the wrong by trying to evade or escape their errors. A very important fact stands out prominent, viz.: That they were mortal men in the flesh, and were incapable of governing themselves, or ruling perfectly in the sight of God. How bright the wisdom and glory of God shines forth when we realize his purpose to have the world governed through a kingdom by holy men tried, purified, and made immortal,—incapable of mistake or wrong! How lamentably few are there in the church of God who are the true imitators of David, the noble king of Israel—frankly confess our sins and our wrong doing, put them away, and, like leaders say, Lord, if I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I will restore to him four-fold. Noble principle, heaven-born principle, how honest, how frank and unsolicited, the outburst of true convictions of sin and godly repentance! What power, yea, with what irresistible force would the truth go forth; yea, and what wonders would it accomplish if the members of the body of Christ acted upon and acted out this holy, godlike principle which was so prominent in the character of the sweet singer of Israel?

Let us turn over the leaf and for a moment contemplate the principles and the acts of King Saul; how beclouded his sun goes down at noon! It sets in a thick cloud. Not one glimmering star of hope accompanies his departure. He abdicates Israel's throne in disgrace, as he said in his life, I had played the fool. In his death he was no better. Can it be possible that the men of this age, with such examples and such results, will choose to act as did King Saul? If so, they cannot hope to reap any better reward. How strange, and yet how true, that men will overreach and wrong their brethren, and wash their hands in innocency! They will say, Oh, I have obeyed the word of the Lord! They become very pious and quite benevolent, and take of their dishonest gain to sacrifice unto the Lord, but forget that, to obey, is better than sacrifice. They forget the words of Moses,—and be ye sure your sins will find you out. Love mercy, deal justly, and walk humbly with thy God.

At the request of a dear brother in the One Faith, we have written these five short articles; have done the best we could. If they do not come up to your expectations, you must accept the will for the deed. It is not pleasant to write upon the errors of our brethren. We had much rather spread the mantle of charity over their faults and the mistakes of poor fallen humanity.

In conclusion, we put up a fervent prayer to the God of heaven, that his blessing may be largely shared by the church of God; that the membership may be composed of men and women of clean hands and honest hearts; that his servants who go out to do battle for God and his precious cause may give the gospel trumpet no uncertain sound, but proclaim the whole truth as it is in Jesus. Sound long and loud the last note of warning to an apostate church and a perishing world.

Affectionately and fraternally a servant of Jesus the Christ. May the kingdom of God soon come in power and great glory. Amen.

BREVITIES.

New York pays more for tobacco than for bread. Dealers say that there are smokers in this city who average 100 cigars a week, and men whose cigar bills run up to thousands of dollars per annum.

Of all the nations living under the sceptre of the Czar the Jews are the best educated. The proportion of Jews in Russia is one Jew to every twenty Russians; while in the colleges the proportion of students is one Jewish scholar to every six Russians.

On the 28th ultimo a thunderstorm of extraordinary severity swept over the Mark Brandenburg, in Germany, from Kunersdorf to Koepenick, and several houses in that district were struck by lightning. Among them was the parish church of Fuerstenwalde, a market town not very distant from Berlin. Strange to say, the electric fluid shattered the altar of this venerable edifice, a noted architectural curiosity and justly extolled as a "master piece." Other damage was done in the town, but no lives were lost.

Fires made in stores are forgotten in alarms.

THE RESTITUTION.

B. J. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JUNE 2, 1880.

We hope to have time to answer some letters soon. A variety of pressing cares has taken all our time lately.

REMEMBER that the Quarterly Conference convenes on June 11th, at the Antioch meeting house in Marshall county, Ind.

RECEIPTS have been falling off very considerably for the past few weeks. Will all our friends make an effort to increase our subscription list for the last half of the year?

BRO. P. INNIS, of Sacramento, Cal., desires us to return his grateful thanks through THE RESTITUTION to the many brethren who have written letters of sympathy and condolence to him on account of his late bereavements.

WE clip the following little item from the New York Sun.

Mr. Frederick Tyler of Hartford, Conn., who is now a little more than eighty-five years old, and is in fair health, can remember seeing a man who was born in 1694. It was his own grandfather, Mr. Tyler, who was born in that year and lived until 1796, covering the whole of the eighteenth century with his life.

The Editor of THE RESTITUTION can say almost as much for himself as Mr. Tyler so far as having been an individual who set forth "life" far back in the past is concerned. In 1814, when in the 81st year of his age, he saw a colored woman who was 116 years of age, and who, consequently was born in 1698, only four years later than Mr. Tyler's grandfather. The colored lady's name was Lucy Prince, and she finally attained to the age of 116 years. While Mr. Tyler can say that he has seen a person born 181 years ago the Editor of THE RESTITUTION can say that he has seen a person who was born 177 years ago. At the time of Mrs. Prince's birth there was not a single newspaper published in America, neither was there such a thing as a single post-office on this continent. At the time of her birth the population of the North American colonies did not probably exceed 475,000 as in 1791 it amounted only to 434,000 persons both white and colored. It is probable that there are more inhabitants in the single city of Chicago today, than there were in the whole territory of the United States at the time of her birth exclusive of the aboriginal Indians. The united ages of Mr. Tyler and his grandfather would amount to 187 years, while the united ages of Mrs. Prince and the Editor of THE RESTITUTION, amounts to 197 years; as, 116+81 = 197, and 116+81 = 197. Where is the third person who can claim to have seen one in two more, 200 years ago?

THE following short notices of the press show the tendencies of thoughtful minds at the present time. The reaction against the terrible doctrine of eternal misery is becoming strong, and, like the agitation a few years ago about slavery, bids fair to become "an irrepressible conflict." The grand hinderance in the way of a general reception of the Bible teaching on human destiny is the "opprobrium theologicum" that has been heaped upon all the advocates of eternal life through Jesus Christ alone. Our probation in this life is a trial for endless existence in the future, and the award of this existence is made dependent upon the moral character we form in our probationary career:

"The Rev. Dr. King has thrown a bombshell into the Methodist General Conference in the shape of a preamble and resolution. The preamble first cites that passage in the Address of the Bishops in which a sharp condemnation is hurled at those Methodist preachers who disseminate doctrines contrary to the standards of the Church. It then sets forth the fact that one of the Bishops whose names appear at the bottom of this address has, since the General Conference of 1876, published a book, entitled 'Beyond the Grave,' which 'contains things hard to be understood,' and which has been criticised by several church publications as contradicting the Holy Scriptures, the Apostles' Creed and the Articles of Religion. The resolution calls upon the Committee on the Episcopacy to examine the book and report to the General Conference. Of course it was referred without debate. The first impulse of the members of the committee will probably be to quietly smother it, or at least to hold back the report until the last moment, when there will be no time left for discussion, and to then 'draw it mild'—as mild as possible. Yet if a bishop has been teaching heresy, it is a serious business."

ROCHESTER, May 25.—A sermon on eternal punishment, which was preached by the Rev. Myron Adams in Plymouth Congregational Church, in this city, last Sunday evening, is stirring up the greatest religious sensation which has reigned in western New York for the last fifty years. Stated briefly, the clergyman disavowed all his previous teachings pointing to an orthodox hell of permanent duration, advocating the doctrine of annihilation for the wicked, and characterized as "an unjust God, a moloch," any being who would create others in his own image and then torture them throughout eternity. To-day and this evening half a dozen of the most prominent orthodox clergymen of Rochester, representing as many different denominations, have preached very radical sermons in opposition to this new Congregational theory. Each of these clergymen has addressed a crowded congregation, and now affirmative and negative arguments concerning the orthodox hell constitute the one absorbing topic of conversation on the streets, in public places, through the columns of the local press, and in almost every cottage and mansion in the city. The Rev. Myron Adams sticks to his text, and in both sermons he delivered upon the theory which he advanced last Sunday.

Daily Living.

FROM MY NOTE BOOK OF EXPERIENCE.

Jesus had no funeral display. How wasteful and wicked the funeral pomps of modern times! Orthodox societies send abroad missionaries under the mistaken hope of the worlds' conversion despite the error; no doubt they do good in saying men. He who cherishes resentment toward men, will be apt to complain of divine dealing. Prayer for God's power to make those who have injured us better, will be likely to be heard. Unless we believe before receiving, will we believe after? If we have not faith, will we offer praise? How hard are the condemnations of conscience! As a child frets and is restless in its mother's arms, so Christians often seem to rest imperfectly in God. Happy in sorrow that has no anger in it. Does not true faith involve praise, even before receiving? God refuses to bless prayers that are without faith, that he may teach and establish faith. By faith we know that God highly appreciates our needs and requests. O Lord, please open heaven in thy hand! And many gifts, a good heart is an excellent balance wheel. How important to reject evil ones, the first thought of unbelief! How often the perverse unbelief is prone to start up in anger or murmuring, under trials! If a man ask something

Shelter of the Rock.

The Evening Brings Us Home.

Upon the hills the wind is dark and cold,
The sweet young grass is killed by the early frost,
And we, O Lord, have wandered from Thy fold!
But evening brings us home.

Among the sad-eyed we shall find our friends,
Where the broken-hearted gather;
But evening brings us home.

The [illegible] and our leader not
And sad and lonely and the lambs repeat
Their pitiful complaining that rest is sweet
When evening brings us home.

We have been wounded by the hunter's dart;
Our feet are sore, and our hearts
Sore for Thy coming, when the night departs
At eventide, bring us home.

The shadows gather through the gloom and mist
Here in sadness. We have wandered far
With all the sun; we know not where we are
At evening bring us home.

The [illegible] are round us and the wolves
Our Good, dear Shepherd, leave us not to perish
In the wide night; our early footsteps slacken;
At evening bring us home.

LETTER DRAWER.

Editor Restitution:—We enter upon the restoration of Israel with a restoration of the prophetic interrogatory of the prophet Isaiah. "Who is this that cometh from Edom? with dyed garments from Bozrah? this that is glorious in his apparel, traveling in the greatness of his strength."

I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save. The church of England appoints this portion of the divine word to be read on Monday after Easter. Bishop Andrews spiritualizes it of the resurrection and the overthrowing of the powers of darkness by Christ. We incline to the opinion that, according to the 34th and 35th ch., as also Rev. xix. The "bathing of his sword in heaven, his putting on the garments of vengeance," and his treading the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God, we are fully justified in applying it to the future and final restoration of Israel, by the Captain of Salvation after his second advent. But he will not save without much blood shed. The Apostle John speaks of him as being clothed in vesture dipped in like blood. This will be owing to the opposition of the nations to the return of Israel to their country. The kings of the earth will set themselves and the rulers will take counsel together against such an enterprise which will give rise to an aggressive movement. Thus will Jacob be stirred up, and the remnant shall be among the Gentiles in the midst of many people as a lion among the beasts of the forest, as a young lion among the flocks of sheep: who if he go through, both treadeth down, and teareth to pieces, and none can deliver. Again says Micah the prophet. Thine hand shall be lifted up upon thine adversaries, and all thine enemies shall be cut off. The Lord also shall war out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem, and the heavens and the earth shall shake, but the Lord—the hope of his people and the strength of the children of Israel. Their restoration will be according to their first coming up out of Egypt, which was forty years; and, long or short be the return, marvellous things will be shown by the good hand of the Lord upon them. The nations shall see and be confounded at all their might, and shall lick the dust like serpents.

Judah and Israel are associated together in a number of the prophecies as participants in the blessing of being restored to their land and united as one people. Yet much time will elapse before their union is accomplished. Judah with Christ seated upon the throne of David is the kingdom of the stone which smites Gog upon the mountains of Israel and then proceeds to make war upon the nations; as it is in Micah iv. Arise and thresh O daughter of Zion! for I will make thine horn iron, and I will make thy hoofs brass, and thou shalt beat in pieces many people.

Similar language is used in reference to Jacob by Isaiah xli. 16. But with Judah at his goodly horse in battle and his battle-bow filled with Ephraim, the Captain of the Lord's hosts will move forward triumphantly. Thus will the subjugation of the nations be accomplished and all Israel restored. Our position in reference to these coming events is that of soldiers equiping ourself for the war. If we are found worthy we shall be promoted to some post of honor in the gift of the Master. He now tarries within the veil that no stray sheep may be lost upon the dark mountains of sin; that the five talents may be doubled; and that he who has one one talent may have time to wrap it up and to lay it away in a napkin. Not that he desires such a result, but to such he will say when he comes, Thou wicked and slothful servant, and will cast him into outer darkness.

CHRISTADELPHIAN.

[illegible]

Editor to Restitution:—I am more and more pleased with our paper; yes, I say our paper, for it is the very preacher the children of God needs to dig into the hidden treasures of Divine truth and hold them up before men, that others may also glorify our heavenly Father. We know that it is written and we certainly believe that Jesus is coming quickly like a thief (not to steal, but) to raise the dead, and change the living, and all caught away quick as the lightning flash. Perhaps this will be one of the grandest scenes to the saints to all eternity, and yet the world know nothing of it, but they will know when Jesus comes after with all his saints to establish, set up his kingdom and govern the world in righteousness. Let us all who are looking for Jesus join in his petition that the will of God may be done on earth as it is done in heaven. Waiting in patience for Jesus.

JEHEZEKEL TALMAN.

Editor Restitution:—Had it not been for your kindness in the continuation of my paper I should not again have been guilty of procrastination, for, rather than do without the reading of such Scriptural harmony, its warnings and hope is to diligence in faith unto the coming of our Lord and Master, I should have redoubled my efforts and sent much earlier. As regards the few of us here who profess to walk with God in the One Faith, are earnest, progressive and hopeful of a glorious inheritance; and with all, we are not unmindful of sowing the seeds of truth whenever it seems befitting among the various other seeds, which, in the great conflict for firm rooting. The agitation is not marked by any very great success, and yet, it seems, that the presence of the supposed enemy is not quite so odious among them, and when they fully realize what a true and beautiful friend instead, they will joyfully clasp hands. May we not be weary in waiting that glad hour.

Yours, in the One Faith,

MRS. J. F. COOPER.

SELECTIONS.

[New Era, March 1.]

Prophecies Concerning the Land, Nation, and King of Israel, Not Yet Fulfilled.

And then shall they see the Son of Man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. Luke xxi 27

Of all the interesting events of the future the coming of the Son of Man, with power and great glory, is the one which should most concern Christians; for then the dead in Christ are to be raised incorruptible, and the living in Christ are to be changed, and both caught away together in clouds to meet him in the air, and so be ever with him, made like him, and so enabled to see him as he is. Any one could see him as he was, when a carpenter in Nazareth, or when speaking in the synagogue, but only those who shall be made like him, shall see him in the great glory he now has, and in which he will appear, we know not how soon. Israel could not look upon the face of Moses, for the glory of his countenance, when he came down from the divine presence on Sinai, much less shall flesh and blood be able to see the Lord in his glory, which "excelleth" that of Moses, when he shall come down from the right hand of his God and Father. Just, however, as angels have the power of veiling their glory, so as to appear as, and be mistaken for, ordinary men; so it would seem that the Lord Jesus also shall show himself to men in the flesh, in the future, even as he did to those of Israel who ate and drank with him after he rose from the dead. Yes, just as Thomas was privileged to put his finger into the print of the nails, and to thrust his hand into the Lord's side, that he might believe, so it shall be the privilege of that people who pierced him, hereafter to see him, and mourn over the sight as one mourneth for an only son. Zech. xii. 10.

But our Lord in speaking of the signs of his coming, says, "then." Let us look back to the previous verses in order to see what "then" means. In the 24th and 29th verses, he speaks of Jerusalem being "trodden down of the Gentiles," not forever, but only "until the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled." His coming then, is not during the times of Gentile dominancy over Jerusalem; but at or after their termination. He then speaks of "signs in the sun, moon and stars." The sun, moon and stars signify here, as oft elsewhere, "the powers of heaven," "principalities and powers," rulers, kings, princes, and notabilities, placed in authority as rulers over the earth, or peoples. Among these, our Lord said, "there shall be signs." Further on he says, "the powers of heaven shall be shaken." Shaken signifies removed, abolished, according to Heb. xii. 27, where, too, the shaking of a "heaven" is referred to. How significant, then, are the words, "the powers of heaven shall be shaken," especially as a sign of Christ's coming.

Another sign preceding the shaking of the powers of heaven is "distress of nations with perplexity." Pregnant words, to thinking people! But what follows is even more alarming to those who understand the Scripture symbolical language: "The sea and the waves roaring" signifies the nations, the masses, in an uproar, and implies revolutions, nihilism, socialism, communism, internationalism, tumultuous gatherings of peoples, raging and foaming against kings and rulers! Naturally enough follows verse 26 of this deeply interesting prophecy: "Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken." "Time of trouble such as never was" Dan. xii. 1 does all this betoken. What next? "And then shall they see the Son of Man coming in a cloud, with power and great glory."

In view of these things the Son of God counsels his disciples as follows. "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. For as a snare shall it come upon all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth. Watch, therefore, and pray always that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man." How significant the exhortation to take heed and watch, because as a snare shall these things take people, coming upon them unawares. Let Christians beware how they connect themselves with societies whose aim is revolution. These things must come to pass, as the Lord's words cannot pass away unaccomplished, but wisdom tells her children what path to take in order to avoid the snare.—Watch.

Sprinkling Clean Water.

Then will I sprinkle clean (religious sense) water upon you, and ye shall be clean (cleansed from all your uncleanness—as in v. 29, and from all your idols will I cleanse, same words as before) you. Ezek. xxxvi. 25.

Now, what water can this be? In answering this question, I assume that all such language in the prophets has its basis in the law, and can only be interpreted soundly by paying due regard to such a connection. Any one who refuses me this assumption may stop here. Those who grant it may go on.

Assuming this reference, then, I ask attention to the circumstance that there is in all the Mosaic Law no such thing as a sprinkling with mere water. There is a sprinkling with blood, with oil, with blood and water, with water and heifer ashes, but will mere water, never. The reason of this is, to my mind, obvious enough. The thing has no significancy, and therefore is not fitted to be a symbol. But, whatever be the reason, such is the fact.

Blood and water. You find this in the purification for leprosy. Lev. xiv. 51.

Heifer ashes and water. Numbers xix. This is spoken of as a purification for sin (v. 9). For these three words the original expression is one, the sin-offering. So in verse 12, if we had a verb to "sin-offer," it would exactly answer to the expression purify himself. Again in verse 17, purification for sin is simply sin-offering; and in 19, 20, the "purify" is, may I say, to "sin-offer." Thus the water of (or for) separation, that is to say, the water for the cleansing and restoring of the man who, because of contact with the dead, has been separated from the company of the living—this is nothing less than water of sin-offering. It is the virtue of the slain and burnt heifer that now resides in that water. This might be pursued further, but I forbear—having to do at present not with theology but with fact.

One case more will complete all that I am aware of in regard to the sprinkling with water in the law. Numbers viii. 7—sprinkle water of purifying upon them. Let us hope that our new translation will restore to us the divine words, water of sin-offering. And what water of sin-offering does Moses know of other than that in chap. xix?

In defence of baptismal sprinkling, in spite of all this, I can quite imagine the plea we can grant what you say and use it too; for the baptismal water has reference in the very first place to the blood of the sin-offering, and therefore may well be sprinkled. That, I reply, is another matter. Meanwhile you are professing to build on Ezekiel, and Ezekiel, I plead, knew nothing of sprinkling with mere water, whatever the reference. His "clean water" is that of some Mosaic ordinance, with all the significancy that that reference could impart. Your sprinkled water is a thing of human invention, and unknown as the mode of Christian baptism for many an age.

Jerusalem.

Among the many meanings which have been assigned for the name of Jerusalem, the following have found most favor: Possession of Peace, Inheritress of Peace, Foundation of Peace, and Vision of Peace. Such an interesting city must have a name of great significance. The city was first called Salem. Some say this word means "summit," and is derived from a verb meaning "to be high." Were it not for several other considerations such critics would doubtless endeavor to account for the word Jerusalem in as dry and uninteresting a way. If, as part of the longer word just mentioned, Salem means "peace," does it not as the speculative of the city with whom the name of Melchizedec is associated? A good exponent says, in Hebrew vii. 2, that Melchizedec was first by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that also king of Salem, which is king of peace. This is very satisfactory. This city was afterwards called Jebus, which means trodden down. Judah could not drive the Jebusites from the city, but David succeeded in doing so. What the meaning of that most expressive name, Jerusalem? In some measure the city enjoyed peace when the period of its down-treading by the Jebusites was ended. It realized the blessing foreshadowed in its former name, Salem. Surely Jerusalem is also a name of prophetic import; and the syllables of the word should be parted and accounted for with the least possible addition or alteration; also, of course, in accordance with the genius of the language, and in the light of Scripture history. From this city Peace will be spoken to the nations; it will be the habitation of Peace, Righteousness, and Holiness.

This Salem comes from שָׁלוֹם (shalom) and means "peace"—prosperity of every kind. How do we account for יָרָה (yarah) Does it not come from רוּד (ravah) "to pour upon in floods?" Jerusalem then is equal to saying, "He (Jehovah) will pour peace on thee in floods;" or "He will flood thee with prosperity." In view of this interpretation of the word, read Isaiah lxvi. 10, 12: "Make joyful with Jerusalem, and be glad for her, all ye that love her; rejoice mightily over her, all ye who mourn for her; for thus saith Jehovah: Behold I will turn peace upon her like a river, and the glory of the nations like an overflowing torrent." The same Hebrew verb from which the word Jebus is derived, is used to designate the present trending-down of Jerusalem. Here is an instance, the words being, of course, prophetic when spoken: "The people of thy holiness have possessed it but a little while; our adversaries have trodden down thy sanctuary." Isaiah lxiii. 18. When David drove the Jebusites from the consecrated spot, it was called "the city of David." There comes however, one from the way of Edom, who shall again clear the city of its spoilers, and then it shall be called Jehovah Shammah—Jehovah is there. Then there will be no necessity to call the city by her prophetic name, for she will be the city of Jehovah, the Zion of the Holy One of Israel.—J. W. T.

Diphtheria in Russia.

Diphtheria continues to rage as an epidemic throughout Russia. The Government has taken the true matter to heart, and a sum of $300,000 has just been allotted to assist the hospitals which have been established by the local authorities in various districts of the Empire. One of the difficulties of the situation, however, is to find a sufficient number of doctors. The smallness of the salaries which can be paid, and the rough life which has to be endured when traveling about the villages in the interior of Russia, render any but young men unwilling to undertake the service. The dread of the Liberal and Socialist tendencies, which have manifested themselves so strongly among the medical students at the universities, has caused the Government of late years to put every obstacle in the way of youths desiring to enter the medical profession. This short-sighted policy is now showing its natural results, and the cry on all sides is that there are no doctors.

RESTITUTION FUND.

AVILON, Fulton Co., Ind., Nov. 22, 1879.

Elder Restitution:—With your permission I will make an appeal to the Brotherhood for help to replenish the RESTITUTION for the year 1880 and insure its weekly visits.

Now, dear brethren, I call upon one and all who feel the need we all have to sustain the cause of Christ the great amount of $4.00 between this and the first of January.

Dear brethren, we could do this with a few exceptions, if we had thought so. I am well aware that some brethren have contributed nobly, but I make this appeal in a special manner to those who have heretofore done nothing as a free-will offering.

Dear brother, do not say, I am too poor! Perhaps you are using that foolish weed, tobacco, in some form. Consider for one moment are we who claim to be the chosen of God so poverty stricken that we cannot support a weekly paper.

We do hope that every one will respond to this appeal. Please let us hear from all those who cannot or will not pay the $4.00, and will they please give us their excuse. I am also a poor man. My name is Abraham Penrose I am 72 years old and have a large family to support. I have a small farm of 10 acres. I farm and work at the carpenter's trade to support my family. I use neither tobacco nor intoxicating drinks.

And, dear Editor, I will confine [illegible] communication. I trust we shall hear from you all in the [illegible] &c.

Fraternally,

POETRY.

[London Christian.]

"I Come Quickly."

When ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars, be ye not troubled, for such things must needs be.—Mark.

He is coming—coming quickly,
To this sorrow-stricken earth;
Though the shadows fall so darkly
Over the land which gave Him birth;
Though the vine-clad hills of Judah
Lie in misty darkness dim,
Stretching out no hands of greeting
Eagerly to welcome Him.

He is coming—coming quickly,
And his feet once more shall rest,
On the dusky hilltops shaded—
Purple-crowned Olivet;
For where once she stood, rejected,
Where, for man, as man He bled,
He shall stand the mystified o'er,
Mighty Savior, Son of God.

He is coming! Though the millions
Whom He came and died to save,
Of this advent all unheeding,
Earthly honor do but crave;
They, the Prince of Peace forgetting,
Foaming out their earth-born rage,
Each and all the other trotting,
Bloody war and tumult rage.

He is coming! Like the light ning,
Shining out from east to west,
He will come—through clouds of darkness—
Son of Righteousness confirmed;
For these years, and darkening rumors,
Are but thunder-claps before;
Lord Jehovah's voice is speaking,
"Jesus Christ is at the door!"

He is coming! They who listen
Hear the thrilling golden bells;
See the distant white robes glisten
Which the High Priest's advent tell;
Smell the sweet pomegranate's fragrance
Stealing on the lotus's grace;
Know the spotless feet are pressing,
Lingering willing still to space.

He is coming—quickly coming,
All the crooked to make plain;
Much—so much—has yet entangled,
He will set it right again;
And his hands, once stretched in pleading,
Now will open wide to bless,
With the peace of God reigning,
Those who do his name confess.

He is coming! And the trumpet
Mightily afar shall sound,
Calling to the wondrous meeting
All who rest in Christ in ground.
Then, while kings of earth are waging
Fiercest wars 'gainst mighty Ono,
He will call his chosen to Him—
"Come beloved! Enter in."

Then—though waves of sea are roaring,
Men's hearts failing them for fear,
Looking for the things which, coming,
Cast forshadows dark and drear—
We will trust that our redemption,
Predicted long, is drawing nigh;
For they say to patient watchers,
"Christ the Lord is coming by."

He is coming—yet so quickly;
He may come perhaps to-day;
It may be the last war-rumor
Has been sent from far away;
We may hear Him any moment,
Calling all his ransomed home,
He is coming—coming quickly!
Even so, Lord Jesus, come!

COMMUNICATIONS.

Notes of Travels and Labors.

J. M. STEPHENSON.

Since my last report I have visited Busseyville, Magnolia, Eureka and Waupaca, Wisconsin, Gospel Grove and Pierceton, Indiana, Buchanan and Stevensville, Michigan, and Delta, Ohio. Have visited Busseyville twice, having good and interesting meetings, as we always have. Meetings at Magnolia were held in the M. E. church. Congregations and interest good. By invitation I delivered the first discourse in Waupaca, Sunday morning in the Congregational church to a fair and very attentive audience. Subject: Gospel of the Kingdom. Several members of that church are favorable to our views on the nature of man and the kingdom. The same may be affirmed of the Baptist church. Their pastor, Mr. Kutchins, is investigating. The afternoon of the same day Bro. Scott and I attended a grand temperance rally. Being called out by the president, I lectured on the responsibility of those who legalize vending alcoholic liquors which are filling the land with drunkards, and a great host of widows and worse than orphan children—which makes more thieves, robbers, burglars, lunatics and murderers than all other causes combined. At the roll call of these rumvenders rise up a great army of six hundred thousand drunkards chanting the wild dirge:—

"We come, we come, in sad array
And in procession long,
To join the army that is fed,
Three hundred thousand strong.

Our manner's beckoning down to death,
Abroad we have unrolled,
And famine, care and wan despair
Are seen upon its fold.

We come, we come, we've searched the land,
The rich and poor are ours,
Enlisted from the circles of God,
From novels and from towers.

We come, we come, to fill the grave,
On which shall rise no star,
Then shout aloud the war cry brave,
Hurra! hurra! hurra!"

Shall any of your fathers, brothers, or sons be seen under this black banner which is beckoning down to a drunkard's grave, on which no star of hope shall rise?—for God affirms that no drunkard shall inherit his kingdom. If such be the fearful responsibility resting upon the heads of the drunkard, what shall be said of the responsibility and consequent guilt of the man who makes drunkards, and those who legalize this nefarious traffic? Life is the richest boon heaven has conferred upon man, and yet rum-sellers kill with slow poison and torturous deaths a great army of sixty thousand every year. Yet all who legalize this diabolical traffic are responsible as far as human responsibility can go for every tear and sigh, every widow and orphan, and death—and all the accumulated crimes committed under the direful effects of intoxicating liquors; for those who vote license and thus throw the broad shield of law over it to protect and uphold it; and thus they legalize and make reputable the most diabolical traffic in the world—a traffic which ought to be looked upon with utter loathing and contempt by all the virtuous, the pure, the noble and good of earth. The men who vote license, and thus legalize this diabolical business are just as responsible before God and man as their agents who stand behind the counter and deal out tears, and sighs, and groans, and widows, and orphans, and theft, robbery and murder by the jug, the bottle and the dram. It is axiomatic in law that what a man does by his agent he does himself. Those who legalize this traffic are just as much more responsible than rum-sellers as they are more enlightened and make a louder profession of religion, honesty or common decency. Surely the world have a right to expect better things of them. The awful responsibility involved in this unrighteous traffic is not limited to the sphere of the present existence, terrible as are its effects, but it transmits its deadly virus from generation to generation through the far reaching future, vitiating the blood and transmitting an insatiate appetite for strong drink in unborn millions, with all drunkards who are so unfortunate as to be the fathers of children.

Why should alcoholic liquors be the exception to the laws regulating the sale and use of one of the most virulent poisons? Is it because it is the slowest, the most subtle and insidious, and therefore least suspected until its fatal toils are about its victim and its deadly fangs are in his vitals? This is the very reason why it should be guarded with the most rigid penalties for manufacturing or vending it unless for mechanical and medical purposes. Why limit license to all deadly drugs? Why not legalize the sale and use of all deadly weapons irrespective of character or conduct also? Why not grant license to desperadoes to arm themselves with small arms such as rifles, revolvers, swords and spears, to blow out the brains, pierce the heart or inflict a deadly wound on every man with whom they shall find a few pennies or dimes? The same principle is involved in the present license law, and in voting license to legalize one, that would be in voting license to legalize the other.

Suppose a peaceful city should be surrounded by a band of robbers, and the city council were invested with authority to legalize robbery and murder if necessary to carry out the decrees of the proper authority; and suppose that the city should be rifled of large sums of money and millions in property; and thousands should be killed, and thousands should be maimed for life, would not that city council be just as responsible, and just as guilty before God and man as the bandit robbers? Just so in reference to the man who enact laws legalizing the sale of intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage, or the men who vote license to sell the deadly drug. The men who make the law, the men who sell the liquid, barring fire of death, and the men who license them to do so are equally guilty. If this deadly poison will be sold never a drop shall be sold on my responsibility.

Our meetings in Waupaca, after Sunday, were held in Music Hall, commencing the following Wednesday, and continuing over the following Saturday. So much was going on in the city and the prejudice against our views was so strong that our congregations were not very large. Good attention and interest were manifested throughout. I learn from Bro. Scott that my labors were not in vain. All we can do is to sow the good seed broadcast, leaving the results in the hands of God, hoping that some fruit may be gathered in the kingdom.

I next visited Gospel Grove, in Indiana, continuing over Saturday, Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday evenings. We held three meetings on Sunday. The meetings were quite well attended except Monday evening. Good will from all appearances result from these meetings. Seed was sown which may germinate and bring forth fruit in the kingdom of God. There are a number investigating in that community whom it is believed will soon obey. They have a plain, commodious house, and enough brethren and friends to support a conference. The Wednesday evening after closing the meeting at Gospel Grove, I preached in the Universalist meeting house at Pierceton to quite a respectable congregation. We continued meetings over Friday evening. The congregations were not large but the attention and interest were good from first to last. Accompanied with Brother and Sister Wince I went through the rain-storm to a little lake about two miles from Pierceton, and immersed Mrs. Stephens in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Others are expected to follow sister Stephens' example. These delays are dangerous, as life is too uncertain and the interests are too great to run risks. The prospects at Pierceton are not as discouraging as when I was there some years ago. Through the indefatigable efforts of Brother and Sister Wince a number are investigating, and some were almost ready to act.

I next visited Brethren Estous' neighborhood, about four miles south of Delta, Fulton county, Ohio. Preached to large, attentive, and manifestly interested congregations, from Saturday till the following Wednesday evenings, having delivered six discourses, being both practical and doctrinal which experience has taught me is the most efficient mode of presenting truth. All doctrine is like living on nothing but strong meat. The head, heart and affections must all be fed to develop normal Christian characters. Quite a number are investigating, and were, as the brethren supposed ready, had opportunity been offered to have obeyed. I know of no place where the prospects are more encouraging than there. Notwithstanding the busy season the school house was well filled.

Last Saturday evening and the following Sunday I preached four times at Eureka, Wisconsin to good congregations, at the three meetings on Sunday. They were select congregations; six put on Christ by baptism; and there are as many more whom I am satisfied understand the Gospel and intend to be baptized. There are, with the last addition about, twenty-five substantial members, most of who have remained steadfast in the faith for twenty years. Three of those who obeyed last Sunday have been in the faith for many years. I feel greatly encouraged with the prospects of much good being accomplished in Eureka and vicinity.

SELECTIONS.

[Selected.]

"Thy King Cometh."

Earth is in rebellion, and is subject to misrule. In the beginning God gave to man dominion and appointed him to be the earth's ruler; but the rules turned to be a rebel, and from that time to this the world has been subject to strifes and disorders of every kind. Above it hangs "a flying scroll" on which is written the curse of God against sin and disobedience. The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all unrighteousness. Instead of peace, earth has turmoil; its governments for ages have been temporary expedients for the restraining of lawlessness and disorder, and the chastisement of sinful people, by rulers no less sinful than themselves. Every form of government has been tried and has failed. The administration of Adam, the first ruler, ended in revolt. The antediluvian period, with its unity of race and uniformity of language, developed such a growth of vice and lust and ungodliness that the deluge was required to prevent the utter corruption of the race. The patriarchal administration of government afforded no better results; and from that time down, the various forms of human administration, tribal, regal, imperial, ecclesiastical, republican, confederate, and communistic, have all proved defective, each containing the elements of its own decay, the materials for its own destruction.

Governments by conquerors are cruel and unsparing; governments established on the principle of hereditary succession fail through the decay of ruling families or the restiveness of misgoverned people; governments based upon suffrage are tainted and destroyed by the corruption of the masses who control them; ecclesiastical governments are usually among the worst, they being administered by childless ecclesiastics who have never learned to govern anything; while governments born of communistic ignorance and violence may be regarded as possessing the worst features of mob rule, and proving destructive alike to the rulers and the ruled.

Meanwhile a crushed and bleeding humanity pours forth cries that cannot be hushed, and yearns with unuttered and unutterable longings for the reign of truth and righteousness and peace, where might and right shall no longer be antagonistic; where wisdom shall not be linked with wickedness; where injustice shall no more bear sway, and iniquity shall no longer be enthroned; where God shall be honored, and man, his creature, shall enjoy the blessings and benefits of a control, wise, beneficient, and kind.

But this cannot occur under the existing state of things. Mankind are, to a great extent, in love with misrule. They hate their friends and love their enemies. They have killed God's prophets and digged down his altars, and have sent a wailing ear to the words of deceivers and wrong-doers. The best men that have lived on earth have often fared the worst. Righteous Abel dies a martyr, while Cain lives to build a city and found a nation. Barabbas the robber is released and honored, while Christ the Savior is crucified between two thieves. There is no help in man. God from heaven has looked down to see if there were any that were righteous, and has declared that "all have gone out of the way," that there was "none righteous, no not one."

In such a case man's only hope must be in the living God, and he is the messenger of that God who cries in the ears of lost humanity, "Behold, thy King cometh!" Above the tumult of the heathen that rage, and the people that imagine vanity, the Lord Most High proclaims, "Yet have I set my King upon my Holy Hill of Zion," and declares that he will give him the "nations for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession." Psa. ii.

[Progress Times.]

A Lesson Learned at the Potter's House.

In the economy of redemption as the parts, when properly understood in their relation to the whole, will be found to agree together. One of the principle methods whereby God makes himself and his purposes known to mankind has been by his dispensations toward the children of Israel. The people were taken into a special covenant when the Lord brought them out of the land of Egypt, and gave them his law at Sinai, saying, "Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice, indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people; for all the earth is mine; and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation." Ex. xix. 5, 6. In this covenant, called the Old or Sinaitic covenant, God promised to them, as a nation in the flesh, the kingdom of heaven and its glory, on condition of their obedience to the law or decalogue, of which the Sabbath was made a special sign. The keeping of that was to be made the test of their obedience. And Psa. lxxxi. 13, 16, God says, "O that my people had hearkened unto me, and Israel had walked in my ways! I should soon have subdued their enemies, and turned my hand against their adversaries. The haters of the Lord should have submitted themselves unto him; but their time should have endured forever. He should have fed them also with the finest of the wheat; and with honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee." Showing that their state would have been one of permanent exhaltation and blessedness if they had been obedient. They should have inherited the kingdom as its kings and priests, and all nations should have served them.

But, in all their generation, they broke the law and came short of the glory of God. None of them were obedient. God looked down from heaven to see if any obeyed his law, and there was none that did good, no, not one. And their sin and punishment is the subject of Jer. xvii. 1-4, which concludes thus: "And thou, even thyself, shalt discontinue from thine heritage that I gave thee; and I will cause thee to serve thine enemies in a land which thou knowest not; for ye have kindled a fire in mine anger which shall burn forever"—that is, during the Christian age, the time of their great tribulation. The covenant made with them at Sinai was utterly broken and abrogated when they rejected Jesus and demanded his crucifixion, and in view of it Jesus said to them, "The kingdom of heaven shall be taken from you and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." Matt. xxi. 43. And so it is taken from the nation of Israel in the flesh to be given, not to any other nation in the flesh, for their trial demonstrated the truth that by the deeds of the law no flesh living could be justified, but to the saints of God, consisting of all believers in Christ, whether Jews or Gentiles, who are designated "a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people." 1 Peter ii. 9. And to these Jesus says, "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Luke xii. 32. And these shall sing the new song in which they shall say "Thou hast redeemed us by thy blood, and hast made us kings and priests unto God, and we shall reign on earth." Rev. v. 9, 10.

But what is to become of Israel? Shall the promise to Abraham utterly fail in reference to his natural seed? Certainly not. The gifts and calling of God are without repentance. They are sure. Hence, God bade Jeremiah go down into the pottery, and there hear the word of the Lord. And when he went down, behold the potter wrought a work on the wheel. And the vessel that he made of clay was marred in the hand of the potter, so he made it again, another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it. And the word of the Lord came, saying, "O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as this potter? Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand, so are ye in my hand, O house of Israel." Jer. xviii. 1-6. From which we learn that the Lord has supreme power over all nationalities, and can pluck up and pull down, or plant and build up according to his own will, though always in accordance with his infinite benevolence and rectitude, and the free agency and accountability of mankind. And so Israel, having been put under the covenant of law with the promise of being made a kingdom of priests on condition of obedience, and having come short of the promised glory by their disobedience, shall be made a nation in a subordinate relation in the future kingdom. This making of them another vessel as seemeth good to him to make, is set forth in Jer. [illegible] xxxi. 37-42, and Ezek. [illegible] And when a man bows to [illegible] which God, that Book becomes food to his soul. He can feed on it then; there is something to feed on. He gets life from it; he gets power, and he gets something that tells him how he can get victory over himself. I consider that the greatest triumph a man can have in this world. A man that knows how to rule himself is greater than he that taketh a city. Look at the misery and woe that has come into the world through that one door—men and women that cannot control themselves, that cannot control their tempers, their lusts, their passions and their appetites. That Book tells me how I can get victory over myself; and it is the only Book in the wide world that can tell a man how to get a victory over himself. I haven't time to dwell upon that excuse any longer."

To Mr. "I. C. P.," of Ursa, Ill.

In your article published in the Quincy Whig, (of May 13,) in which you attempt to ridicule "hell," you do not discriminate between the hell preached by Catholic and Protestant churches and the hell of the Bible. I am willing you shall "wipe out," with the help of "Mr. Beecher," the ancient, historic hell of Pagans, the purgatory. These must all be brought in, and the dentile dispensation end, before the Deliverer shall come to Zion; before the dispersed Israel shall be gathered and made a nation again in the land promised to Abraham and his seed; except that sufficient of the Jews must be restored to Jerusalem to become a nation again, as a sign that the Gentile times are fulfilled. The present state of affairs in the East, and the agitation of the Jewish question, indicate that the time draweth nigh.—J. C. W.

SENTENTIOUS PARAGRAPHS.

A blithe heart makes a blooming visage.

One bad example spoils many good precepts.

The evidence of true holiness is, hatred to, mourning over and forsaking of sin.

"Thy will, not mine"—though fondest hopes must perish,
And earthly joys, which filled my heart, decay;
Though brightest dreams, that memory forced to cherish,
At the rude touch of sorrow flee away.

If persons would take to themselves a little of the good advice they are so willing to give to others, it would do no harm.

There is no worship where there is no joy. For worship is something more than either the fear of God or the love of him. It is delight in him. —F. W. Faber.

Fear not, trembling believer. The bark which bears thy spiritual destinies is in better hands than thine; a golden chain of covenant love links it to the throne. He who holds it in his hands gives thee this as the pledge of thy safety; "Because I live, ye shall live also."

Never a day is given,
But it tones the after years,
And it carries up to heaven
Its sunshine or its tears;
While the to-morrows stand and wait
The silent salute by the outer gate.

There is no end to the sky,
And the stars are everywhere,
And time is eternity,
And the here is ever there;
For the common deeds of the common day
Are ringing bells in the far-away.

Experience is the Lord's school; and they who are taught by him usually learn by the mistakes they make that they have no wisdom, and by the slips and falls they meet with, that they have no strength.—John Newton.

There is no trial so severe but God's grace is sufficient, no night so dark that the light of his countenance cannot dispel the gloom; no sorrow so deep that his voice cannot soothe and comfort; none lying so low his hand cannot reach them; none so weak but in him they may be strong.

Therefore look up; be of good cheer;
The day of peace and rest is near;
A few more weeks of hope and fears,
Of light and darkness, joy and tears,
And we with all the blest shall come
To "our reward, our crown, our home."

It was a very pretty reply made by a little girl to the statement she heard made that our Savior was never seen to smile. "Didn't he say, 'Suffer little children to come unto me?' And they would not have come unless he had smiled."

He leads us on
Through all the mingled years;
Past all our dreams and hopes and doubts and fears,
He guides our steps. Through all the tangled maze
Of sin, of sorrow, and o'erclouded days,
We know His will is done;
And still He leads us on.

And He at last,
After the weary strife,
After the restless fever we call life—
After the dreariness, the aching pain—
The wayward struggles, when have proved in vain—
After our toils are past—
Will give us rest at last.

RESETTING SINS LIKE LEECHES.

A traveller in Burmah, after fording a certain river, found his body covered all over by a swarm of leeches, busily sucking his blood. His first impulse was to tear the tormentors from his flesh, but his servant warned him that to pull them off by mechanical violence would expose his life to danger. They must not be torn off, lest portions remain in the wounds and become a poison; they must drop off spontaneously, and so they will be harmless. The native forthwith prepared a bath for his master, by the decoction of some herbs, and directed him to lie down in it. As soon as he had bathed in the balsam the leeches dropped off. This illustrates the fact that every unforsaken iniquity in the heart is like a leech, sucking the life-blood. Mere human determination to have done with it will not cast the evil thing away. You must bathe your whole being in God's pardoning mercy, and these venomous creatures will instantly let go their hold.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Coming Ages---Its Proximity---Christ's Literal Narration Continued---Fifth Period---Signs of His Coming---Moral Signs---a. In the Political World---Conclusion---b. Signs in the Social World.---No. 22.

J. P. WESTFIELD.

National Succession.—Our position in the great national chain, is, in itself, a sign of Christ's return. Like a highway leading to a city, with towns and villages dotting its various turns and meanderings, with a Bethany in its vicinity. When we arrive at Bethany, we know that the city of the great king is almost in view.

The kingdom of God succeeds the four Gentile monarchies. Christ's first advent was under the fourth of these monarchies. He comes in the fifth. Since the fourth has had its day, we may look for Christ's return to set up the stone kingdom. This proximity, therefore, is necessarily a sign.

It may be said that, since the days of Christ's first advent we have physical and moral phenomena; and, consequently, they cannot be signs of his coming. Should this be admitted, (and we have no reason to doubt it), still our view holds good: The combination constitutes their force as a sign. There are about thirty items, called signs of Christ's coming. All these might separately occur and not be a sign; but, when a period comes in which they are all combined, each one is a sign, and the combination also, since the combination is new; so it was with Jerusalem; it had its signs, and its crowning sign—"Jerusalem compassed with armies." Christ's coming has signs; his immediate advent has a crowning sign—"the sign of the Son of Man in heaven." An age takes place in which there is a certain predicted combination of physical and moral phenomena, which is followed by a specific phenomenon, and then comes the noted event itself. So soon as the political world reflects the exact likeness described by our Savior, the political sign of his return is complete.

Social World—Its Signs.—Christ's narration is as follows: "But as the days of Noe (Noah) (were), so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and knew not, until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be." Matt. xxiv. 37-39.

"And as it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of Man. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and the flood came and destroyed them all. Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot, they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed (them) all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed." Luke xvii. 26-30.

"As in the Days of Noah."—How was it in the days of Noah? "And it came to pass, when men began to multiply on the face of the earth, and daughters were born, that the sons of God saw the daughters of men, that they (were) fair; and they took them wives of all which they chose. And the Lord said, my spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh; yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years. There were giants in the earth in those days; and also after that, when the sons of God came in unto the daughters of men, and they bare (children) to them; the same (became) mighty men, which (were) of old, men of renown. And God saw that the wickedness of man (was) great in the earth, and (that) every imagination of the thoughts of his heart (was) only evil continually. And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart. .... And God said unto Noah, the end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and, behold, I will destroy them with the earth." Gen. vi. 1-7, 13.

"As it was in the Days of Lot."—How was it in those days? "And the Lord said, because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and because their sin is very grievous; I will go down now, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me; and if not I will know." Gen. xviii. 20, 21. There were not ten righteous persons in Sodom. Gen. xviii. 32. The conduct of the Sodomites is fully set forth in their treatment of the heavenly messenger. Gen. xix.

The sins of morals in the world just previous to the Savior's return must be like the morals of the old world in the days of Noah; and also like those of Sodom and Gomorrah, when Lot went out of Sodom. They were guilty of the most debasing actions. The old world was so full of wickedness, and evil thoughts, that they gave no heed to the one hundred and twenty years' warning of Noah, though they had a visible example of his faith—the building of the ark. They were citizens of the world; and so absorbed in its interests, that any warning of coming events could not find a place in their hearts; they heard but gave no attention. They knew not, believed not, and, therefore, made no preparations.

The morals of Sodom were similar to those of the old world. They had no fear of man, of angels, nor of God himself. Lust, and its gratification, seemed their chief occupation.

Are the morals of the present world, outside of the church, similar? We are not required to show that they are similar in every particular, but, simply, alike in the features named by Christ,—in "planting," "building," "selling," "drinking," "marrying and giving in marriage," "buying and selling."

Under the head of "planting" we may reckon all the various departments of agriculture. "Building," will include the mechanical division of labor. "Eating" and "drinking," imply the possession of the luxuries of life, and the modes of obtaining them—through commerce and other kinds of traffic. By "marrying" "and giving in marriage," must be understood permanent connections and settlement in life by families, communities and nations. Christ saw that it would be an age noted for the increase of such nations as we now call Christian. It would be an age of marriage, but not one of virtue, since it was to resemble Sodom and Gomorrah.

The last point of similarity, is, their ignorance of Christ's coming. Of the flood it is said they knew not, until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. Lot's message was not believed. His notes of alarm, and cries of warning, had no effect, even upon his own sons-in-law. "He seemed as one that mocked unto his sons-in-law." The people went about their worldly business as (usual); they saw no signs for such notes of alarm. No marriage was postponed—(marriage was only a cloak). They worked in their gardens, on new houses, and attended feasts up to the beginning of the terrible storm of fire and brimstone. The old world had been warned of the coming flood 120 years; but their wickedness would not allow them to credit the alarm.

So will it be with the world relative to the coming of the Son of Man. They will have warning, but their corrupt practices, and their worldliness will prevent their belief.

It is scarcely necessary to prove that the world now possesses all these features, but, do they exist in an extraordinary degree?

When speaking of the signs of Christ's coming it must be understood not to include the heathen world, but simply the Christian world, and be limited to the boundaries of civilization.

Is the present age noted for an extraordinary development of the features named by Christ? This must be, to establish their identity; for an age, to be the one predicted, must reflect its exact likeness. The following illustration will express our idea: A refiner of metals being asked how he knew the precise moment when the silver should be removed from the furnace, replied, It is the moment that the silver clearly and perfectly reflects the image of my face;" so we say, when the physical and moral worlds reflect the exact and perfect image of the one described by Christ—it is that age.

Its Similarity in each Specification.—First specification—"They planted." Christ shows that it would be an agricultural age. The discovery and settlement of America opened to Christendom a new world of enterprise. For three centuries after its discovery the jealousies among European nations, and the tardy advance in the world of mind kept back its inventive powers to the beginning of the present century, principally to the last fifty years. Since that time a strange power has seized the human intellect. Old processes of thought have given way to inventive activity. A new continent is to be cleared and tilled. Its resources must be developed. The wants of the old world make the extraordinary efforts a necessity. The new world is the granary—the Egypt of the old world. Luxuries increase with the population. So much land is to be cleared, planted, and tilled, that machinery becomes a necessity. The agricultural labor by the application of modern improvements is increased a hundred-fold. Immense tracts of prairie lands are ready for immediate culture, and the productiveness of the soil adds to the agricultural resources of our country. Agriculture is, therefore, a remarkable feature of the times—world's fairs are sufficient proof of our position.

Second Specification.—"They Builded"—Commerce and Traffic.—Is this an extraordinary feature of our times? What are our modern facilities of transportation? Count, if you please, the merchant ships of the Christian nations. What seas are not whitened with their peaceful sails? By electricity the world's necessities are immediately made known, and by the power of steam they are soon supplied. What an age of building! Railroads and all the machinery necessary for land transportation; vessels and all crafts wanted for the commerce of rivers, lakes, seas and oceans; buildings of dwellings, villages, towns and cities—all that are necessary for the work of mining and reducing ores. What is now the world's machinery compared with that which existed when Christ sat with his four disciples on the quiet Mount of Olives? Our Savior looking onward to our day, and backward to the days of Sodom and Gomorrah—the likeness is such as to give him the similitude.

Third Specification—"They Bought, they Sold."—Under the second specification we are directed to the construction of the immense machinery required to carry on the commerce and traffic; in this we have the commerce and traffic themselves.

Buying and Selling.—Go to our cities, to the great commercial centres of Europe; look at the crowded harbors, wharves, and streets and houses of business. From the third hour in the morning till midnight, the roar never ceases. What produces this intense activity? Simply demand and supply. Such a world of motion is peculiar to our day; the past history of the world, in this feature, knows no equal; it only has its similitude.

Fourth Specification—"They did eat, they Drank."—Eating and Drinking!—Now, can this be a sign of Christ's second coming, when it, of necessity, has always been? There must be an extraordinary development of a necessary practice. Some eat and drink to live; others live to eat and drink. Isolated cases of both classes have been found in every age. Here we have the masses—whole communities, so attached to this life and its pleasures, that they seem to think, that, to eat and drink is man's chief duty.

The Saints in the Kingdom—Their Position.

The position the saints are to occupy is but little understood. In Acts xv. 14 it is stated that after taking out from among the Gentiles a people for his name,—that is to be called by his name—to constitute with Christ the ruling power of the ages to come. In harmony with this is Romans viii. 17. That "if children then heirs, heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ, that is equal heirs to all that Christ is heir to." Is Christ to be a king? So are they. Is he a Priest? So will they be. Is he to rule over the nations? So are they. We find this unit principle further developed in Dan. vii. 27. "And the kingdom and dominion and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heavens shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him."

Here we have the joint rulership of Christ and the saints forcibly developed. That this union will exist is further shown by what Paul states in 1 Cor. xii. 27. Here it is affirmed that the church is the body of Christ, and members in particular. And in the 12th verse the body is not one, but many members, for by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, etc. And again in Col. i. 18. And he, Christ, is the head of the body, the church. Hence Paul declares in 1 Cor. xii. 21, 22. That one member cannot say, I have no need of thee. But when the kingdom is set up every member must be in its proper place. Again he that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, etc. Rev. iii. 21. And in the 2nd chapter and 26th verse he says they shall rule the nations.

This subject is further developed under the reign of Christ. No one objects to the reign of Christ but whom he is to reign over, and who are to be associated with him during his reign is quite unsettled in the minds of many. Some, and we might say the mass of professors, believe he is to reign over the saints. But when we consider that the saints are to be kings and reign with him on the earth, the absurdity of such a position is seen at once. Daniel settles this in the 7th chapter and thirteenth verse. He says he saw in the night visions, one like the Son of Man, come with the clouds of heaven, and there was given him a kingdom that all people, nations and languages, should serve and obey him. Then instead of his reigning over the saints, he reigns over the nations, and so do the saints. See Rev. ii. 26. Here again we have the joint rulership of Christ and the saints beautifully demonstrated. Again in Rev. xx. 4. And they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. Thus we have the joint rulership of the Lord and his people established beyond dispute.

Next the order of events. After taking out from the Gentiles a people for his name, he will return with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, raise the dead saints, change the living, then they are caught away to meet the Lord in the tabernacle of God of which Moses had a pattern in the wilderness. See Heb. viii. 5. But this is the true tabernacle which God pitched, and not man; it is the chambers that Isaiah speaks of the 26th chapter and 20th verse. After speaking of the resurrection he says, Come my people enter into thy chambers and shut thy doors about thee, hide thyself as it were a little moment until the indignation be overpast. Again it is the Father's house of many mansions, it is Paul's house, a building of God, a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens. It is the city that Abraham looked for, whose maker and builder is God. In short it is the holy city John saw coming down from God out of heaven, and he heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, from here Christ and the saints execute the judgments written. See Psa. cxlix, 7-9. During which time the sanctuary, or the place of the sanctuary, will be cleansed or cleared off. Hence we read in Zech. xiv. 10, All the land shall be turned as a plain from Geba to Rimmon, south of Jerusalem, and shall be lifted up; and Micah says, It shall be exalted above the hills. iv. 1. But in the last days it shall come to pass that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains and it shall be exalted above the hills. Here we have the location of the tabernacle of God and God's dwelling-place with men. See Rev. xxi. 3. Its composition is of fine gold-like unto transparent glass. This will overlook the old city which will be rebuilt in all its glory, where the nations that come up to worship pass through. But this tabernacle no one enters but they whose names are written in the Lamb's Book of Life. Rev. xxi. 27. Neither will the sun or the moon be the light of it, nor will they shine in it, for the glory of God and the Lamb is the light thereof. Rev. xxi. 23, xxii. 16. And Isaiah says upon all the glory shall be a covering, a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night. Isa. iv. 5. This will be necessary as no mortal eye can behold God's glory and live; hence the covering. And the nations of them that are saved walk in the light of it. That is saved from the general destruction of the wicked while the saints are away from the earth. See Isa. xxvi. 20, 21. Zechariah says it shall come to pass that every one that every one that is left of all the nations .... shall even go up from year to year to worship the King the Lord of hosts.

Here is where the priesthood of the saints comes in to officiate between Deity and the nations. There is something peculiar in the 45th Psalm concerning the royal garments. David says they shall be of wrought gold and needle work how exactly corresponding with the royal tabernacle, the saints' eternal home. How wonderfully God marks out his great arrangements of the ages to come. And while we contemplate the wonders of the future we are lost in admiration and thanksgiving for his wonderful Book—the Bible.

THE COLORED STARS.

Solar Systems Wherein our Unknown Cousins have Green, Red, or Blue Sunlight.

One who has never closely watched the stars is apt to suppose that they are all of one color. In fact, there are more colors among the stars than among precious stones, and if most of the brighter ones remind the beholder of diamonds, he will find, on looking further, that there are others which can with equal fitness be likened to rubies, emeralds, or sapphires. This fact assumes a new interest when it is remembered that the stars are really suns, and that many of them are demonstrably much larger than our sun, which at their distance would be invisible to our eyes. We are accustomed to white sunlight, but the worlds lighted by some of the colored stars must have green, or red, or blue sunlight. In some of the double stars we see two suns of different colors, which, it may be inferred, alternately shed their light on the worlds dependent upon them.

Among the stars visible to the naked eye, this diversity of color is not so conspicuous as among the telescopic stars. Sir John Herschel, when at the Cape of Good Hope with his big telescope, found a cluster of stars of so many colors that they resembled a casket of various colored gems. The amateur telescopist in sweeping along the Milky Way will find colored stars of marvelous beauty. Some are as red as a drop of blood; some orange hued; some green; some of the various shades of blue; some purple, and some of unnamed hues difficult to describe. The colors of stars are never so striking as when seen contrasted in some of the doubles. The commonest combination is of a yellow star with a blue or green one. A beautiful specimen of this class, suitable for a small telescope, is Albireo in the Swan. The larger star is orange-yellow, and the smaller of an intense blue. With a magnifying power of fifty diameters, this double is indescribably beautiful. The star Mizar, in the middle of the handle of the Great Dipper, is an easily separated double whose component stars are white and emerald—a splendid object. The star Beta, in the Scorpion, the most brilliant constellation in the summer sky, is double, the colors being white and lilac. The great star Antares, on the Scorpion's Heart, is red, and a powerful telescope reveals, within a distance of three seconds, a small intensely green star. This green star was discovered by Gen. Mitchell of Cincinnati. When Antares was occulated by the moon, just as the great red star was hidden behind the moon's edge, the little green fellow, which had been invisible in the glare of its big neighbor, appeared for a few seconds shining alone.

A very famous double star is the brilliant Rigel, the second in rank of the magnificent congregation of suns comprising the constellation of Orion. The large star is white and the small one sapphire blue. It requires a good telescope of three inches aperture to show the small star. A power of at least 150 diameters should be used. In the double star R Leporis, a pure white star is seen, combined with a brilliant crimson one. Epsilon Bootes, which Admiral Smyth named Pulcherrimum, on account of its great beauty, consists of two stars, one of which is deep orange and the other sea-green. They are close together, and a power of at least 200 on a three-inch telescope is required to satisfactorily separate them. Eta Cassiopeia is a double, composed of a yellow and a bright purple star. Cassiopeia contains several other doubles of contrasting colors that are worth looking at, the most beautiful being Sigma, whose component's colors are flushed white and indigo. The splendid Arcturus, which shines with a ruddy yellow light, has a little companion star of a lilac or pinkish hue. Castor, one of the celebrated twin stars in Gemini, consists of two close stars of nearly equal size, one white and the other greenish. In the glorious cluster called the Sword Hand of Perseus, where the telescope shows stars clustering as thickly as swarming bees, several different colors may be detected.

Among the naked-eye stars remarkable for their color, Sirius is white, but in certain conditions of the atmosphere it flashes almost all the colors of the rainbow. In the days of Ptolemy and Seneca, Sirius was red. Vega, in the Harp, is white, with a strong tinge of blue; Aldebaran, in the Bull, is rose-colored; Betelgeuse, in Orion, is topaz-hued; Capella is creamy white, and the North Star is pale yellow.

Amid all the never-ceasing attacks on the Christian religion on the ground of the weakness and failure of some of its nominal confessors and defenders, one never hears it said that these failures come because of too close a following, or too accurate a reproduction, of the principles of Christ. As a recent writer says, the world misjudges Christianity because it insists on looking at churches which caricature it or individuals who falsely illustrate it; but Christianity would be seen as it is, if only New Testament precepts were reproduced in human character. If every nominal Christian in the world were utterly debased and unworthy of his name, nothing would be proved against the excellence of the Christian religion itself. Every one who seeks to excuse his own neglect of religion by dwelling on others' misuse of it, should ask himself whether he really believes that Jesus Christ was a bad man, who put forth a detestable and ruinous system of faith and practice. Until one is ready to say this, his criticisms are no more pertinent than would be the charge—to borrow a clever illustration from the London Church Times—that a downfallen Good Templar, suffering from delirium tremens, owed his illness to total abstinence.—S. S. Times.

THE CZAR AND THE POPE.

The latest step taken by Russia in its treatment of the Roman Catholics within its dominions has greatly startled the Vatican. A decree has been issued to the effect that all persons born of Roman Catholic parents since 1836 and themselves professing that faith, shall be considered to belong to the Russian Greek Church, and that it shall be illegal for them to continue to believe in the doctrines of Romanism. The Pope has sent a strongly worded protest against the decree.

Scripture Illustrations.

Oil out of the flinty rock. Deut. xxxii. 13.

The olive tree is associated with the history of man from the deluge itself to the present day. When the waters of the flood began to abate, we read: "He,—Noah,—sent forth the dove out of the ark; and the dove came in to him in the evening; and, lo, in her mouth was an olive leaf pluckt off; so Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth." Gen. viii. 10, 11. That this incident of early history suggested the emblematical meanings of the olive branch in after times there is little room to doubt. We must bear in mind, not only in the illustration of the expression—oil out of the flinty rock,—but also in reading the expressive imagery of the sacred writings where the olive tree is selected as the symbol of beauty, prosperity, luxuriance, and enduring hardihood as well as unfailing fruitfulness, that the olive was one of the most abundant and valuable of the trees growing in the promised land. It thus became the special symbol of Israel as the favored people of the Lord. The language of the prophet is: "I will be as the dew unto Israel; he shall grow as the lily, and cast forth his roots as Lebanon. His branches shall spread, and his beauty shall be as the olive tree, and his smell as Lebanon." Hos. xiv. 5, 6. It is said to grow freely almost everywhere on the shores of the Mediterranean, but to be particularly abundant in Palestine. Even now the olive groves are a striking picture in many parts of the country, as almost every village has its olive grove. There is a comparison made in the book of Job where the flower-crowned olive is chosen to represent the very contrary to its usual figurative import in the Scriptures. It is said of the wicked that "he shall cast off his flowers as the olive." Job xv. 33. A popular writer on Palestine says: "The olive is the most prodigal of all fruit-bearing trees in flowers. It literally bends under the load of them. But then not one in a hundred comes to maturity. The tree casts them off by millions, as if they were of no more value than flakes of snow, which they closely resemble. So it will be with those who put their trust in vanity. Cast off, they melt away, and no one takes the trouble to ask after such empty, useless things, just as the olive seems to throw off in contempt the myriads of flowers that signify nothing, and turns all her fatness to those which will mature into fruit."

But to now illustrate the expression of Moses—"oil out of the flinty rock"—it is a peculiarity of this tree that it flourishes best in a hard, rocky soil. It is said to delight to insinuate its roots into the clefts of rocks and crevices in the flinty, chalky marl that forms the substratum of the localities where it flourishes most luxuriantly, and whence it draws its richest stores of oil. If the overlying mould is so deep that its roots cannot penetrate to the rocky substratum it is said that the tree languishes, and that its berries are small and sapless. Job xxix. 6,—when he looks back to the days of his former prosperity and says, "The rock poured me out rivers of oil," may have allusion to his stone presses, where the berries were ground and the oil expressed, as well as to the olive-groves that by their extent and beauty adorned the flinty portions of his princely estates.

So, while the rich plains of the promised land yielded their harvests from thirty to a hundred fold, and the hill-slopes were purpled with the most magnificent clusters pendant on the fruitful vine, the rock-lands abounded in olive-groves of "fair and goodly fruit," whose rich oil was drawn up by the rootlets from the flinty rock itself. It grows slowly, but lives to an immense age. Says the author of the Land and the Book, "So long as there is a fragment remaining, though externally the tree looks as dry as a post, yet does it continue to yield its load of oily berries, and for twenty generations, the owners gather fruit from the faithful old patriarch. This tree also requires but little labor of any kind, and, if, long neglected, will revive again when the ground is dug or plowed, and begin afresh to yield as before. Vineyards forsaken die out almost immediately, and mulberry orchards neglected run rapidly to ruin, but not so the olive. I saw the desolate hills of Jebel-el-'Ailah, above Antioch, covered with these groves, although no one had paid any attention to them for half a century." The restitution age approaches when the Lord God shall dwell in Zion, his holy mountain; when the pastures of the wilderness shall spring; when the tree shall bear her fruit, and the fig tree and the vine shall yield their strength; when the floors shall be full of wheat, and the fats shall overflow with wine and oil. Then Judah shall dwell forever, and Jerusalem from generation to generation. Then, loved Palestine,—land blessed of the Lord for the precious things of heaven, for the dew, and for the deep that coucheth beneath, for the precious fruits brought forth by the sun, and for the precious things put forth by the moon,—then shall the olive groves crown thy ancient mountains, and wreaths with a chaplet of fadeless beauty thy lasting hills. Hasten on then, bright age of glory, when the Holy One of Israel shall make earth's wastes a paradise, and when the thorn and the brier shall be replaced with the pine tree and the box, and the myrtle and the oil tree shall gladden the wilderness.

SELECTIONS.

The Immortality of Man.—An Elementary Recapitulation.

1. The writer desires to say a few words on this interesting subject, from an exclusively Biblical point of view. Science and philosophy here are weak and faltering; but as Christ has "illumined life and incorruption through the joyful message" (2 Tim. i. 10), it is not permissible in his disciples to plead that they know nothing of the victory over death which their Master gives.

2. Wishing, as far as possible, to speak of Bible things in Bible words, the theme proposed is "The Immortality of Man,"—not, be it observed, merely the immortality of the soul; for not only is this latter phrase never once found in the Bible, but the Holy Scriptures emphatically deal with man as a whole, essentially composed of "spirit and soul and body" (1 Thess. v. 23), and treat even the body itself as a subject of redemption (Rom. viii. 23), transformation (Phil. iii. 21), and so also of incorruption and immortality. 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54. Yet can these terms not be confined to the body alone, since from the body the man is frequently designated (Gen. iii. 19; Psa. civ. 14; Joel ii. 26; 1 Cor. iii. 3, etc.); and man as man is expressly said to be either corruptible (Rom. i. 22) or incorruptible? 1 Cor. xv. 52.

3. It is important, and tends to simplification, to remember that immortality is a quality or state of the living. Only the living can die. Only the living can live on for ever. Only the living can triumph over death. The great importance of this is seen by observing that, thus viewed, immortality and endless life become practically synonymous.

4. What then, according to the Scriptures, is immortality? I answer unhesitatingly: Immortality is incapacity of death—an immortal being cannot die.

5. That this is the true Biblical definition appears from the following considerations:—(a) That immortality (athanasia) and incorruption (aphtharsia) are in the New Testament inseparably connected,—the immortal God (1 Tim. vi. 16) being also the incorruptible God (Rom. i. 23; 1 Tim. i. 17, Greek), and the immortal body being also an incorruptible body (1 Cor. xv. 52, 54); and (b) that our Lord himself expressly asserts, of "the sons of the resurrection," "Neither can they die any more" (Luke xx. 36)—that is, they are incapable of death.

6. The leading question of this article may now be submitted, and it is this:—How does immortality come to man? Is it his by original endowment, as an actual possession by virtue of his creation? or is it bestowed on him as a gift of grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus? In other words: Was Adam already immortal when he was created, or was he created capable of death until he should be qualified for immortality? And, accordingly: Are we necessarily immortal by virtue of our creation, or do we only become immortal as and when we are created anew in the risen Redeemer?

7. A short and simple sentence will express the correct answer: Man was created, not in but for immortality. He was made capable of death, though not doomed to it until he sinned. While thus capable of death—that is, mortal—he was placed under training for immortality. Failing to win the prize by unbroken obedience, he (and the human race in him), passed, in the mercy of God, under the gracious provisions of redemption, centered not in Adam, but in Christ. And so, for ourselves, the answer may be couched in another short sentence: In Adam we are mortal—in Christ we may become immortal. The only immortality held out to us is an immortality of holy blessedness. Let us approach the evidence of this by two or three easy steps.

8. "With thee," says the Psalmist, addressing Jehovah, "is the fountain of life." Psa. xxxvi. 9. Therefore, as a stream cut off from its fountain dries up, so all created life perishes when severed from God. "In him we live and move and have our being." Acts xvii. 28.

9. "God only has immortality." 1 Tim. vi. 16. This should make us pause before we attribute immortality to any creature. That creature alone is immortal whom God himself has made to be so.

10. "The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over his works." Psa. cxlv. 9. It would perhaps be difficult to demonstrate wherein would consist the Divine goodness in making an untrained and inexperienced creature like man at once immortal. Let us close in with more direct evidence.

11. Man was created "in the image," yet not in the "express image" of God. Gen. i. 26, 27; v. 1; ix. 6; 1 Cor. xi. 7; James iii. 9; Heb. i. 3. He was, in truth, created as the shadow, outline, or sketch of God, as the Hebrew word tselem beautifully suggests. And though in man's case the shadow was not exactly "a vain show" (as the same word is rendered, Psa. xxxix. 6); yet at least the sketch had to be filled in, the image to be perfected by the development of character and the glorification of personality. The image is only completed in and through Christ. Eph. iv. 22-24; 2 Cor. iii. 18.

12. If a man had been originally made immortal, the tree of life planted in Paradise (Gen. ii. 9) would have been without meaning; instead of possessing the striking significance with which the sacred record invests it—namely, as a sign of Adam's call to a higher style of being, and the means ordained of God by which he should in due time attain thereto. It is, indeed, supposed by some that Adam had been accustomed to eat of that tree in his innocence—against the evidence; for the Divine apprehension lest "the man," should "take also of the tree of life" (as well as of the tree of knowledge), and the Divine haste to remove the offender from the garden lest he should immortalize himself in sin (Gen. iii. 22-24), conclusively show that (for whatever reason) Adam had not yet eaten of that tree, and was not yet immortal.

13. Provided only that Adam understood the design of the tree of life, his knowledge of immortality may be summed up in seven words: "I can die; but I need not." The Divine threatening assured him of the former—The tree of life of the latter.

14. That grand chapter on immortality—1 Cor. xv.—teaches us that there are two Adams, and (as represented by them) two styles and stages of manhood. The First Adam is expressly said to have been an "earthy" man—a man "of earth" (ek gees)—and therefore, by fair inference he was corruptible and mortal. The Last Adam (Christ) is as expressly said to be "heavenly," "of heaven" (ex ouranou); and therefore, by equally fair inference, he is incorruptible and immortal. These types and states of humanity are to be neither confounded nor inverted. Adam the First was Adam the last—no, not even just for a little while, when first created. And this principle is radical both to the original genius and to the historical development of human nature. "That is not first which is spiritual," and heavenly, and incorruptible and immortal; but that is and must be first, in every human being, which is psychical ("soulical"—taking character from the soul rather than from the "spirit"), and earthy, and corruptible, and mortal. The first Adam did not by obedience conduct our manhood up into its heavenly condition of existence; and therefore a second exemplar was needed—a second typical man. Christ now is that Second Man. Hence, to speak of Adam as created in immortality is to throw the whole subject into confusion. Over against such confusion let us not hesitate to say that even Jesus, the Christ, our Lord and Redeemer, was—as a man, in the days of his humiliation—most truly a Son of the First Adam, made in all things like unto his brethren (Heb. ii. 17); and that only when he was born from among the dead did he actually become the Second Man, the Last Adam. In the former condition he could die, and he did; in the latter he can die no more. Rom. vi. 9. He is the Immortal Man, and being to his brethren "the Resurrection and the Life" (John xi. 25), that is, their Immortalizer, he becomes humanity's Second Head, the "Father," "Founder," "Author" of an incorruptible and perpetual human race (Isa. ix. 6, "Father of eternity;" Isa. lxiv. 5, "In those [thy ways] is eternity, and we shall be saved"). No third Adam is required. The "Second" is also the "Last." Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory.

15. If men were necessarily immortal by virtue of their creation, there would be no ground on which to encourage them to "seek" for immortality. Accordingly, those who hold to man's natural immortality are not in the habit of urging men to seek for immortality. In fact, such words enter not at all into their phraseology. On the contrary, their custom is to urge upon their hearers' consideration that they are immortal, whether they will or no. From this they start. Out of it they endeavor to bring a strong motive power. With solemn reminders of it, their hortatory discourse is plentifully interspersed. They could scarcely preach an earnest practical discourse to the unconverted without telling them they are immortal. In all of which, assuredly, their speech betrays that they occupy an unscriptural position. To be sure of which, we have only to contrast with their language that of the Apostle Paul, where he declares, as one of the fundamental principles of the Divine government, that God "renders" "eternal life" to those "who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory, and honor, and immortality." Rom. ii. 6, 7. I am aware that the word in that place is aphtharsia, strictly "incorruption;" but we have already seen that "incorruption" and "immortality" are inseparably connected in the New Testament; and therefore he who seeks for incorruption necessarily thereby seeks for immortality. According to this passage, therefore, man is not immortal by original endowment. Immortality is, on the contrary, an endowment to be longed for and diligently sought. It is to be sought by steady perseverance along the path of beneficence. It is to be sought as an object of high and sacred ambition, together with the "glory" which only Christ can give, and the "honor" which comes from God alone. Why, then, oh! why should we display the smallest anxiety to immortalize ill-doing and infamy?

16. It will have been observed that to such seekers as those just described it is said God renders "eternal life"—of course thereby granting them what they have sought for. And this once more reminds us that, whatever shade of difference there may be between the strict meaning of the words, still the expressions "immortality" and "eternal life" are practically synonymous. Hereby, be it noted, are let in upon this subject all the passages in the New Testament which speak of eternal life as a Divine gift to some men only. "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life (that is, immortality), through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi. 23. "Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life" (that is, lay hold on immortality). 1 Tim. vi. 12. "The crown of life (the crown of immortality) which the Lord hath promised to them that love him." James i. 12. "And this is the record, that God hath given us to eternal life (immortality), and this life is in His Son. He that hath the Son, hath life (hath immortality); and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life" (hath not immortality). 1 John v. 11, 12. To crown a list of passages which might be greatly lengthened, by one of the most familiar and precious, and at the same time conclusive: "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish (the very thing that men are commonly told they cannot do, seeing they are immortal and indestructible), but have everlasting life" (have immortality). John iii. 16.

17. "Yes; observe," says an objector:—"He that hath the Son, a present fact, hath life—a present possession; and yet you say immortality is incapacity of death. Do believers, then, not die? How do you get over that?" Answer: To whatever extent believers have eternal life they do not die. They have such life it is true; but only in the earnest of it, in the spirit. And so he that is joined to the Lord is one spirit, and in spirit shall never see death: nothing, not even "death," shall separate him from the love of God which is in Jesus Christ his Lord. Rom. viii. 38, 39. Still, the believer in such wise only now has life as leaves him in duty bound to seek for its final and irrevocable bestowment. He has not yet carried off the crown. 1 Cor. ix. 24, 25; 1 Tim. vi. 19; 2 Tim. iv. 8; Jas. i. 12; Rev. ii. 10.

18. "Then you do not believe in soul-sleeping?" I believe in the saints falling asleep in Jesus—although "perchance to dream." And I believe in the survival of the soul in the case of all men. The soul is not destroyed by the death of the body. It is [illegible] likely to go astray. Men are not done with them: "after this the judgment." Heb. x. 27. "For this cause Christ both died and lived, that he might be Lord both of dead and living" (Rom. xiv. 9)—certainly he is Lord of something more than nonentities under both heads. Christ has charge of the dead, and intends to raise them. Therefore the first death is not annihilation to any. Nonentities do not sleep and cannot wake. We have no warrant to snap the thread of identity and say that one creature is annihilated at death and another is created in his stead in the resurrection. In order to maintain that the resurrection is necessary (and this we do strongly maintain), it is surely needless to go so far as to make a resurrection in the very nature of things impossible!

19. Nevertheless, although, in consideration of the broad provisions of redemption and the universal Lordship of Christ, the soul survives the first death, yet is it not necessarily immortal; seeing that, on the one hand, we are instructed that only he who "hates his soul (psyche) in this world shall keep it unto life eternal" (John xii. 25); while, on the other, we are warned to "fear him who is able to destroy both body and soul in gehenna." Matt. x. 28. These two passages settle the question of the necessary immortality of the soul—they settle it in the negative.

20. "What then is the advantage of your teaching?" Much every way. First and foremost that Christ is thereby immeasurably exalted. No man can become immortal without being indebted to the Redeeming Son of God for the boon. Because he lives we shall live also. In proportion as Christ is in us we have both the beginning of the life and the hope of the glory. And our Lord is further distinctly exalted in this—that his whole work in and for our humanity hereby assumes an essentiality, a thoroughness, and a decision which it is not otherwise seen to possess. There is no escape from the Son of God. He has "ascended up far above all the heavens that he may fill all things" (Eph. iv. 10); and how much more will he fill all men, either with the holy love that saves, or with the holy wrath that destroys. "He who yields not to the Son shall not see life, but the anger of God awaits him" (John iii. 36); yea, and will consume him, "for our God is a consuming fire." Heb. xii. 29. Secondly, our imagination is thus freed from the necessity of peopling some dark corner of God's universe with children of Adam doomed forever to remain neither saved nor destroyed—persistent rebels, perpetuators of unending sin, divinely sustained in ruined and hopeless being; whereas natural and necessary immortality entails either universal restoration or never-ending sin. Thirdly, we can give an alarming and yet not incredible emphasis to the threatenings of God's Word. Wilful rejectors of salvation are confronted with the terrible alternative of "everlasting destruction." There is real danger lest men should "perish." It is not enough that they are as good as their neighbors. They have to be accounted worthy to live forever. This can be secured in Christ alone. No man can save himself. Not one.—Joseph B. Rotherham.

[The Chicago Sunday Times, May 16, 1880.]

Prince Bismarck and the Pope.

When Mahomet found that the mountain would not come to him, he went directly to the mountain. He did not even undertake to cajole the mountain into coming half way. But Pope Leo XIII., when he found that Bismarck had not the slightest intention of coming to Canossa, first wrote to the archbishop of Cologne, or some other Prussian ecclesiastic, intimating that perhaps he might, in the interest of European peace and of the souls of the Prussians, go out a little distance on the road from Canossa to meet Prince Bismarck, provided the latter would come the rest of the way. But Prince Bismarck has not, since this tempting offer was made to him, so much as shown a sign that he had ever heard of a person called the pope, and he has continued to amuse himself by alternately intimidating his parliament on political questions and resigning, in equal forgetfulness of the Church of Rome and his own Kulturkampf. Judging from the character of the latest reports of the situation of matters, the pope has despaired of obtaining any concessions from the Prussian government, and has made up his mind to give in completely. It is high time, looking at the situation from a religious point of view, that something should be done. Hundreds of parishes have been without priests for months; some of them have been without priests for years. In the meantime, what is becoming of the souls of the people of these neglected parishes? Without shepherds, the sheep are likely to go astray.

The dispute in [illegible] The Prussian government [illegible] that the lists of men from whom are to be appointed bishops to the charge of dioceses and priests to the charge of parishes shall be submitted to its approval, and the church resists the demand, claiming the liberty of appointing whom it pleases. There is a good deal more involved in the Kulturkampf, perhaps, than this simple question, but this is the real bone of contention. When the pope consents to allow the supervision of the government over the appointment of bishops and pastors, the war between the state and the church, it is hardly necessary to state, will be at an end. Apparently, the pope is about to make this concession, very much against his wishes, and quite contrary to the advice of the Jesuits, who urge him to continue the contest until there is no longer a Catholic priest in Prussia rather than surrender.

The considerations of religion would appear to be on the side of Leo XIII., in his argument with the Jesuits on this point. It is certainly better that the German Catholics should have priests who are approved by the government than have no priests at all. It is not to be supposed that men who have been educated in the schools of the church and ordained by the church to the care of souls can be wholly hostile to the church's interest. Prince Bismarck does not propose to force the pope into appointing Protestant ministers or infidel lecturers over Catholic parishes. What he desires, apparently, is that the Catholic bishops and pastors shall be men who are devoted to religion exclusively, and not to politics as well. Prince Bismarck's government has expelled the Jesuits, and he desires that the influence of the Jesuits shall not be perpetuated by the secular clergy. Therefore he proposes that the appointments of clergy to parishes shall be submitted to the government. The requirement is an onerous one, and works a great hardship to the church, since it subjects the business of the church to the caprice of civil officials, and establishes a regulation which is not found necessary in England, the United States, and other Protestant countries. But what can the church do about it, if the Prussian government shall hold out against it forever? Shall it leave Catholicism in that country to die for the want of nourishment? As see after see and parish after parish becomes vacant, the situation grows more and more alarming. Unless something shall be done, the time will surely come when there will be no longer a Catholic priest in charge of a parish in Prussia.

This Prussian dispute is not the least of the embarrassing legacies which Pius IX. left to his successor. There were more unpleasant legacies, such as the overthrow of the temporal power and the abrogation of the Austrian concordat, but this Prussian trouble is the only one which threatens the souls of all the Catholic inhabitants of a great country with perdition. In spite of the attitude of the Italian government, the church still has as firm a hold upon the Italian common people as it ever had. This is the case, too, in Austria, where, although the government has imitated the Prussian policy to some extent, an open rupture has been avoided. In France the church is in open conflict with the state, but this is not the fault of the church, which, having plainly the right in the controversy, is pretty sure to win in the long run; at any rate, the people's souls are not in danger, for the priesthood is not threatened, and the people apparently regard the church with as much affection as ever. In Prussia alone is the existence of the church menaced by the strife with the civil power. Pope Leo XIII., evidently regarding it as better that the Catholic people should have priests who have been approved by the government than that they should have no priests at all, is disposed to give in at last to Prince Bismarck's demand. In the contest the civil power has every advantage, and there is no disgrace involved in the church's surrender.

A Card to the Brethren.

Having accepted the invitation of the brethren in Henderson county, Kentucky, to labor with them in the word and doctrine in a series of meetings, covering the first two weeks of the ensuing month of July, 1880, the undersigned will be able, if the Lord will, to respond to the wishes of the household of faith in the adjoining regions, in the like employment, in the last half of July, and early in August, on the single condition of the brethren who may desire his services, being at charges with him, in defraying his traveling expenses to and fro.

Letters on the subject may be addressed to me at Stephens City, Frederick county, Va., until the 27th of June, after that, at Henderson, Kentucky, care of Paul A. Blackwell.

Bro. Wiley Jones, of Norfolk, Va., will, I hope, be with me in Henderson, but I do not know as to his subsequent movements. A. B. MACKENDER.

Two Graves.

Thanks to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.—1 Cor. xv. 57.

I.

Forth and forth he came from out the silence.
The wonderful man who had been dead four days.
Lower him and let him go!" and there he stands
Back into Bethany he went his ways.

Yet once again the dark shadow fell
From the home where Jesus oft had been
And lazarus did doubt but who shall tell
Where in this world of graves he also was laid?

Mingled with grass and flowers, and all life's illness,
Somewhere it sleeps beneath the starlit skies,
Dust to the zephyr's stream, the rain that rises,
Waiting the Archangel's call shall rise.

II.

"If thou first knew Him whom I have loved," she said
Standing beside the tomb at Cana of Galilee,
"Ere when the body of the Lord is laid
That I may go and enjoy it in glory."

Then from the lips divine our word there came,
The loving lips of Him, the Crucified,
The sweet soft name to her known, in the—
"Mary!" and she "Rabboni!" quickly sighed.

No sepulchre the Master's body e'er got;
By Him authority was given that
Become the Firstfruits He in death that sleep
The Savior ever liveth, that was dead.

And we, because the Savior lives, shall live,
No matter where on earth's death's cold may be;
All graves upon the rolling globe shall give
Their silent witness that death is broke.

The committed dust from earthed bowers
And dust of saints from country's far lands,
The simple folks do rest, whose lowly graves
Are graceless, with a daisy here and there.

"Thanks be to God, who giveth victory
Through Jesus Christ our Lord, in whom
We rise!"
Their lot triumphant song of praise shall be,
When Jesus cometh in the opening skies.

LETTER DRAWER.

Editor Restitution:—I concluded that a few lines of local news from this section would not be rejected or thrown into the waste basket, as you so seldom hear from it directly, therefore I take the liberty of writing a brief social, as well as business note. Up to a few days ago, our country was suffering terribly for want of rain, but recently, copious showers have blessed us and every thing new in the way of corn and cotton crops, as well as our boundless crops of prairie grass looks beautiful and flourishing.

I am now taking your very valuable paper, and find myself not interested, but deeply edified by its perusal. To be a little egotistical, I will state that I was raised under the influence of the Church of England, but have never had the pleasure or opportunity of attending the services of that church for about fourteen years, but this fact, I beg you to understand, does not prohibit me from appreciating the veins of other denominations, especially when they are presented with the force I find them presented in your valuable exponent, THE RESTITUTION. I will add that I do not wish my paper discontinued on account of the pay not being sent, as it is my intention to send you the amount due you for six months in advance and the additional sum of thirty cents for the book you sent me as soon as Mr. John Teague, and any others if I can find them, get ready to remit.

Dr. Standifer, a very old and infirm friend of mine, and one among the first of your subscribers in this section, and a great Bible reader, has been lying very ill for some time, but is now convalescing, was the first acquaintance of mine that ever drew my attention to the doctrine or views you advocate. There is no one of your order that holds service in this (Wise) county, and but very few of the "one faith," and it would be gratifying to us all, that is, those that hold with you in belief to have an opportunity of being buried with Christ in baptism.

You are at liberty to publish communication if you wish. I will close by sending my best wishes and progress for the success of your pious and noble efforts in the great cause.

Very respectfully,
JOHN BAYLOR.

Decatur, Texas.

Editor Restitution:—Three lines at the foot of one of the columns in your last issues are so literally true, that I am constrained to write you a short letter. The words were these, "It is a sad thing to be doomed to dwell among those to whom we must ever be as a sealed book." This is my situation exactly. I believe the doctrine of the one faith, as set forth in your notice "to correspondents" on first page of THE RESTITUTION, but in this city of about 60,000 inhabitants, I don't know of another one of the same faith. When I attend church I hear so much of what is called "Orthodox" preaching, that I go away disgusted. There are none so blind as those who won't see, and if the blind lead the blind, both must surely fall into the ditch. My father has long been a firm believer in the Abrahamic faith, and it is to him that I owe my thanks for receiving your paper. I have been struggling with poverty for many years, and until about three years ago cared very little for things concerning the kingdom. The doctrines of eternal punishment and its kindred, were being continually rammed down my ears. I could not believe them, and the more I investigated, the more skeptical I became. But now, through the many valuable communications which I find in THE RESTITUTION, I am gradually getting more light, and want to be classed among those waiting for Jesus." Sincerely yours, [illegible] BOONE.

ST. GRAHAM'S SCHEME FOR COLONIZATION IN PALESTINE.

[London Times.]

The Rev. George Nazer gave a lecture yesterday, May 1st, at St. George's Hall, on a proposal for promoting Palestine by Jews, and referred incidentally to the existing establishment of a Jewish horticultural colony at Mikveh Israel near Jaffa. After some statistics relating to the modern Jews, who he said, had shown themselves alive to the advantages of education that they numbered half the University students, half the barristers, and more than half the merchants of Vienna, the lecturer proceeded to develop a plan which he said had met with the approval of many Jews, and had been communicated by Mr. Lawrence Oliphant to the Sultan, who received it favorably, for establishing a Jewish colony on the east bank of the Jordan.

The plan was to purchase 1,000,000 acres, to introduce a European element into its government, and to settle colonies there, either of Jewish peasant farmers or of Jewish farmers employing the indigenous fellahin. The incursions of the Arabs were a danger, but might be bought off. He had sent a circular to Mr. Goschen, the new special envoy to Constantinople, who had expressed a deep interest in the scheme. The lecturer described the country which was to be settled as exceedingly fertile, and identified it with the land allotted to Reuben, Dan, and the half tribe of Manasseh.

PRIMITIVE FORM OF THE MARINER'S COMPASS.

Some people look upon the compass as an introduction of the Fifteenth Century, but it seems to have been well known in a primitive form in the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries. In one of the peculiar songs written in the time of King John, it is said that the sailors who go on long voyages to Friesland or to the East know their way by observing the Tramontane or Polar Star; but, when the sky is covered with clouds, and they could no longer see the stars of heaven, they had a contrivance which was this: They took a needle of iron and put it through a piece of cork, so that one end remained out, which they rubbed with loadstone, and then they placed it in a vessel full of water, and, whichever way the end of the needle pointed there, without any doubt, was the Polar Star. This formed a primitive but fairly perfect mariner's compass.

HOW MUCH MONEY IS THERE IN THIS COUNTRY?

[Cincinnati Commercial.]

A correspondent writes anxiously as to the amount of money in the United States. We have several times attempted to give full information about this, but here it is again.

"In 1854 Mr. Guthrie, Secretary of the Treasury, estimates the coin in the United States at $241,000,000; in 1861 Mr. Pollock, Superintendent at the United States Mint, at $271,000,000, to $300,000,000. It is now estimated by the Chamber of Commerce reports of New York that the coin in the United States amounts to $433,000,000, which is largely in excess of any report yet made. Add to said coin the national bank notes in circulation, $324,000,000; also the legal-tender notes, $346,000,000; total circulation, $1,104,000,000. The importations of coin from Europe have caused the volume of circulation to be greater and of a better quality than ever had before. We have unexampled abundance of money and low rates of interest."

Perpetuity of God.

"The weary traveler in the South of Spain, who, after passing many an arid plain and many a bare hill, finds himself at nightfall under the heights of Granada, will hear plashing and rippling, under shade of the spreading trees, the grateful murmur of running waters, of streamlets whose sweet music mingles with his dreams as he sleeps, and meets his ear as the first pleasant voice in the stillness of the early dawn. What is it? It is the sound of irrigating rivulets called into existence by the Moorish conquests of Granada five centuries ago, and which, amid all the changes of race and religion, have never ceased to flow. Their empire has fallen, their creed has been suppressed by fire and sword, their nation has been driven from the shores of Spain, their palaces crumbled into ruins. The traces of this brilliant civilization still continue, and in its continuance that which was good, and wise, and generous in that unsympathizing rill lives on to cheer and to refresh their enemies and conquerors. Even so it is with the good deeds of those who have gone before us. We rejoice if there has been a forgiving consideration, of kindly hospitality, of benevolent generosity, of gracious charity, of high-minded justice, of unselfish devotion, of earnest piety, these still flow on their course of more fertilizing flow, which will run on when their places know them no more, when even their names it may be, have perished."

SENTENTIOUS PARAGRAPHS

No company at all is preferable to bad; we are more apt to catch the vices of others than their virtues.

If the mind be inflicted for an hour, it suffers more affliction than by its clear shining the whole year.

An old maxim is, that religion will cost us something, but the want of it infinitely more.

If you would be miserable, look within. If you would be distracted, look around. If you would be happy, look up.

"Nothing eternal
Of the first paradise, and the first
That it left us exist to suggest on the way."

A man who puts himself on the ground of moral principle, if the world be against him, is mightier than all. Never be afraid of being with minorities: their majorities are based upon priggery.

Nothing is eternal but that which is done for God and others. That which is done for self dies. Perhaps it is not wrong; but it perishes. You say it is pleasure,—well, enjoy it. But joyous recollection is no longer joy. That which ends in self is mortal; that alone which goes out of self into God lasts forever.

Earth's day-dream—O my Lord, lift my eyes
Unto the glories of the heavenlies.

One perfect day awaits us there,
Nightless and shadowless beyond compare.

The golden day thyself hast wrought;
Thy voice its music, and thy face its sun.

Spring to thy dawn, O day to be!
That I may see my Lord who loveth me.
—Words and Work.

Kind words are the music of the world. They have a power which seems to be beyond natural causes, as if they were some angel's song which had lost its way, and come on earth. It seems as if they could almost do what in reality God alone can do, soften the hard and angry hearts of men. No one was ever corrected by a sarcasm; crushed perhaps if the sarcasm was clever enough, but drawn nearer to God, never.

Can do little? It's enough—
Do it well, and let it be;
It will count as much as more,
When the Judge requires it thee.
Little talent well improved,
Little service rightly done—
He it will thy Master take,
Brings the victor's palm and crown.

It is Christ's grave that renders blessed the house of mourning; and so much is this thought for our soul's health, that in order to withdraw us from the stir and business of this world, God has appointed the continual return of night, wherein we may be as in the grave; in darkness, stillness, and solitude. For night is nothing else but the due and necessary preparation for the morning, and that morning is the great Morning of the Resurrection and the coming of Christ. Let us throughout the night of this world be buried with Christ, and watching for his return.—Isaac Williams.

"The whole creation groans,
And sighs to hear that voice
That shall restore her comeliness,
And make her sorrows rejoice.
Come, Lord, and wipe away
The curse, the sin, the stain,
And make the blighted world of ours
Thine own fair world again."

Immortality.

The late Rev. Frederick W. Robertson Incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, England, says: "Go and stand some summer evening by the riverside, you will see the mayfly sporting out its little hour, in dense masses of insect life, darkening the air a few feet above the gentle swell of the water. The heat of the afternoon brought them into existence. Every gauze wing is traversed by ten thousand fibres which defy the microscope to find a flaw in their perfection. The omniscience and the care bestowed upon that exquisite insect-toy, one would think, cannot be destined to be wasted in a moment. Yet, so it is: when the sun has sunk below the trees its little life is done. Yesterday it was not: to-morrow it will not be. God has bidden it to be happy for one evening. It has no night or skim to a second, and in the universe that marvelous life has appeared once and will appear no more. May not the race of man sink like the generations of the gadfly? Why cannot the Creator, so lavish in his resources, afford to annihilate souls as he annihilates insects?

"Would it not almost enhance his glory to believe it?

"That, brethren, is the question: and Nature has no reply. The fearful secret of sixty centuries has not yet found a voice. The evidence lies before us. We know what the greatest and wisest have had to say in favor of an immortality; and we know how, after eagerly devouring all their arguments, our hearts have sunk back in cold disproportionate, and to every proof as we read, our lips have responded mournfully that will not stand. Search through tradition, history, the world within and the world without, except in Christ, there is not the shadow of a shade of proof that man survives the grave."—Sermon on "The Point of Thomas."

A Conqueror's Tomb.

A little while ago I stood by the grave of the old Napoleon, a magnificent tomb of gilt and gold. It almost fit for a dead deity, and guard upon the sarcophagus of black Egyptian marble, where rests at last the ashes of the restless man. I leaned over the balustrade and thought about the career of the greatest soldier of the modern world. I saw him walking upon the banks of the Seine, contemplating suicide, I saw him at Toulon, I saw him putting down the mob in the streets of Paris. I saw him at the head of the army of Italy, I saw him crossing the bridge at Lodi, with the tri-color in his hand, I saw him in Egypt in the shadows of the pyramids, I saw him conquer the Alps, and mingle the eagles of France with the eagles of the crags. I saw him at Marengo, at Ulm and Austerlitz. I saw him in Russia, where the infantry of the snow and the cavalry of the wild blast scattered his legions like winter's withered leaves. I saw him at Leipsic, in defeat and disaster—driven by a million bayonets back upon Paris, clutched like a wild beast, banished to Elba. I saw him escape, and retake an empire by the force of his genius. I saw him upon the frightful field of Waterloo, where chance and fate combined to wreck the fortunes of their former king. And I saw him at St. Helena, with his hands crossed behind him, gazing out upon the sad and solemn sea.

I thought of the orphans and widows he had made—of the tears that had been shed for his glory, and of the only woman who ever loved him, pushed from his heart by the cold hand of ambition. And I said I would rather have been a French peasant, and worn wooden shoes. I would rather have lived in a hut, with a vine growing over the door, and the grapes growing purple in the kisses of the autumn sun. I would rather have been that poor peasant, with my loving wife by my side, knitting as the day died out of the sky—with my children upon my knees, and their arms about me. I would rather have been that man, and gone down to the tongueless silence of the dreamless dust, than to have been that imperial impersonation of force and murder, known as Napoleon the Great.

Contentment makes a believer rich, while plenty leaves the sinner poor.

DIED.

UNDERWOOD—In Carroll Co., Mo., January 21, 1878, Lydia A. Underwood, aged seventeen years, three months and two days.

Sister Underwood leaves a husband, father, mother, brothers, sisters and a large circle of friends to mourn her loss. She was beloved by all who knew her. She will be sadly missed in the family circle and in the church, but we sorrow not as others who have no hope. "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven . . . and the dead in Christ shall rise first." Blessed promise! May we all share in its blessings in the kingdom of our Father. Words of hope and comfort were spoken by the writer, to a large and attentive audience, from John xi. 25.
WILLIAM A. PINKERTON.

CROFT—In the town of Rockford, Carroll Co., Mo., Dec. 11, 1877, Lydia V. Croft, aged twenty-six years, four months and two days.

Sister Croft was a firm believer in the good news of the soon coming and reign of the Messiah. Her noble Christian deportment endeared her to all who knew her. She leaves a husband, two children, mother, sister and brothers, with many friends, to mourn her loss. May God direct them into the same faith and Christian deportment in order that they may meet her in that land where the inhabitants shall never say I am sick. A discourse was preached by the writer, to a large and attentive audience, from John xi. 25-26.

POETRY.

[Waymarks in the Wilderness.]

Evening Shades and Morning Light.

The World's day wearieth to its evening;
'Tis solemn, sad:
The silent shadows, down the hill-sides creeping,
Fall long and deep;
In boding clouds sinks down the western light;
But morning cometh hard on hand with noble might.

Long hath the noon of Pride and Wrong blaz'd high:
And Satan reigned,
And Man in sinful lust and pride sat by his ease;
Alas, how earth complained!
But now, were looking for the day of doom,
Noah prayed the year of the self-chosen sought comes.

And still, amid retreats of last [illegible]
They make and [illegible]
Deep Night: the festal chamber and they grow
Wanton on earth.
They plant, they build—at noon, feasting, [illegible]
And, as darkness cry, "Why comes he not?"

O, dweller of the Earth! few times on these
The oft—the more—
Blackness in heaven—and trouble on the sea—
Over all, despair.
Dimness of anguish on the wild river's path,
And death, and chaos—and the times over!

But lo! a gleaming from the Watcher on the earth,
A star of dawn!
Long, wild and weary hath the darkness been,
'Twill soon be gone.
The treasured joy, that hath'd through all the night,
At last seems kindling into morning light.

Yet to the Church no day has dawned as yet
To cheer her pain:
Her path to glory hath been dark, and dark
With blood and tears;
Her eyes have fail'n with looking for the day,
It seemed so fair, and yet so far away.

The Times grow darker, but she sings: "It is well,
He comes in power!"
The winds that smite the cedar, only swell
Her life-tree's bough:
Still, as the World's sky threatens, here grows bright,
Their cloud of darkness is her pillared light.

Sing songs, then Watcher at the door of Hope,
Thy last by night!
Dark is the thicket's, but the portals open—
Lo! all is bright.
The Bridegroom cometh! Hark! he calls the [illegible]
Receive "believe for joy," he shall be come.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Editor Retributor:—The book of revelations is considered obstruse and mysterious, and confessedly contains symbolisms, many of which cannot be thoroughly determined at the present time. This appears the more apparent, as so many attempts have been made to elucidate the subjects therein contained by eminently learned men but not any two of them have agreed exactly upon many of the points which they have intended to explain, the probable reason of this is contained in the introduction of the book itself, as it sets forth the idea, that it is not to be shown to every one, but only to a certain class i. e. "his servants." Chapter i. 1, but still notwithstanding its sublime diction as a whole, there are some things in it, highly instructive and encouraging, and quite comprehensible, and fitly in place at the present time, in view of the near approach of the glorious appearing and kingdom of our Lord and Master, Jesus, for the purpose of acknowledging and receiving to himself his believing, obedient, faithful people, those whose lives are hid with Christ in God. Col. iii. 3. Though now individually in the dust, or those who may be found alive at his coming, whether they be many or few.

This grand portion of the word, the last instruction which was entrusted to the beloved Apostle John, and whom I am sure fully comprehended him, for the cruelty and suffering which he endured for the faithfulness to his beloved Savior, and his rigid adherence to his word and testimony concerning himself and his kingdom. I say it commences with a highly interesting description of his glorious personal appearance, which should fill the hearts of all his waiting people with adoration and joy, as this highly favored messenger tells us that "when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." 1 John iii. 2, and not only so, but as we are told elsewhere, Eph. i. 22, 23,—iv. 15, 16, and Col. ii. 19, that his people shall form a portion of this distinguished personage, 'as his people form the body of which he is the head,' and thus be conformed to his image, being "members of his body, of his flesh and of his bones," Eph. iii. 30. Surely, surely, if we considered our position on this point, it would oblige us to avoid everything that would dishonor his name, or disgrace his cause!

Apparently there will be two comings, one when "every eye shall see him," Rev. i. 7, and another when he will "come as a thief." Rev. xvi. 15. There are also two reaping angels, Rev. xiv. 14, 16, this angel reaps the harvest of the earth, i. e., his people, and gathers them to himself, the other reaps the "vine of the earth which is cast into the winepress of wrath." Rev xiv. 18, 19. The thief-like coming will steal away his bride, and return with her as the clouds of his witnesses, Hebrews xii. 1, when "every eye shall see him." This people whom he had previously withdrawn from the earth, shall accompany him on his return for the purpose of subduing the earth, and all opposers of him, Rev. xix. 20, as well as to constitute under him a just, righteous and powerful government, by whom equity and just proceedings, to a certain part, will be wrought over to obedience, every opinion of on the earth at this day, requires just such a government as opposition reigns in every country, and oppression, and suffering is paramount.

We are informed that the events of our atmosphere are known from the earth, by the power of the natural sun of our planetary system, a fact about [illegible] after death is shown us by its fresh and beautiful [illegible] and remember it fruitful, just so, those dead in Christ, according to John, having been previously called from the earth, by the power of the sun of [illegible] Mal. iv. 2, will descend to reconstitute, and re-establish the whole manners, customs, and proceedings upon the earth, during the long [illegible] reign of Jesus the Messiah, and his people the Gods, forming this grand personage, even by John, that highly favored servant, to whom these wonders were shown.

But I note some of the peculiar features of this illustrious and glorious personage, chap. i. 13, "in the midst of the seven sticks was one like the son of man," Let more than an individual i. e. He whom Christ, he and Daniel! Or in other words Jesus and his people, his church, both forming a united glorious spirit man, or a mystical man, for a man was clothed down to the feet, with a garment, the very lowest member of the body was not left naked, as all members are indispensably necessary. 1 Cor. xii. 12.

This garment is no other than the righteousness of Jesus which "is to and upon all that believe," Rom. iii. 22, also, Gal. iii. 27, "for as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ," and thus Jehovah looks upon every one in Christ, as he sees Christ himself, and this righteousness of Christ forms the wedding garment without which no mortal will ever be admitted into the marriage feast, as the bride the lamb's wife! In the east when a king made a marriage for his son, it was the custom, that garments all alike were provided for, and given to the guests, friends of the bridegroom, and all appeared exactly alike, and to account without excuse, as it was thus provided and given gratuitously, hence the [illegible] parable of the certain king, and the summary dealing with the man found without the wedding garment, having refused to put it on, though bestowed upon him gratis.

But we have a further description, "his eyes were as a flame of fire," denoting anger and boiling evil to some, who would not have him to reign over them, including all the disobedient, repudiating, gainsaying, scoffing, mocking crowd, together with all caviling disobedient professors of the latter class there are far too many, although holding some points of truth! they appear to be teachers of Jesus, rather than learners, or followers, and suppose they can look out for themselves, and follow a letter line, than he has appointed! I have met, and talked with many such! What claim have men or women to be followers of Jesus, who ignore his appointment of baptism, and substitute a mode of their own instead? how do they get into him? or are they in Christ at all? I ask these questions, but do not expect a satisfactory answer, nor do I judge any one. If Jesus will dispense with his appointments, I am not the man who will find fault with him for so doing, but I am decidedly of opinion that he will not, I am so blind (if you like,) that I cannot see any other way of getting into him, nor any other mode, which will represent a burial and resurrection, outside of his appointment.

But there is something else in connection with the grand figure of this dazzling personage, "his voice was as the sound of many waters," chap. xvii. 15. John was told that the waters which he saw, were nations, multitudes, people, and tongues. Something like a similar form was seen by Dan. x. 6, "whose voice was as the voice of a multitude," no wonder, when the man in each case was composed of a multitude! The whole Christ, head and body, this voice is not much needed just now, but a day is approaching with giant strides, when the voice of this man of multitude, will command the respect and attention of the whole united earth, the man is now in the position described by Jeremiah, Lamentations, iv. 2. "The precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, how are they esteemed as earthen pitchers the work of the hands of the potter," if their position was only that of scorn, or scurrilous contempt, it would be pretty hard, being undeserved, but the blood of millions of them have been poured out like water, wherever power and opportunity afforded scope for zoology.

John the beloved Apostle, and lovely Christian character did not escape it! As he styles himself "your brother and companion in tribulation, and the kingdom of Jesus Christ, was in the isle of Patmos, etc." But what placed him in the desolate island, away from the habitations of all society, the cruelty of one of the Pagan emperors of Rome, some say Nero, and others Domitian. After exercising upon him cruelty sufficient to separate any man of life, who was not divinely protected as he was but what was the terrible crime, for the commission of which he was thus treated? Not murder, robbery, or any of these heinous offences. It was the unpardonable sin of high reference to the "word of God, and the testimony of Jesus," that was quite sufficient in those days, as it would be in the present day, for the wild Bonaparte is as much against the truth of God this day, it is only the power which is wanted, or the like genius would be erected upon the true followers of Jesus, for such a case [illegible] copy of the world exhibited the unfeeling spirit of the beloved Apostle?

When we see the brilliant appearance of this illustrious man—as he died he at last a pearl [illegible] Kingdom.

He was enabled to bear the dreadful view of [illegible] that shall be revealed in due time by the [illegible] at his last appearing, and [illegible] made to stand upon his feet that he could see and hear the glorious realities which he was commissioned to reveal. And it is remarkable that every one of these favored servants of Jehovah and Jesus—who has been similarly blessed with their confidence—had to pass through a symbolical death and resurrection before being employed to communicate for the instruction of future companies of the Lord's people, these messages of mercy and love, as well as wrath and indignation! Abraham passed through his "deep [illegible] horror of great darkness," but he saw beyond that a "burning lamp" denoting existence as well as light. See Gen. xv. 12, etc.

Ezekiel also fell upon his face at the glory which he saw, chap. i. 28, and after being raised up he saw visions of the wickedness and punishment, of the favored nation of Israel, as well as their future restoration and holiness. If we were permitted to look through a hole in the wall at the present day, we should see more flagrant wickedness than Ezekiel ever saw. I could tell something wonderful about that myself. I have seen a sight that one man in twenty thousand has not seen! And most certainly Jehovah is, at the present day, carrying out to the letter his character as given to Moses. Num. xxxiv. 6, 7. "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth," etc. But a day is fast approaching when this pent up wrath will be allowed to escape, and then what? God only knows who will escape! Those who are conscious of being in Jesus, and exhibiting a corresponding and consistent walk, and conversation, may "look up, and lift up their heads, for their redemption draweth nigh." Brethren, there is no time for caviling or bickering within ourselves, or with outsiders. We know not what a day may bring forth. Only faith and the obedience of faith will avail in the coming crisis.

Daniel, the "man greatly beloved," could not endure a view of the severe punishments and tremendous judgments which were to overtake and overwhelm his nation, for which he felt keenly, and prayed fervently. He also had to pass into the death state, being "without strength and without breath, and in a deep sleep, with his face to the ground," (see chapters viii. and x., of his prophecy,) but when made to stand upon his feet, he could see visions of future glory and of the blessedness of the kingdom of Jesus and his people.

Zechariah, another of the favored ones had to be "waked out of sleep" (chapter iv. 1,) also before he could see the wonderful contents of his prophecy, shewing the wickedness which was to characterize all nations before the glorious appearing of the kingdom of God, of which he gives a graphic description in a few words. Chapter xiv. Paul was caught up to the third heaven, rather snatched away in time, that up in altitude, to the same "third heaven which Peter looked for," according to the promise. And, lastly, John was as one dead before he could communicate the solemn realities which have passed, are now passing under the eyes of the present generation; and the whole of the events communicated by John, are more likely to be [illegible] upon this generation than not, what from pestilences and famines, shipwrecks, extraneous, fires, and other accidents, to say nothing about wars. I think no studious person would undertake to prove that we are not in the commencement of that time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation, and which will inaugurate the deliverance of Daniel's people, which now looks apparent. Jehovah will have a long account to settle with Gentiles; for more than two thousand and five hundred years of the severe oppression of his holy people, and not yet finished in so-called holy Prussia. Upon the whole, we are at this moment living in the most carefully grand and sublimely glorious period of our planet's history. May we be kept near to Jesus, and in a waiting, watching, praying position, and loving his appearing. Yours for the truth,

THOS CHURCHILL.

SELECTIONS.

[Correspondence N.Y. Observer.]

From Beyrout to Mount Carmel.

It was a fine day in the month of April that we started on horseback for our journey to the Sea of Galilee. Just here let me say a word in regard to the time of the year, when it is perfectly safe and agreeable to travel in the Holy Land. In the rainy season and during the summer heat, of course no sensible person thinks of traveling in that country. From the middle of March, at the earliest, to the middle of May is the most suitable season. April is the most delightful month of the whole year; the rain is then over, the foliage and flowers of the country are at their best, and the summer heat has not yet commenced.

In undertaking this journey, I was fortunate in having the company of my brother, who had spent ten years in Syria as a missionary of our Board, and an English gentleman, Rev. Mr. Lambert, whose uncle was for many years the Governor-General of India, a most agreeable travelling companion. Our route lay due south along the coast, with the Mediterranean gleaming in the morning sun on our right, and on the left that goodly Mount Lebanon. We encamped the first night at Khan Nabi-Younas (Kahn of the Prophet Jonah), which is said to mark the spot where Jonah was cast upon dry land by the whale. Early the next morning we were in our saddles, and, taking a path which led us back and high above the city of Sidon, we had a full and distinct view of that ancient daughter of Phœnicia, with her castle and old sea Fort in the distance. The celebrated gardens of Sidon, then in their prime, looked wondrously beautiful, with the morning sun playing upon the bright foliage of the olive, lemon and orange trees, and bananas, which grow here in great profusion. We wound down the hills and entered the city through one of its oldest gates. The place is thoroughly Eastern—the streets narrow, dirty, and, for the most part, arched over, and the houses damp and gloomy. We soon found refreshing shelter at the Sidon school, an institution admirably managed by Miss Eddy and Miss Lyons. Mr. W. K. Eddy, son of Rev. Dr. Eddy, of Beyrout, is our missionary here, and no one could bring more zeal and conscientious devotion to the work.

Our second encampment was on a high bluff, about two hours north of Tyre. All day we had been riding along Phœnicia's coast. About noon we passed a few ruins which mark the ancient site of Sarepta, and, stopping for a few moments, we took out our Bibles and read with new and vivid interest the story of Elijah coming to the Syro-Phœnician woman and of her wonderful cruse of oil. A little farther on we paused again, this time to examine a rude pottery, and, while watching the workmen moulding, much as they did in the time of the prophet, we could appreciate the illustration of Scripture, "as clay in the hands of the potter." Daily we comprehend more and more intelligently the force and beauty of Bible figures.

About nine o'clock on the third day from Beyrout, we entered by a small gate the second great city of Phœnicia. Tyre is said to have been founded by a colony from Sidon, two hundred and fifty years before the building of Solomon's temple—whence, perhaps, comes the expression, "Thou daughter of Sidon." The city has been destroyed many times, but has as often risen upon its ruins. The most memorable seige was that of Nebuchadnezzar, which lasted thirteen long years. From a Biblical standpoint, this sunny plain of Phœnicia is not especially interesting, but it was the great mother of commerce—the England, in fact, of the Old World. Some of the proudest cities along the shores of the Mediterranean—Carthage, Syracuse, Cadiz and Marseilles—were Phœnicia's daughters.

The present Tyre is a poor city, with very narrow streets and gloomy looking houses. The ancient "Mistress of the Seas" can now boast of only a few fishing-boats! We stepped into one of them and were guided by a Tyrian fisherman some little distance along the shore to the foot of a small hill, on which our tents were pitched, thus making a little variety to our seven hours in the saddle. Our camp is always a welcome sight after a weary day's ride, and our cook, a native of Abyssinia, is the central figure toward which all eyes wander as we come up to the tents.

After a refreshing night's rest, we commenced our march very early, and soon came to the summit of a hill, from which we looked down upon the memorable plain of Acre. It is a lovely, grand and imposing prospect, and in the far distance could be seen the ramparts of Acre, that fortress so renowned in history from the times of the crusades. The feelings of a lover of history and adventure can be better imagined than described as he looks down upon that long but narrow plain, with Mt. Carmel in view, forming a majestic background, and recalls its many historic associations with the days when Richard and Saladin, the Crusaders and Saracens, met in battle array before the walls of Acre. After a few hours' fast riding, we galloped up to the only gate of the city, passed the Turkish sentinels, and found ourselves within the fortification. We spent an hour in walking about the city. The strong position of the fort, on a peninsula jutting far out into the sea, made it so formidable to the trained veterans of Napoleon. Near the city is a mound, which is to this day called Richard Cœur de Leon, and standing on which Napoleon said to his friend and Marshal Murat: "The fate of the East is in yonder fort; the fall of Acre is the object of my expedition; Damascus will be its first fruits." Alas! for Napoleon and his dreams of conquest in the Orient! Eight times his trained soldiers, who had never known a defeat, were bravely led to the assault, but eight times they were led in vain. The heroic valor of the Turks, aided by the unconquerable firmness of a band of English marines, under the command of Sir Sidney Smith, proved too much even for the mighty warriors of France. A short time before the final attempt, was made against the ramparts of Acre, six thousand of these same French soldiers, under the very shadow of Mt. Tabor, had defeated more than thirty thousand Turks. At last, after sixty days, the French were compelled to abandon the seige, and the great military genius of the world ordered a retreat for the first time in his life. Leaving the city by its only gate, we followed the shore of the bay and soon crossed the river Kishon. It was to the brink of this stream that the four hundred prophets of Baal were driven from Mt. Carmel:

"The river of Kishon swept them away,
The ancient river—the river of Kishon."

We were now approaching Haifa and soon were encamped under the refreshing shadow of Mt. Carmel. The last sounds that we hear, as we retire to our tents, are the rolling waves of the Mediterranean, but after a peaceful Sabbath at Nazareth, we shall sleep again by the quiet waters of Galilee.—*S. THE FAMINE IN ASIA MINOR.

Deplorable Results of War's Devastation—Inhuman Conduct of the Turkish Government.

The Constantinople correspondent of the London Times writes, under date of April 25, as follows: "The famine in Asia Minor has assumed alarming proportions, and there is grave reason to fear that it has not yet reached its climax. It appeared first in the northeastern provinces, near the Russian frontier, and was there a result of the war. These provinces, it will be remembered, suffered severely during the campaign. If the harvest last year had been good, they might, perhaps, have so far recovered themselves as to have no fear of starvation, but, unfortunately, the usual drouth entirely destroyed the crops in many districts and prevented a plentiful supply of grain being obtained on the others. In addition to these misfortunes, the winter has been unusually long and severe, so that for several months the roads have been blocked up with snow, and the inhabitants of the outlying villages have had no possibility of replenishing, by borrowing or otherwise, their exhausted stores of food. Many have, consequently, already perished, and many more are on the brink of starvation. From the telegrams which have been received, we find that such district hopes to receive assistance from its neighbor, while in reality the neighbor itself requires assistance. Thus, the Armenian Archbishop of Van telegraphs, 'The population have only food for fifteen days more. The local authorities distribute bread to 12,000 persons in the town, but they have been compelled to reduce the rations one-half. The spectre of famine, I fear, whom we are ourselves giving [illegible] to 4,000. All our hopes are fixed on the grain which should be sent to us from Bitlis. We beseech you to get it sent as quickly as possible, so as to save the lives of the population.'

"How far these expectations of help from Bitlis are likely to be realized we may see from the following telegram sent by the Archbishop of that town: 'Here the poor classes have hitherto borne their privations without murmuring. Completely exhausted, they now appeal to public charity. Unless they receive immediate help their life is in danger. All suffer from the famine. A multitude of children, abandoned by their parents in despair, wander about the streets. Have pity on us.'

"I might multiply individually these telegrams, for they come in almost daily from the principal centers, and each day the cry for help becomes more piercing and desperate. Here, for example, is one of the last from the Syrian Archbishop of Moussul: 'Lamentable and indescribable scenes. The famished people collect from all sides in the town. Not finding any barley, they eat carrion, and disease is the result. Considerable numbers of persons, finding nothing, die of starvation. In the name of the sufferings endured, we appeal to your charity, and beseech speedy help.'

"The way in which the government has acted with regard to this widespread famine does not give good auguries for the future. Until quite recently it adopted the convenient plan of simply ignoring it, and sent from time to time stringent orders to the Governor General that not only taxes for the current year, but also the arrears of taxes should be collected without delay. To all appeals for assistance it turned a deaf ear, and decided, with short-sighted avarice, that the fiscal wants of the treasury should be alone considered. Indignant at this heartless and foolish action on the part of the government, the Armenian community determined to assist their suffering fellow-countrymen, and for this purpose organized a system of relief with a central committee in Constantinople. Considerable sums were collected and dispatched to the principal towns in the famine districts, but it was found that part of the money distributed was seized by the tax-gatherers, and several of the local committees telegraphed that it was of little use to send money, for there was no grain to be bought. A new system, had, therefore, to be adopted. Not money, but grain, had to be sent, and this was no easy matter, for the roads were blocked up with snow. Now, fortunately, the snow is melting, and the roads are being opened, but the pecuniary means at the disposal of the committee are far from sufficient.

"The government seems now to be awakening from its torpor and apathy, and begins to perceive that the existence of the famine can no longer be officially denied. The Armenians are actively organizing relief, the local and European press have taken up the matter warmly, money is flowing in from Western Europe, and even the Emperor of Russia has sent a subscription of 10,000 francs. In these circumstances the Porte feels that it must do something, but if we judge from its first acts we must conclude that it would have done better to remain inactive. Its first acts have been measures of repression. Yesterday it suppressed the Levant Herald for an article in which the dangers of the situation were clearly and forcibly pointed out in calm, moderate language, and to-day I learn from a trustworthy source that it intends to dissolve the Armenian relief committees on the ground that the organization is a status in statu, which might be used for revolutionary purposes, and which, in any case, cannot be tolerated in a well-governed country."

Eating Christs' Flesh and Drinking his Blood.

"As to the metaphor itself, if it seems at first violent and unnatural, we are to observe that on the subject of the personal devotion required by Christ from his followers his language was often of this vehement kind, and that his first followers in describing their relation to him in like manner overleap the bounds of ordinary figurative language. Christ demanded of his followers that they should hate their father and mother for his sake, and St. Paul in many passages declares that Christ is his life and his very self. It is precisely this intense personal devotion, this habitual feeding on the character of Christ, so that the essential nature of the Master seems to pass into and become the essential nature of the servant—loyalty carried to the point of self-annihilation—that is expressed by the words 'eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ.'"—Selected.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the visible Second of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the translatation of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a early belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Coming Age—Its Proximity—Christ's Literal Narrative Continued—Fifth Period—Signs of His Coming—Social World—Concluding Features—Fifth Specification—Sixth Specification.—No. 28.

J. P. WEETHER.

Fifth Specification—Marrying and Giving in Marriage.—This implies worldly prosperity; for it is found, that, when times are severe, marriages are not so frequent. The state of that period—previous to Christ's return, is indicated by a marked increase of permanent connections and settlement in life, by families, communities, and nations—an age of marriage among such as are denominated Christian nations. Marriage is particularly an institution of this age—worldly in its nature and is a sign of continued worldly expectations. Since, in the coming age they neither marry nor are given in marriage, there is no feature, that so clearly marks the total indifference of the age relative to the return of our Savior.

Are we now living in such an age? Is it, in this particular, as in the days of Noah, and of Lot? Let us compare the three periods—the days of Noah and of Lot with our days, as exhibited in Christian lands.

"As in the Days of Noah."—They were wholly absorbed in the occupations of the age. The world was full of persons devoted to its interests, and knew nothing else. They created realms of imagination, and upon these they spent all their thoughts. What shall we eat and drink, and how shall we be clothed? Present enjoyment absorbed their entire being. To-day let us live; to-morrow can provide for itself. Who ever saw a to-morrow? One to-day, in their estimation, was worth any amount of to-morrows. To do good was no part of their creed; they made gain and pleasure their study. These were their gods. They looked no further since their desires looked into no future state.

"As in the Days of Lot."—The citizens were like those of the old world. Their morals were totally depraved. They knew no God but passion. They lived in moral pollution, bent on defilement, even should angels be their victims.

Sixth Specification—"Knew Not."—Knowledge sometimes means belief—"This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." John xvii. 3. Such appears to be its meaning as used by our Savior. Noah's preaching, and the building of the ark, were both sources of knowledge, but they failed to produce faith—they believed not. So, also did Lot fail in his message to Sodom.

In both cases, the minds and hearts of the hearers were so fully pre-occupied with other objects, that they had no room for such unpleasant messages. They did not believe because they would not. Ample testimony was within reach but it was rejected. Light was before them, but, preferring darkness, they closed their eyes. Noah produced no converts except in his own family and Lot failed in his own house.

The inhabitants of the old world and of Sodom were alike in this; that they refused to credit what they heard and saw. They were so absorbed in mind and affections as to take no notice of warnings till the events themselves shut every avenue of escape, the idea, conveyed by Christ to his four apostles, is evidently the following:—I am teaching you (and what I say unto you I say unto all) about my return to the earth, I wish my disciples to know when I am about to return so that they may be ready and waiting. I have given you a picture of the natural world; also, I have shown you the conditions of the nations; I now give you a photograph of the masses; they shall be, as to morals and occupations, like the people of the old world in the days of Noah's preaching, and of Sodom in the days of Lot; they shall be so absorbed in worldly occupations and worldly amusements, that they will pay no attention to the signs of my approach, and will be suddenly and unexpectedly overwhelmed. The strong point of resemblance is this:—They knew not—believed not.

Do the masses reflect the images of the old world and of Sodom, in this particular? We know that the deluge came as a thief upon the inhabitants of the old world; and likewise were the Sodomites overtaken; but how with the age that shall be living when Christ appears? What tests will be given them so as to test their infidelity? They will be allowed every opportunity to know when Christ's return is impending. The signs were to be so varied as to suit every class of mind, and so numerous as to leave all without excuse. The approach of the flood had but two signs, the preaching of Noah and the construction of the ark; Sodom had only one distinct warning, the cry of Lot; but the return of the Savior is heralded by nearly thirty. No one can avoid the signs without closing the avenues of sight and hearing. The signs of Christ's coming, were to be printed in the heavens, in the sun, moon, and stars, on the ocean, and among the nations. The social and religious worlds were to be stamped with the signs of his advent; and that the analogy might be clear, they were to be explained to the people, as the deluge and overthrow of Sodom, were predicted by Noah and Lot.

Has the present age been taught the signs, and their meaning? This cannot be questioned. Such a class of expositors arose forty years ago; and their instructions have continued without interruption to the present hour. The analogy required such a class to arise, and it has arisen, and it has given the world an opportunity to develop its character, and that character has been developed, and is being exhibited daily. How has this message been treated by mankind generally? Has it not shared the same fate as those of Noah and Lot? The proclamation of the near approach of the Son of Man has been made for nearly one-half a century. Who have given heed to the warning? Christ did not say that his coming would be as in the days of Jonah. God sent Jonah with a proclamation similar to that of Noah, Lot, and also to that which should warn the world of the coming of the Messiah. He (Jonah) first ran away, shirking responsibility; but God sent a whale after him, and he was brought back in rather a summary manner. The second time he stood his ground, entered Nineveh, a day's journey, and cried, Forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown.

So the people of Nineveh believed God; and proclaimed a fast, and put on sackcloth, from the greatest of them even to the least of them. For word came unto the king of Nineveh, and he arose from his throne, and he laid his robe from him, and covered (him) with sackcloth and sat in ashes. And he caused (it) to be proclaimed and published through Nineveh by the decree of the king and his nobles, saying, Let neither man nor beast, herd nor flock, taste anything: let them not feed, nor drink water: But let man and beast be covered with sackcloth, and cry mightily unto God; yea, let them turn every one from his evil way, and from the violence that (is) in their hands. Who can tell (if) God will turn and repent, and turn away from his fierce anger, that we perish not? And God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way; and God repented of the evil that he had said that he would do unto them; and he did in not." Jonah iii. 3-10.

This message was believed, and, at the same time, heeded; not so in the days of the coming of Christ.

They KNEW NOT.—We do not feel willing to dismiss this feature of the last days without calling attention to it with greater emphasis. It is the key by which we gain access to the state of the world on the eve of the Advent. It is an age of an extraordinary increase of knowledge. Many shall run to and fro and knowledge shall be increased, and yet, of the coming of Christ they will not know. Why will they not know that Christ's coming is near? They will be too much absorbed in worldly matters to hear that subject investigated, or to read its publications. The multitude of subjects claiming attention will crowd out this topic. The masses of the religious world give no attention to the warning; what then could we expect from the world of unbelievers?

There will be a generation, on which Christ will come, as the flood came on the old world, and the storm of fire and brimstone on the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah. If the present generation is similar to those people and has had all the signs and warnings, why may not this be the generation that shall witness the coming of the Lord?

It is asked by an objector, If we had the signs predicted by Christ, why the have they not carried conviction to minds of more persons? The reasons can be found in what we have previously stated. The people of this age, who are strictly the children of this world, occupy all their thoughts on the affairs of the social and political affairs of the times in which they live. They have no leisure to devote to the signs of the times. They do not have faith because they have no knowledge, and they have no knowledge because they have neither time nor taste for such knowledge; and they have other subjects to occupy their minds, better suited to their carnal desires.

It was very distinctly shown by Christ that the signs were not to produce faith. If they were designed to carry conviction they would destroy the characteristics of the age, "When the Son of Man cometh shall he find faith (this belief) on the earth?" The reasons why professors of religion, in general, are faithless as to the signs, will be considered under the head of signs in the religious world. Also many signs in the social world are so intimately blended with religious interests that they will be considered under that head.

We shall close this number relative to the signs in the moral and physical worlds, by asking, If we have not had the signs described by the Savior, which mark his near Advent, what will they be? and what effect will they produce? And what will be the character of the age that will see them? Take Christ's words as recorded by Matthew, Mark and Luke, and tell us what the signs are? of what event are they the signs? and what will be the character of the people, that shall witness the signs? And who will interpret the signs and give to mankind the warning?

He has named the physical signs as follows: Signs in the sun, in the moon, and in the stars, in the heavens above, sea and the waves roaring. If we have not had these signs, what will they be?

"On the earth, distress of nations with perplexity." If earth does not mean earth, but simply a state, where, then, are the nations? If sun, moon, and stars, in a plain historic narration, mean communities, what do they symbolize in visions? How are we to know when they are literal and when symbolic? If, in plain historic narration, where all other words are used in their plain grammatical sense, sun, moon and stars, are used in a figurative sense without the least intimation of the change, how are we to know when they are literal? Are all nations included in the expression, "All the tribes of the earth?" Matt. xxiv. 3. By what rule can we make the beginning of verse 25 Luke xxi, figurative and the end literal? If the "nations" are on the earth, where are the sun, moon, and stars?

A good character is the best tombstone.

"Ye Know Not When the Time Is."

A good brother writes to me, "I am preaching the Lord's coming in 1880—definite time,—or, to say the least, the vision ends this year. If Jerusalem was taken in A. D. 70."

"A Christadelphian" says, in a recent RESTITUTION, "The Lord cannot come till 1883."

A few years ago I was kindly and solemnly warned to get ready, for the Lord would come at a certain hour and minute on a certain day in April. The year and day had been found by chronological calculations, and the hour and minute given by special revelation of the spirit. I answered that I could not prove, and did not wish to that the Lord would not come at the time named; yet those friends who thought themselves so fortunate and so highly favored had furnished nothing that was evidence to my mind for their definite time. So I could take no special interest in it.

Not a few think they have good reasons to believe that the main periods ended in 1874, or at other times in the past; and still others, that they reach to various points beyond 1883.

Now, these several classes of persons are neither "fools" nor "insane." They are, for the most part, careful students. And they are not so peculiar as some think; for nearly all the leading commentators previous to 1880, have done substantially the same as they—studied the periods and expressed opinions about the time of the Lord's coming, and of other events in the future. If we wished to excuse ourselves, and were disposed to judge as we are judged, we might charge nearly all our "time failures" on great lights high up in the orthodox world; for scarcely a time has been set by Adventists that had not previously been set by some "standard" of orthodox opinion. But that is of little account. It is of more worth to have tested the time theories of the Christian church. Our experience in that line should have taught us caution. Not that there is any great wrong or disgrace in believing and publishing that the Lord will come at a particular time. That may be a harmless interest in the crowning act of the ages. It may, too, sometimes have a spice of vanity in it, to succeed where so many have failed. Its effect on unbelievers is hardly worth notice. Those who would use that as an excuse for continuing in sin, would find some other if that were denied them. Then,—

1. Though we seem much at sea in definite chronology, the reasonable circle of termini extends at least twenty years yet.

2. There is no excuse for making opinions on definite time a test.

3. We have the best of proofs, that the coming of the Lord is "near, even at the doors;" so that we are emphatically in the watching and waiting time.

4. We must "occupy till he comes," each at his proper and usual vocation. "Serving the Lord" is consistent with "diligence," and now as much as ever before.

5. We shall, doubtless, at best have a very imperfect knowledge of the what and the when connected with the great coming. The pre-conceptions of the Lord's doings have always been imperfect.

6. We need be careful not to defer the getting ready till he comes, or till some resistless excitement nerve us to it.

SELECTIONS.

[New Era, March 18.]

Prophecies Concerning Israel, their Land and King, Not Yet Fulfilled.

Sir:—Your kind acceptance of my first letter on the subject of Israel's future, as God hath revealed it by his holy prophets, encourages me to send you a second for publication in the New Era. The New Era, by the way, how suggestive and appropriate! That will be a New Era, indeed, in which the prophecies concerning Israel, their land and king, shall be accomplished! That day of Messiah, which seen afar off, gladdened Israel's great progenitor, the friend of God! The times of restitution of all things, until which heaven receives the Lord Jesus, the appointed Restorer. See Acts iii. 21; Isa. xlix. 8, 12. That day in which not only Paul and all who love Christ's appearing, "shall receive the promised crown of life, righteousness, and glory;" (2 Tim. iv. 8; 1 Peter v. 8; James i. 12.) but, in which the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people from the four corners of the earth accompanied with such far greater displays of divine power than were wrought in their deliverance from Egypt, that Israel shall no more say: "The Lord liveth which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt; but the Lord liveth which brought up and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them, and they shall dwell in their own land." Isa. xl.; Jer. xxiii. 7, 8. Hear, O my reader, what the God of Israel hath also said. In verses 5, 6—"Behold the days come, that I will raise up unto David a righteous branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely." Also, in chapter ii. 17, 18: "At that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord, and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord, to Jerusalem; neither shall they walk any more after the imagination of their evil hearts. In those days the house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I have given for an inheritance unto your fathers.' That is "the day the Lord hath made" for the manifestation of his power and goodness in and on account of Christ, and his people "will be glad and rejoice in it;" and welcome him with hosannas, saying, "Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Compare Psalm cxviii. 24, 26, with Matt. xxiii. 39.

Many, in our day, are looking for the restoration of Israel to Palestine through the Rothschilds and other rich Jews purchasing the land from the Porte! That a great many Israelites are now settling in Palestine, and that many more will do so, in blindness and unbelief, there can be no doubt; but that the land covenanted to Abraham and to his seed, Christ; that Immanuel's land, that Jerusalem, the city of the Great King, should be disposed of forever by the Turks or inherited by men, whether Jews or Gentiles, who are not in Christ, cannot be. Only in the Lord Jesus can the seed of Israel permanently possess or inherit the land which the Possessor of heaven and earth covenanted unto Abraham and to his seed for an everlasting possession. Gen. xiii. 14, 15. Hence, not money, or the Porte, or any combination of Gentile powers, will or can fulfill the prophecies of Israel's restoration, but the Lord's Anointed, whose future mission and work the conversion and restoration of Israel is—Isa. xlix. 6; Luke i. 69, 70.—Omega.

"Even So, Come, Lord Jesus."

It was centuries ago, on that lonely Isle of Patmos, that the beloved disciple uttered those sweet words: "Even so, come Lord Jesus." It was in response to the solemn watchword of Jesus himself, "Surely I come quickly." It was God's Holy Spirit that inspired this affectionate prayer in the heart of the exiled Revelator, and again wafted it in incense before the throne of the Eternal.

That disciple, after beholding wondrous visions of the mighty future, and marking the course of time as events rolled on, had his heart filled with love to the Savior, and he longed for the triumph and reign of his blessed Lord; for he well knew that with the coming of that event wickedness should cease in the earth, and the glory of the Lord should cover it as the waters cover the deep.

Although eighteen centuries have nearly passed away since these words were first uttered; though many sorrows, trials, and disappointments have befallen God's holy watchers, during these long years, in their struggles to hold fast the "blessed hope;" though Jesus has not yet come in his glory; and though many are growing weary, and are saying, "My Lord delayeth his coming;" his coming is nevertheless certain, and we still say, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus?"

Yes, the Savior will come, for he has promised it, and he never deceives. When he comes he will raise the sleeping saints, restore the earth to its Eden state, and reign with his people. Then will be commingled together in heavenly union the voices of angelic hosts with those of the redeemed, praising God for his righteous judgments, and for bringing redemption to the world. But, oh, what a fearful doom will be that of the wicked, who will then "call upon the rocks and mountains to hide them from the face of him that sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb!"

Dear reader, do you love Jesus? and, if so, do you "love his appearing?" Are you praying to be accounted worthy to escape that hour of trial which is about to come upon the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth? Do you expect to be a guest at the marriage supper, or will you be shut out with the unwatchful "foolish virgins?" These are questions of intense moment for all; for "the day of the Lord is near, it hasteth greatly." "Blessed is he that watcheth." "The watchman said, 'The morning cometh, and also the night.'" Strange that morning and night should come together; but so it is—morning as bringing deliverance to the righteous, but night as bringing destruction upon the wicked. Solemn thought! Are we ready for these things?—Canon Hoare.

SENTENTIOUS PARAGRAPHS.

"The man of wisdom is the man of years."

What a world of trouble the following might save critics and fault-finders! It quite puts out the lantern of Diogenes:

"'Tis vain to seek in men for more than man."

Kind words are jewels beyond price, powerful to heal the wounded heart, and to make the weighed-down spirit glad.

BE STILL.

"'Be still, be still,' though all should seem Like visions of a troubled dream,
'Be still,—be still,' each murmuring thought,
For God is love, and changes not.

"The hand that moves the shifting scene
Plans what shall be—as what has been;
That hand is his—it holds thee still;
Calmly submit and trust his will."

Prayer is the peace of our spirit, the stillness of our thoughts, the evenness of our recollection, the seat of meditation, the rest of our cares, and the calm of our tempest.—Jeremy Taylor.

The cure of an evil tongue must be done at the heart. The weights and the wheels are there, and the clock strikes according to its motion. A guileful heart makes a guileful tongue and lips; it is the workhouse where is the forge of deceits and slanders; and the tongue is only the outer shop where they are vended, and the door of it. Such ware as is made within, such, and no other, can come out.—Leighton.

By a compensating process of nature men are rendered penetrating in proportion to the efforts made to deceive them.—C. P. Adams.

Thou can't not to thy place by accident:
It is the very place God meant for thee;
And shouldst thou there small scope for action see,
Do not for this give room to discontent.
—French.

An injury is not always a reason for retaliation; nor is the folly of others with regard to us a sufficient reason for imitating it with regard to them.

A holy life, spent in the service of God, and in communion with him, is, without doubt, the most pleasant and comfortable life that any man can live in this world.

GOD.—God is a light that is never darkened; an unwearied life that cannot die; a fountain always flowing; a garden of life; a seminary of wisdom; a radical beginning of all goodness.

Beyond the tumult, wars and fears,
Which all our earthly progress bear,
The city of our God appears,
Our stately New Jerusalem.

Do you know the feelings of expecting a friend to come, and he delays? Do you know what it is to be in anxiety lest something should happen which may happen or may not, or to be in suspense about some important event, which makes your heart bent when you are reminded of it, and of which you think the first thing in the morning? Do you know what it is so to live upon a person who is present with you that your eyes follow him, that you read his soul, that you see all the changes in his countenance, that you anticipate his wishes, that you smile in his smile, and are sad in his sadness, and are downcast when he is vexed, and rejoice in his successes? To watch for Christ is a feeling such as all these, as far as feelings of this world are able to shadow out those of another.—R. New man.

THE RESTITUTION.

H. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JUNE 2, 1880.

ONE half of the year 1880 will soon be in the past. Will all our subscribers and friends remember THE RESTITUTION. Please both to renew, and, also, to solicit subscriptions. When our brethren can render extra assistance, it is very welcome, as our paper has not become self-sustaining. Labor and sacrifice for the Lord will be rewarded in the kingdom.

In common with other papers, we have adopted the rule not to make appeals for pecuniary aid to individuals. We, however, give a letter from Sister E. Mathis, in another column, as hers seems to be an urgent case. To those of our brethren who can help her, we would say, send direct to her, and save us the trouble and expense of remitting. Her letter must speak for itself, as we have no personal knowledge of the case.

THE Quarterly Conference convened at the Antioch meeting house according to appointment. Although the attendance was large on Sunday from the churches and neighborhoods in the more immediate vicinity, yet there was a feeling of disappointment that but few from remoter churches were present. Brother J. M. Stephenson was present, and spoke several times. It was a further disappointment to a great many that Brother Corbaley was not able to preach, as he was afflicted with asthma. Remarkably good attention was given to the preaching on Sunday. Two persons were baptized in the afternoon and the meeting closed Sunday evening.

Scripture Illustrations.

We take the following extracts from a sermon preached by Dr. Joseph Wild, May 30, 1880, and printed at length in The Champion of June 5th. The sermon was on the National Oneness of Israel and Judah. The future union of Judah and Israel is most expressively set forth when the symbolism, as explained in the sermon, is fully apprehended:

"The word of the Lord came again unto me, saying, moreover, thou son of man, take thee one stick, and write upon it, for Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions; then take another stick, and write upon it, for Joseph the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel his companions and join them one to another into one stick; and they shall become one in thine hand. And when the children of thy people shall speak unto thee, saying, wilt thou not show us what thou meanest by these? Say unto them, thus saith the Lord God; behold, I will take the stick of Joseph, which is in the hand of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his fellows, and will put them with him, even with the stick of Judah, and make them one stick, and they shall be one in mine hand. And the sticks whereon thou writest shall be in thine hand before their eyes. And say unto them thus saith the Lord God; behold I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side and bring them into their own land; and I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all. Ezek. xxxvii. 15-22."

"A knowledge of Oriental covenant making may help you to better understand the stick theology of Ezekiel. In the Savior's time they had began to write their arguments upon parchments. These agreements they had two ways of destroying, one was crossing out or over the writing. The other was nailing the document to a tree—this latter mode men carried out when the parties were wont to meet in the country, and not having pen or ink. They would fold up the document, then make a wooden pin or nail if they hadn't a metal one, and drive the nail or pin through the parchment into a tree. This broke the covenant or canceled the agreement, whichever it might be. You will see how Paul makes use of these things in enforcing the doctrine of the atonement of Christ upon the Colossians, "Blotting out the hand-writing of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross." To convey the certainty and surety of the atonement Paul says our sins were both erased and nailed to a tree. Further back in Hebrew history sticks were in use in connection with covenant making. By tying a string on a staff a bargain was made and sealed. To unloose the string was to dissolve the agreement. A person placed in authority had a stick given him as a symbol of power. If a master wished to dismiss a servant so blind he would take the staff or stick of agreement and break it. That plainly told the servant he was dismissed. A relic of this custom is still maintained in Israel-England. When the lord high steward takes office, the badge and symbol of power is a stick, and when he leaves, his last act is to break this stick. The royal scepter of England represents the queen. In the house of commons they cannot open till the mace bearer places the royal staff upon an open table. When it is removed the house ceases to be in lawful session. It represents the queen. It corresponds to Aaron's rod. There were in olden times royal rods, princes rods, and tribal rods. When a king made a covenant with one of his subjects the same was ratified by the subject tying a green string on the royal staff. Such a covenant was dissolved by untying the string. The royal stick was called beauty staff, because it was handsome, generally being covered with gold and adorned with precious stones. The common stick was called the staff of bands, when it was made into a covenant sign. If the covenant was between a servant and his master, or between the subject and the ruler, it was tied with two strings, a scarlet one for the ruler and a green one for the subject. Sometimes a third party was called in to be a witness, he would tie a purple string. Such a covenant was supposed to be extra strong and binding. This fact gave rise to the saying 'that a threefold cord is not easily broken.'

"A knowledge of these ancient customs, as I have often told you, aids us very much in understanding the Scriptures. Take the foregoing, and read the eleventh chapter of Zechariah, and you will see how the same is set forth. He. God, through this prophet, says: 'And I will feed the flock of slaughter, even you, O, poor of the flock. And I took unto me two staves; the one I called Beauty, and the other I called Bands; and I fed the flock.' Again, in the tenth verse, he says: 'And I took my staff, even Beauty, and cut it asunder, that I might break my covenant which I had made with all the people.' Thus, also, in the fourteenth verse: 'Then I cut asunder mine other staff, even Bands, that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel.' To understand Ezekiel, in the symbolism of joining two sticks, or Bands, or staves together, you will remember that, when two tribes agreed to unite and become one people, they spliced their tribal staves together making them one stick to express their union and oneness. The sticks would be tied, and sometimes they would write on them, the same would then be kept just as we in this day keep sacred a document. Ezekiel was ordered to join the stick of Israel and the stick of Judah together, and make them one stick, and they shall be one in mine hand. And the sticks whereon thou writest shall be in thine hand before their eyes."

SELECTIONS.

Impending Doom.

Unbelief will not make the promise or the threatening of God of none effect, and though myriads may ignore the solemn fact, and though myriads more may—as predicted—laugh to scorn the Divine denunciations of impending doom, it is at hand. If the Bible be true there can be nothing more certain than this, that Divine judgment must close this dispensation, and that in all probability within a brief period of time. Introductory and premonitory vials of wrath, have already been poured out on the Papal Kingdoms of Western Europe, and on the Ottoman Empire of Eastern Europe; and the sixth vial has been pouring out for the last fifty years, and seems to have all but accomplished its appointed task, of drying up the Euphrates, or wasting away the power of Turkey; the seventh vial brings the fall of Babylon, the marriage of the Lamb, and the final destruction of Anti-christ and all his hosts. It is the vial of the consummation, and when it is poured forth the great voice out of heaven proclaims "IT IS DONE."

The political events of the last century have been the swift and sure precursors of the long-foretold destruction with the brightness of Christ's coming, which awaits the apostate church of this dispensation. But man's eyes are blinded and they see it not! Let the watchmen of the Most High preach to an unrepentant world, the preaching that He bids them, for "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be destroyed!" As foretold in the Apocalypse, all the sore judgments that have been sent on apostate Christendom have failed to lead it to repentance (Rev. ix. 21; xvi. 11), and a contemplation of its actual state affords the strongest of all arguments for a belief in its impending doom. There is such a thing as the measure of iniquity being full; there is such a thing as the long-suffering of God being exhausted.

Let the universality and integrity of the apostacy of the professing Christian church be considered, and the length of time during which it has existed, as well as the way in which it has rejected every call to repentance. It is not the Papal church alone that has become apostate; look at the lands where Christianity took its rise, and established itself in the earliest centuries. What is the state of the Syrian, the Nestorian, the Armenian, the Maronite, the Coptic churches, with their millions of so-called Christian adherents? They are systems in which the grossest ignorance, idolatry, priestcraft, and corruption prevail, and in which the true gospel is almost as much ignored as among the heathen themselves. They who have traversed these lands, witnessed the unmeaning and degrading bodily exercises, and heard the endless vain repetitions which pass in their churches for Christian worship, have marvelled how anything so unlike the religion of Christ and his apostles can retain even the name of christianity. It should be remembered also that the majority of the population of these once Christian lands, long ago abandoned the name of Christ, and under the pressure of Mohammedan conquest and persecution, became avowedly followers of the false prophet.

When from these smaller and more ancient Eastern churches we turn to the great Greek church with its ninety millions of members, and all its minor subdivisions of Syrian, orthodox and schismatic, Bulgarian and Roumanian, matters are little better; idolatry is universal, and the prevalent ignorance of the true gospel almost as great as in China or Japan. Do not the very missionary efforts we, as Protestants, are making in all these lands, prove, that we are driven by the appalling facts of the case to regard them as little more enlightened than heathen countries, as possessed merely of the names and forms of Christianity, but as destitute of its spirit and power?

And what pen can paint its true tints, the dark depths of apostacy in which Papal Europe has long been plunged! Familiarity with its enormity may blunt our sense of its awful guilt, but this continuance in sin only serves to enhance the long-slumbering wrath of God. Reformations have separated fragments from an idolatrous and Christless church, but the church as a whole has remained unreformed. Two hundred millions of souls are still bound in its hopeless bondage of soul-destroying error; its blasphemous head still lords it, with ever increasing claims to Divine prerogatives, over all these multitudes. Religion is there, but it is a hollow mocking form; worship is there, but it consists in lip service and genuflexions, it is not worship in spirit and in truth; the word of God is there, but it is locked up in an unknown tongue, and studiously withheld from the people; adoration is there, but it is the adoration of saints and angels, of Pope and Virgin Mary, of picture and crucifix, of statues and dressed-up dolls, of shrines and relics, and of a wrecked God. Before all these they bow! How low they bow! How low the blind bend before the idol-god they create! Dressed in fine linen and gorgeous silk, in lace and scarlet, and robes of glittering gold, they lead the people from the pure spiritual religion of Jesus Christ, to holy sacraments without regenerating power to holy places of stone and marble, to holy fumes of burnt wood, to holy days of their own appointment, to holy water which can never wash away sin, to holy candles which enlighten no dark mind, to the mass, to confession, to penance, to indulgences, to extreme unction, to anything, everything, except to God the Judge of all, to Jesus Christ the only Savior, and to the Scriptures which testify of him.

How much longer shall the poison-bearing vine of this Papal apostasy cumber the earth with its rank branches, and destroy men with its fatal clusters of falsehood? How much longer shall this Man of Sin and son of perdition show himself as God on earth, and blasphemously claim to be infallible? How much longer shall the nations of Europe be by it deceived and deluded into foul superstitions, or driven to revolt against God in open infidelity? Are these things to be suffered to continue under the name of the religion of Christ?

Zion has become Babylon and the professing church a harlot; and Babylon has grown in sin, and become ripe for retribution. All the judgments that have been sent on her, have failed to lead her to repentance, all protests against her corruption have proved powerless to abate one iota of her idolatries and false assumptions. Rome has proved herself irreformable and deserving of the dreadful doom so decreed against her.—H. Grattan Guinness.

The Jubilee.

Now is our harvest time. The fields are waving with beautiful products which God means that we shall gather and store for our Jubilee. Industry and toil are required. We must thrust in the sickle, and gather the blessed sheaves, and lay up for ourselves treasures in heaven. It will not do to play the sluggard while that ripe vintage is inviting us to gather. We must work while we may, and lay up while it is within our reach. When once the trumpet sounds it will be too late to begin to lay up for the year of rest. Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation. Neglecting this bright, rich, plenteous summer period, we must starve when the faithful are feasting on abundance. But if diligent now, we shall have an ample portion.

No Christian effort will ever be lost. Every good deed done here, every gift of charity, every prayer for Zion, every self-denial for Jesus, every cup of cold water given to a thirsty disciple, every word of serious admonition whispered in a sinner's ear, shall contribute to swell the accumulation for a coming festival sublime as heaven. Twenty, forty, sixty years have some been toiling in the exhaustless field. Oft have they been faint and weary. Heavy upon them has been the burden of the day. Hunger and nakedness, peril and bitter soul-sickness have often oppressed them. But the weight of their long service, their hardships and pains, have all the while been laying up for them "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." And, oh, what abundant treasures have some of them garnered in heaven for the everlasting year of their rest. Blessed storages of good! How will the soul leap when the trump shall sound to come and feast upon them forever. Then shall "the good wine" come which has been so long delayed. Then shall our Lord bring us into the celestial parlors which his own hand has filled up for us, and seat us in the chiefest place, and set before us what has been kept for us, and cause us to feast upon "fat things full of marrow," with Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and all the saints of God, without interruption and without end.

Hail, then, to the blessed year of Jubilee! Hail to the year of God's redeemed—year of release for them that sigh—year of the Exile's return to his home—year of rest to them that toil—year of finished salvation to the lost! We bid thee welcome! Yes, welcome, thou coronal of time! Welcome, thou opener of prison doors! Welcome, restorer of our beloved dead! Welcome, health to the nations and liberation to the bound! The weary world waits impatient for thy coming! Millions of saints stir in their mossy graves impatient for thy dawn! Break, sacred morning, and lighten to their birth the glories of the new creation! Let time's slow chariot-era drive on without delay, and hasten to the blessed consummation! Behold! "He that testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly; amen. Even so, Come Lord Jesus!"—Dr. Seiss.

RUSSIA.—THE BLACK SEA FLEET.

ST. PETERSBURG, June 12.—The Naval Superintendent of the Russian Black Sea fleet is in St. Petersburg to receive instructions. The circumstance is noticed in connection with the rumors that the French and English fleets are going to Besika Bay.

The Empress of Russia was buried with imposing ceremonies at St. Petersburg. The body lay in state until the day of burial in a magnificent gilded coffin, with the face visible through a transparent veil. The crown and other decorations of the empress were surrounded by a mass of flowers. At ten o'clock in the morning the grand dukes, duchesses, princes and functionaries assembled at the fortress church, where the emperor was received by the metropolitan with holy water. Mass for the dead empress was then said. The emperor placed the imperial ermine beside the corpse, after which the coffin was closed and borne to the vault by the emperor and grand dukes. The troops, the forts and the city bells gave a parting salute. While the coffin was being lowered the emperor and grand dukes each threw three handfuls of earth upon it.

China is massing troops on the Russian frontier, and an attack without formal declaration of war is expected.

A private letter received in London gives an appalling account of the famine in Diarbekir and Bagdad. The letter says people are dying in the streets, women are selling their children for food, and many are living on rats.

A TERRIBLE EXPLOSION.

HAVANA, June 12.—While the Spanish war-ship Cuba Espanola was entering the harbor of Santiago de Cuba, yesterday, her boiler exploded, killing twenty persons and wounding 113, of whom eighty-four were troops that were being transported.

NEW YORK, JUNE 12—6.30 A. M.—The steamboats Stonington and Narragansett were in collision last night on Long Island Sound, and the Narragansett took fire and sunk. It is said that in five minutes after the collision there were five feet of water in the Narragansett, and in ten minutes the steamer had burned to the water's edge. The scenes subsequent to the collision are described as heart-rending. The collision, fire and sinking of the Narragansett occurred within such a short time that many in their rooms who were asleep at the time must have been lost. The shrieks and cries of terror of the men as well as the women were terrible. It is probable that the exact number lost by the collision, will never be known. The New York Tribune places the lost at forty-eight, and the number saved at 261. Under the circumstances, it is almost miraculous that there was not a greater loss of life.

Another disastrous conflagration in the Pennsylvania oil regions. An extensive oil tank was struck by lightning yesterday, at Titusville; the oil took fire and a flying flame rushed through a portion of the town, setting on fire and destroying everything in its course, including several refineries, large quantities of oil, and some dwelling-houses.

The total loss of property in the Pennsylvania oil city of Titusville, last Friday night and Saturday, is estimated at $2,500,000.

The recent heavy rains have swollen the Upper Mississippi, from Minneapolis to Dubuque, to alarming proportions. At last accounts it was still rising, and was within a few feet of being as high as it has ever been known. Damage by overflows is reported at some points.

Martial law has been declared at Leadville, by the Governor of Colorado, and Major General D. J. Cook placed in command. The trouble grew out of the demands of the striking miners, and their threatening attitude towards the miners who were willing to work. Saturday morning, at 10 o'clock, the fire-bells tolled as a signal for closing all places of business. Ten companies of 100 men each, armed with Winchester rifles, formed, and in the afternoon 1,500 citizens, two-thirds of them armed, paraded the streets. About five hundred strikers assembled in front of the Chronicle office, but no violence was done. The leader of the strikers, one Mooney, was arrested. A mob of strikers in front of a hotel were dispersed by the citizens' cavalry. There is still great excitement in the city, and fears of an outbreak are entertained, but as yet no blood has been shed.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Behold, I show you a mystery. We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed. 1 Cor. xv. 51.

THE RESTITUTION of May 19th contains an article by Bro. Stephenson on changes mortals must pass through before they can inherit the kingdom of God, with the above Scripture as a foundation for his remarks. The article is good as far as it goes. But it stops this side of the resurrection or the translation. Paul utters this language to prove that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. He is speaking now directly of a physical change. He says in verse 49, And as we have borne the image of the heavenly, meaning our mortal bodies, so the inheritance is incorruptible so also those that inherit it must necessarily be incorruptible. Bro. Stephenson has shown what moral changes are must pass through in order that we may obtain the first resurrection or the translation of the then living saints as the case may be. The moral change is what prepares us for the great physical change that awaits all the faithful in Christ Jesus. This change of the body from mortal to immortality is instantaneous as Paul defines it in the following verse: "In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." Paul refers to the same event in 1 Thess. iv. 16, "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first." This is the same change that Paul speaks of in Corinthians, and this is the same trump that sounds at the resurrection of the just. He goes on in the next verse to speak of the translation of the living as being caught up together with them in the clouds, etc. There is no doctrine more prominent in the Bible than that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. Paul taught it in his letter to the Philippians when he said, "For our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself." John says, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as he is pure. What manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness? Looking for the blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ, who gave himself for us that he might redeem us from all iniquity and purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works.

Brethren, this is the hope that is set before us. Let us so run that we may obtain the prize which lays at the end of the race. We shall receive it when the Master appears to reward his servants. May we all watch, for we know not the day nor the hour when the Son of Man cometh. The prayer of an unworthy servant is that we may all so live that an abundant entrance may be ministered unto us into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, either by a resurrection or a translation, for we must be changed.

Editor Restitution:—As reading in my paper I seen that Bro. M. Corbaley had arrived safe at his old home. It came into my mind to write a few words for our paper, as I have not seen anything from our Willow Slough church, I will tell you what a nice little flock we have. We have over thirty members, but we have no regular preacher, but Bro. Corbaley come about four times a year. We have Sunday school every Sunday, Bro. Ludden and Bro. Heddleston are the leaders. Our Sunday school commences at 10:30 and lasts an hour or so, and then some of the brethren read a chapter and explains it to the best of his knowledge. We finish up our Sunday services by fulfilling what Christ bid us to do in remembrance of him.

Our Lord and Savior soon will come
To gather all our little bands,
That scattered out through all the lands.

Russia is fortifying her western frontier with almost feverish haste and at enormous cost. Kowno and Lunczyca are waxing into strongholds of extraordinary dimensions and strength. Kowno is destined to serve at once as the basis of possible operations against East Prussia, and as the rallying point for resistance against any German invasion from that frontier province. It is to consist of a huge citadel, of several forts crowning the surrounding heights, and of a tete-de-pont covering the railway bridge over the Niemen, and protecting the three railway lines leading to Wirbadlen, Warsaw, and Wilna. Lenczyca will be made a fortress of the second class, and supersede Zamose as one of the "strong places" constituting the Polish Quadrilateral. In Kieff the provisional works erected on the heights commanding the Dnieper are being rapidly converted into massive forts with stone escarpments, and Fort Lissahora is undergoing complete reconstruction. To the defences of Ivangorod five huge forts are being added, two on the left bank of the Vistula, and three on the right bank of the Wieprz. Two new forts are in course of construction at Novo-Georgievsk. The cost of the development given to the inner defences of Brest-Litowsk is appraised in the fortification estimates for 1880 at the sum of £18,000. Magazines are to be erected for the storing of 1,000,000 pounds of biscuit, and a bakery capable of turning out 12,000 pounds of bread daily. It is proposed to complete these gigantic preparations for a western war by the spring of 1882.

Love is the greatest thing that God can give us, for himself is love; and it is the greatest thing we can give to God, for it will also give ourselves, and carry with it all that is ours. Let our love be firm, constant, inseparable; not coming and returning like the tide, but descending like a never-failing river, ever running into the ocean of divine excellency, passing on in the channels of duty and a constant obedience, and never ceasing to be what it is, till it comes to what it desires to be; still being a river till it be turned into a sea, and vastness, even the immensity of a blessed eternity.—Jeremy Taylor.

To Those Who Remain.

The Advent cross, oh raise it up,
And bear it onward still;
And without shrinking gain the cup,
And all thy work fulfill.

Untainted yet, without the stamp
Of earth's bleeding steps passing,
And clothed well by priceless hand,
And girt thyself anew.

For he who overcomes this hour
Of conflict, fear, and shame,
Shall triumph soon, and know the power
Of a Redeemer's name.

Though long our pleadings he both borne,
The sovereign hour is near,
And Heaven faithful who hath sworn
To come, to save, and hear.

Then bear the cross, and onward press
"Victory" thy kindred some,"
Till Christ comes in Righteousness
To take the pilgrim home.

The Changes Through Which a Sinner Must Pass Before he will be Prepared to Inherit the Kingdom of God.

J. M. STEPHENSON.

2. Repentance.—The forgoing summary of that intellectual change involved in faith through which every person must pass to be an heir of the kingdom, was presented in a previous article. I will now consider that moral change involved in repentance, which is essential to remission of sins, and salvation in the Kingdom of God. That repentance is necessary after having heard and believed the gospel, is evident from all the examples of apostolical preaching. Look at the example of the converted thousands on the day of Pentecost. We read: "Now when they heard, they were pricked in their heart, and said unto Peter and the rest of the apostles, men and brethren, what shall we do?" Acts ii. 37. They realized that something must be done before they could be saved. Peter did not command them to believe the gospel, because he had unmistakable evidence before him that they already believed it. He told them just what remained to be done, after having heard the gospel, in order to the remission of their sins. "Then Peter said unto them, repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins." Verse 38. Thus, no repentance, no remission of sins.

Our Savior couples repentance with remission of sins. We read: "Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures, and said unto them, thus it is written, and thus it behooved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem." Luke xxiv. 45-47. Thus, again, no repentance, no remission of sins. From the height of Mars hill Paul proclaimed to the world the necessity of repentance. He says, "And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent: because he hath appointed a day, in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead." Acts xvii. 30, 31. Luke says, "There were present at that season some that told him of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. And Jesus answering said unto them, suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? I tell you, nay; but, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. Or those eighteen, upon whom the tower of Siloam fell, and slew them, think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwelt in Jerusalem? I tell you, nay; but, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Luke xiii. 1-5. Those unfortunate men whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices, and those upon whom the tower in Siloam had fallen, literally perished; and our Savior teaches, by these similes, that all who do not repent, will just as certainly perish. John told the Pharisees and Sadducees who came to his baptism "to bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance." "And now also (said he) the axe is laid unto the root of the tree; therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire." Matt. vii. 18, 19. The good fruit which they were required to bring forth was the fruit of repentance. And what does this figure teach? It evidently teaches that those who persistently refuse to repent, will just as certainly perish as a tree would when cut down and committed to the burning flames. Repentance is reformation or change of conduct. Neither conviction nor contrition is repentance. These are the combined cause of repentance. No person would turn about and travel in the opposite direction, unless he should be convinced that he was traveling in the wrong direction. No person would change his mind or conduct unless he should first be convinced that he was wrong. The evidence therefore of having sinned is the primary cause of repentance. No person would apply for a physician unless he should believe that he was diseased. Conviction produces contrition, and contrition produces a disposition to reform or turn away from sin. Conviction and contrition will be followed by confession, reformation and restitution as far as possible. A godly sorrow is not repentance. Paul says, "Now I rejoice not that ye were sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance. For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation: not to be repented of: but the sorrow of the world worketh death." 2 Cor. vii. 9, 10. Worldly sorrow produces a repentance which needs to be repented of, but godly sorrow worketh a genuine gospel repentance, which need never be repented of. The example of the prodigal son is right in point here. Mark (1) his fixed resolution. He says, "I will arise and go to my father." Luke xv. 18. This heroic decision must be made or no sinner will come to Christ. 2. Observe his willingness to confess his sins against God and man. He continues, "and I will say, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee." 3. Observe his humility. He continues, "And am not worthy to be called thy son; make me as one of thy hired servants." He carries this noble resolution into practice. We read, "And he arose and came to his father." Verse 20. Mark the result of such faith, humility, and heroic courage. But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him." Verse 20. The best robe was put on him, shoes on his feet, the fatted calf was killed, and they all were merry, and rejoiced (except one envious brother) over the son who was lost and is found, was dead and is alive.

The foregoing parable beautifully illustrates the nature and effect of genuine repentance toward God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. Such repentance will always be acceptable to our heavenly Father. "There is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, than over ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance. Luke xv. 7. That repentance which will be acceptable to God changes the modes of thought, or the mind, and causes the sinner to turn from the error of his way and come to God, who will have mercy upon him, and pardon all his sins. The Prophet Isaiah advises such repentance. He says, "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon." Isa. lv. 7.

3. The nature and reward of an acceptable repentance to God, is graphically described by Jonah. We read, "And Jonah began to enter into the city a day's journey, and he cried and said, yet forty days, Nineveh shall be overthrown. So the people of Nineveh believed God, and proclaimed a fast, and put on sack cloth, from the greatest of them even to the least of them." Jonah iii. 4, 5. The king issued the following decree: "But let every man cry mightily unto God; yea, let them turn every one from his evil way, and from the violence that is in their hands. Who can tell if God will turn and repent, and turn away from his fierce anger, that we perish not?" Verse 8. God will ever accept such a thorough change of purpose accompanied by such evidence of reformation. And thus we read in the next verse, "And God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way; and God repented (or changed his purpose) of the evil that he said that he would do unto them; and he did it not." Please observe that a genuine gospel repentance will always make restitution, if possible. Consider the example of Zacheus. He said to Christ, "If I have taken anything from any man by false accusation I will restore him fourfold." Luke xix. 8. This is the disposition of mind which all must have whose repentance shall be acceptable to God. To sum up: 1. The causes by which repentance is produced are, conviction and contrition. 2. The results are change of purpose, confession, reformation and restitution.

European Notes by the Way.—The Tourjee Excursion.—No. 1.

There are few who do not desire some time in life to take a trip abroad. "I would rather entreat thy company to see the wonders of the world abroad," was the sentiment of the Bard of Avon, and it is the sentiment of the enlightened everywhere. Sight seeing in the historic cities of the old world is an invaluable means of recreation and study. But the facilities for visiting the European countries until recently have been inaccessible to all but a favored few. Now a trip may be made through the more interesting portions of Europe at an expense less than would have been required half a century ago to have made the tour of New England. Formerly the ocean passage was regarded the most unwelcome part of foreign travel. The slow going sail ship, driven and tossed hither and thither by uncertain winds has now been replaced by the majestic steamer. The passage of the Atlantic which formerly required six weeks is now accomplished in ten days. Ocean steamers have become veritable floating palaces. A net-work of railways has spread all over Europe and places formerly regarded as distant and consequently seldom visited are now of easy access to the traveler of moderate means and limited time. To the uninitiated foreign traveling can only be to a large measure unprofitable and unpleasant if one undertakes it alone. This fact has been recognized by the traveling public. To remedy the evil excursions have been planned and large parties have traveled together visiting the leading places of interest; according to a pre-arranged programme and under the guide of a competent conductor. For three seasons Prof. E. Tourjee, of Boston, has carried on most successfully and satisfactorily to the traveling public, a large and constantly increasing foreign excursion business, his parties visiting not only continental Europe but extending also to Egypt and Palestine. Dr. Hyde an eminent teacher of Massachusetts speaking of one of these tours says: "I desire to say to those who visit Europe for the first time, and who do not wish to spend much time or money, go in one of Dr. Tourjee's excursion parties.

I saw more of the physical features of Europe and the works of man in architecture, painting and sculpture, in two months, and for less money than I could have seen in any other way in the same time, and without any care or vexation in regard to custom houses, hotels and methods of travel." F. A. Freeman, Esq., Treasurer of the American Baptist Missionary Union, who visited Europe in 1870, with one of Dr. Tourjee's parties says: "For a first tour more can be seen and with much less care and expense in one of these parties than in any other way." Under such an arrangement no time is lost in looking up places of interest. A competent guide superintends the whole trip. Every trifling expense and detail is managed by the conductor for the whole party. It is by all means the most pleasant method of foreign travel. A long cherished desire to visit some portions of the old world I am to have by the favor of Providence gratified. The plan arranged contemplates among many other places of minor mention, Glasgow, Edinburg, Stratford-on-Avon, London, Rotterdam, The Hague, Amsterdam, Antwerp, Brussels, the battle field of Waterloo, Paris, Versailles, and Rouen. Among the notable events to be taken in is the great Sunday school celebration in London beginning June 28, and lasting one week. Of this more anon. I expect to sail June 14. Yours respectfully,

C. C. MARSTON.

God's Covenant and Oath.

Paul in Eph. ii. 12, says that the Gentiles in the flesh are without Christ. That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world. According to Paul in Gal. iii. 16, Christ is connected with the covenants of promise.

Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, and to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ. What did God covenant to Abraham and his seed? Was it heaven, or sky? or was it life and land? To the law and testimony. Gen. xii. 1. Now the Lord had said unto Abram, get thee out of thy country, and from kindred, and from fathers house, unto a land that I will show thee.

Gen. xiii. 14-16-17. And the Lord said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him. Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward. For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever. . . . Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee. Abraham and his seed are still heirs to that land. Gen. xv. 7-8. And he said unto him, I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it.

And he said, Lord God, whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it? verse 12. And when the sun was going down, a deep sleep fell upon Abram; and, lo, a horror of great darkness fell upon him. God showing by this that Abraham must pass into the death state mentioned in verse 15. And thou shalt go to thy father's in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age.

Gen. xvii. 7-8. And I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee and to thy seed after thee. And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God.

In proof that Abraham never received the land as an inheritance, God says in Gen. xxv. 5. Then Abraham gave up the ghost and died in a good old age, an old man, and full of years, and was gathered to his people. And his sons Isaac and Ishmael buried him in the cave of Machpelah, in the field of Ephron the son of Zohar the Hittite, which is before Mamre. After Abraham's death God renews his covenant to Isaac, Gen. xxvi. 3, 4, 6. Sojourn in this land, and I will be with thee, and bless thee; for unto thee, and unto thy seed, I will give all these countries, and I will perform the oath which I swore unto Abraham thy father; and I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven, and will give unto thy seed all these countries, and in thy seed shall all the nation of the earth be blessed. Because that Abraham obeyed my voice, and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws.

He again renews the same promise to Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 13-15. In which he gives the vision of the ladder. And, behold, the Lord stood above it, (the ladder) and said, I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac; the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed. . . And, behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land; for I will not leave thee until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of.

God showed this land to Moses before he died. Dan. xxxii. 49-52. David looked forward to the fulfillment of God's covenant to Abraham. Psa. cv. 6, 8, 9, 10, 11.

O, ye seed of Abraham his servant, ye children of Jacob his chosen. . . . He hath remembered his covenant forever, the word which he commanded to a thousand generations. Which covenant he made with Abraham, and his oath unto Isaac. And confirmed the same unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant; saying. Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance.

Stephen and Paul say Abraham never received the land. Proof, Acts vii. 2, iii. 5. The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran, and said unto him. Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and come into the land which I shall show thee. . . . And he gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on.

Abraham is still an heir to that land. Heb. xi. 8-9. By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed, and he went out, not knowing whither he went. By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise. A great multitude of Abraham's seed had died named in the 13th verse. These all died in faith, not having received the promises. . . . Paul tells us in Gal. iii. 27-29, how to become Abraham's seed. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise. If we do these things we shall never fall. May we all contend earnestly for the faith that we may have an everlasting inheritance in the kingdom. Your sister in Christ.

Appeal for Help.

Editor Restitution:—Dear brethren and sisters, I take the opportunity to inform you of my condition. I have four small children, the oldest twelve and the youngest four years old, and nothing to keep them on only as I wash for it, and now I cannot get the washing to do.

Dear brethren, would you lend me a helping hand, as my dear little children at times have to go hungry, and calling for bread, and it is hard to have nothing for them.

My husband, R. J. Mathis, died near two years ago.

Dear brethren, if any of you can help me please do so, as I am poor in this world's goods, but hope soon to meet all the dear ones in God's kingdom, where there will be no sorrow or crying for bread, and none to give them. I will close and trust God for the future, hoping to hear from you all soon.

Jews, Mussulmans, and Christians now live in harmony in Palestine, and a Non-Mussulman seldom suffers in any respect on account of his creed. Even the red fez is not obligatory on non-Mussulman Government servants. European clothing is now common both with men and women, and many of the latter may be seen dressed in the latest Paris fashions. The pashas no longer move about in constant state, but may often be seen on foot in the streets with only one or two attendants. European furniture, chairs, sofas, and tables are now common. Great bells are now allowed to be tolled in the Christian churches; old Christian churches have been restored and new ones built in Jerusalem, Nazareth, Tiberias, and elsewhere. So also have a number of synagogues, especially in Jerusalem, been built during these twenty-five years. All this progress must not be taken as a sign of any laxity in religion on the part of Mohammedans, who have during this time built many new mosques, and otherwise shown themselves as much attached to their religion as ever. Justice, also, is much more impartially administered, and the old barbarous punishments have been abolished. In Jerusalem the Sanitary Department is in charge of a German physician, and building affairs are in the hands of a German architect.

DIED.

CROW.—At Grimsborough, Ont., Canada, June 20, Jesse, Elder Michael Crow, aged eighty-four years.

Brother Crow was formerly a preacher among the Dunkers, and by them was highly esteemed. Some nineteen years ago the writer was invited to O. and during his stay, he gave some thirty-five public discourses which were the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, and immersed some fifteen into the saving name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and previous to his leaving he organized a church of twenty-four members, and brother Crow was appointed one of its Elders, which office he filled with honor. In his death sister Crow has lost a kind husband, children a loving father, the neighborhood an old and reliable citizen and the church of God a valuable member. By his request the writer attended his funeral and addressed a large congregation in the Presbyterian meeting house, which was freely granted us, upon the Abrahamic faith and hope, which faith and hope was our beloved brother's, also the writer's.

HYMNS OF THE ADVENT

Is the name of a new Hymn Book, just out, compiled by Chas. C. Barker—co-editor of the "Hymns of the Morning"—and published by W. M. Fitz, Springfield, Mass.

Mr. Barker combines in this new work the "Hymns of the Morning" and a fresh and rare selection of music. As an appendix he adds a selection of "Favorite Hymns" (words only) whose music is familiar as a household word. Many of our brethren who have been asking for "Hymns of the Morning" for some time, can now be supplied with this new book, which is superior to the old one in that it embraces all of it and many new and beautiful songs. Those having the "Christian Psalmody" and no music book will find this exactly what they want.

[Hours and Poems.]

The Quemadero, or "Place of Burning" in Madrid.

[illegible] news of the discovery made close to Madrid, in the course of the present revolution of the "Quemadero," where, three hundred years ago, the Inquisition burned so-called "heretics." Some curious circumstances in the process of [illegible] are now told. Monuments of human remains—relics—[illegible] appalling. Among the other [illegible] were found two bony hands, transfixed by a large nail, and close to the nail-holes in the wrist and the tip of some fingers with the same nail, showing by which they had been pierced, on the attempt being made to separate these from surrounding substances they crumbled into dust. The effect of the discovery was immense. [illegible] clearly than ever before the [illegible] Spain. A packet of MS. notes said that while there were [illegible] geological [illegible] and organic [illegible] were a strange [illegible] of [illegible] and theological [illegible], declaring the history of the past. There was a public meeting held on the spot, when [illegible] of the assembly, many of our brethren told [illegible] about the record, describing it as [illegible] in book forbidden by the Inquisition.

The Republic thus gives to religious liberty [illegible] protection. I have just visited the spot. The [illegible] have not yet finished tearing the [illegible] to [illegible], on one side there [illegible] houses, [illegible] Gate, which in these long black streets [illegible] exposed to the full light of day. Their contents consist [illegible] to [illegible], and are found on examination to consist [illegible] equally of the debris of [illegible] Romans, tied [illegible] and bundled together.

"The earth of all the [illegible]—her blood, and [illegible] all [illegible] to cover her [illegible].

Ye layers of white thick, and half-burnt bones,
Ye mummies of martyrs' cinder'd stones,
Ye human ashes, and dying groans,
Cry out till every ear has heard your tones;
Cry till the murderess trembles, though her brain
Is drunken with the blood of millions slain;
She did not mean to show you; 'twas the spade
Of simple laborers, while your lessons laid
Unbuthed and free in the light of day;
The workmen dug to open a new way;
As they advanced, the ground before them grew
In patches softer, changed its wonted hue,
And with the smell of death assailed the air.
They dug, and they discovered layer on layer,
Black bones, and rusted chains, and human hair,
And iron bands, and bits of melted lead,
And the burnt dust of unnumbered dead.
They cut the heap across—it crowns a hill:
Its length is known; its breadth has buried still.
Dismayed, they ceased: I was there to-day:
I saw them at their work; I brought away
Some horrible remains which, while I write
These very words, are lying in my sight.
A piece of paper on this table holds
Some of this martyr-dust within its folds.
I pause and gently touch it with my hand;
It is not common earth—it is not sand;
I look at it; the tears have filled my eyes;
My God, what is that bone me lies?
The ground beneath was gravel and was red,
But this is dark and formed a separate bed.
How soft it is and light! it feels like veil
That has been saturated once with oil;
The fall of small black cinders; most is grey
And ashen; here is something burnt away
Black as the blackest coal: this was the work
Of some relentless and devouring heat.
A little box beside the paper stands;
Its relics I collected with these hands;
I take a something from it, like a stone;
'Tis gray and light; ah! 'tis a piece of bone;
This was the side on which the musclesgrew:
The other side its chambers are burnt blue.
These four are hinges of iron; they are red,
Like fetters that have rusted on the dead.
This was an iron bolt, 'tis long and curved.
To hold a chain or cord it may have served;
This is a hollow bone burnt through and through.
It leaves upon my hand a dusky blue:
That was a bar of iron, now mere rust:
And this is indistinguishable dust.

O Rome! thou mother of a cherished race!
Blush not to show the world thy kindly face!
Thy bosom—hide its demons—hurl—to-day
'Tis there alone that suffering man find rest.
How mild the chastisements thy love hath used
Whene'er thy children have thy laws refused!
Gentle coercion! Pity's tender tones!
Tell me, thou murderess black, what mean these bones?
These bones before me; those upon that hill,
Who, what were these thus slaughtered by thy will?
What did these helpless women? these poor men?
Why didst thou shut them up in thy dark den?
Why didst thou pinch their flesh, and starve their frames,
And cast them bound into devouring flames?
True, they reproached thee for thy crimes and lies,
And prayed for thee with sin-forgiving sighs;
Thy multiplied idolatries abhorred;
No mediator honored but their Lord;
Condemned thy priesterait and thy love of gold;
Clung to God's Word, and for its truths were bold;
Adorned by blamelessness the name they bore;
Loved not their lives to death. What did they more?
Were these adulterers—these "prisoned saints?
Or murderers—these who died without complaints?

Hush! for they sleep in Jesus—soft their bed;
His suffering saints their Lord hath comforted!
Hush! for the sevenfold wrath of God grows hot!
Hush! for her deep damnation slumbereth not.

SELECTIONS.

ERRORS OF ROMANISM.

Brother Frank Kavanag Tells How He Was Led from Roman Catholicism to Christianity.

Before a large congregation in the lecture room of the Middle Reformed church, Brooklyn, of which the Rev. Dr. E. P. Ingersoll is pastor, on a recent evening Brother Frank Kavanagh related his experience as a student in Catholic schools, his conversion to Protestantism, and his work since as a worker in the Independent Irish Catholic church. He was, he said, born in New York, of Irish Catholic parents, and was sent to the school of St. Patrick's Cathedral, where his instructors instilled into his mind everything that tended to vilify the Protestant Church. Removing to Brooklyn, he attended the St. James cathedral school, and finally the St. Francis College, where the same course of instruction was pursued, poisoning his mind against all "heretics." The priests used to tell of the utter baseness and moral turpitude of all Protestants, until he would no sooner have entered a Protestant church than the most horrible den on earth, and had he by any possibility done so, he would not have been in the least surprised to see the devil himself in the pulpit. But when he began to study science, he found many inconsistencies in the "Holy Mother Church," and when he found that outside her walls there were many good and virtuous people, he saw that he had been grossly deceived. Often are Romanists heard to say that all Protestants are sure to be damned, and they say it with a fierce bitterness that indicates that such is their desire, if not their belief, yet the Roman Church calls itself catholic, broad, liberal!

When a Catholic experiences a change of heart, and feels a need of a closer walk with God, his priest advises him to become a monk, and spend his life in the utmost asceticism, earning his salvation by hard work, fasting, vigils, and total renunciation of all blessing of life. The idea of salvation by faith is unknown among them. But if it requires these denials and labors, and mortifications to earn salvation for the monks, what is to become of the laymen, who do none of those things? The consciousness of salvation, the witness of the Spirit, has no place in the conceptions of the Catholic soul.

Brother Kavanag then spoke of the history of Romanism in Ireland, and drew from it strong arguments for the repudiation of that faith by the Irish people. He denied that St. Patrick was ever a Romish priest, or that the Papal church ever gained a footing in Ireland until seven hundred years after, when Henry II., established British rule there, and was authorized by Pope Adrian IV., to force the ceremonials of Romanism upon the people. Bernard of Clairvaux himself testifies that previous to this the Irish did not conform to the religion of Rome. Years after, when, in the time of Henry VIII., the Reformation swept over England, the Irish had learned to hate the English people, and consequently refused to accept Protestantism because they regarded it as an English institution. They thought that they could display their patriotism to Ireland no better than by rejecting everything that savored of England. Rome, having lost England, than began for the first time to pay some attention to Ireland, and in order to confirm and perpetuate her hold upon that island, has ever since been plunging the Irish people deeper and deeper into ignorance and superstition, because in ignorance and superstition are the strength of the Catholic Church. So it is that to-day, of all English-speaking nations on the globe, the Irish alone are shrouded in the darkness of the Middle Ages.

The aim of the Independent Irish Catholic Church is to open the eyes of the Irish people to these facts, that they may assert their native dignity, and emancipate themselves from the spiritual and intellectual bondage of the Vatican. This is to be done in love and charity. There is no ill-feeling toward Leo XIII., as a man, but there is a determined opposition to the gross errors and tyrannical superstitions of the system he represents. The message to the people is to be the Word of God. "By faith are ye saved, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God."

Cleopatra's Needles.

The remarkable obelisks which have been known to the world under the singular cognomen of Cleopatra's needles, and which are now being removed, one to England and the other to the United States, have a much more interesting archæological interest than is generally supposed.

They were taken from the celebrated quarries at Syene, and were, like others, constructed in the usual tapering form, symbolizing the sun's rays. The material of which they are composed is a rose colored granite. Pliny states that they were transported to the Nile with the aid of the flat-bottomed boats, floating in canals especially prepared for that purpose. It is supposed that they were afterwards erected to their places by making a groove at their base, in which they might turn as a hinge, and then building a mound of earth, which increased in size as the top of the shaft arose, until the monument stood erect.

They were originally set up by Thothmes III., one of Egypt's greatest rulers, at Heliopolis, or the City of the Sun, as early as 1600 B. C.

They were transported to Alexandria under Tiberius, and set up in front of Cæsar's temple, where they obtained the name which they bear. The name is given to them because of a tradition that they were erected to Alexandria during the reign of Cleopatra.

The obelisk removed to England is sixty-eight feet, five inches high, and contains on its two faces hieroglyphs expressive of the titles of Thothmes III.; on the other two Ramses II., has added his own, illustrating only the pomp and vainglory of these monarchs, but absolutely destitute of historical information. The other obelisk still standing contains many similar inscriptions, and was erected by the same monarch.

The significance to the Bible student which these remarkable monoliths possess, is not so much in their inscriptions or their form as in the fact that they were probably standing in front of the great temple to the Sun when the Israelites were in Egypt. They also remind us of the two pillars Jochin and Boaz, which Solomon erected in front of his temple. Such obelisks were always erected in pairs, and were the most common and prominent symbols of worship at the East.

Rank.

"He lodgeth with one Simon a tanner, whose house is by the seaside." Acts x. 6.

"And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." Matt. xvi. 19.

These words were spoken of and to the same person—Simon Peter.

Now, if this man were alive, and should happen to be sojourning here in Richmond, down at Rocketts, in the house of a tanner, would Richmond society call on him? Would they fete him? Would they take him to the "club?"

We can imagine the disgust poor, blunt Peter, with his bony hands, would create in our more recherche religious circles.

He was staying "at the house of one Simon a tanner." None of your four-story, sixty-feet front, "stock-brick" family residences, with a liveried footman at the front-door, and a pair of pawing bays against the curbstone; but a low, little wooden shanty, perhaps, surrounded by tan-vats, and enveloped in a powerful smell of tan-bark, with the added unsavory odors of old bones and hides; this was the sort of place Cornelius were directed to find Peter. Peter's clothes was not made by Shafer. He had no kid gloves; he did not sit in a box at the theatre. This man belonged to the humble rank of life; he was rough, and comparatively unlettered; he put on no airs about family; he pretended to no sort of elegance; he probably ate with his knife (or performed the equivalent motion of that day). And yet this rude, laboring man was the friend of Christ; one of the "pillars" in the kingdom of God; one of the select circle to whom were addressed those tremendous words: "And whatsoever ye shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven." He it was who opened with the keys the door of the Church, and it was his high privilege to constitute the "rock" on which our Lord was pleased to rear that Church, for Peter, who was the first to preach the resurrection to the Jews, was the first also to open the door to the Gentiles. This last he did without conference with flesh and blood. It was to him that our Lord addressed the memorable words, "Feed my lambs." This is the man that was stopping in Joppa "at the house of one Simon, a tanner," to whom the Roman officer repaired for spiritual advice.

We do not fancy Peter in faultless black, with a coat cut straight down in front, and a gold cross floating sweetly on his bosom; he was not one of those charming young ecclesiastics that young ladies admire, who go into the conservatory to say their prayers. His raiment, at least in his earlier life consisted of his "fisher's coat," and when at Joppa he communed with the King of kings, he was surrounded, as we have intimated, by the tainted atmosphere of his friend's tan-yard.

We mean to point out by this the difference between the standards of heaven and the standard weights of earth, the different criteria by which God measures men as compared with the standards in our fashionable Christian society. Peter would not have been invited to a "commerce" party in the city of Richmond. In the first place, he would have given a serious turn to the affair which would not have been agreeable; in the second place, he would have been considered "vulgar."

The Prince of Life and the Lord of Glory made a companion of him.

We are not arguing against social distinctions; that is not the idea.

What we have in mind is this: that in the eye of God these social distinctions are no more than the varying shades in the brightness of so many coins, which shall be estimated rather according to the character of the metal than the degree of polish. Suppose Peter was not a "gentleman" in the English sense of that term, or, if you choose, the equivocal American gentleman, is it not obvious that he stood on an infinitely higher plane? He was a man—every inch of him—to begin with. He was a regenerated man then, in addition—"a new creature;" he had received a new principle of life. He was a sanctified man also, in addition; he was a man powerfully governed and directed by the Holy Ghost. He was an inspired man, moreover. In addition. He was the friend and companion of our Lord—and, as is believed, died a heroic martyr death, sealing his faith with his blood.

Now, the distance between such a man and a member of Congress or a rich manufacturer is simply immense. The latter has more of what our progress used to call in old times "things" ("want to get up my things")—they have more houses, tables, horses, clothes, and perhaps more education and refinement; but a plain, rough man in our day, formed on the spiritual model of Peter, has more soul; the difference lies in the immortal principle. It is the incipient glory of the Archangel in the rude tenement of the flesh.

There are none of the worldly merchant princes of New York that are worthy to unloose the latchet of George Muller's shoes, and yet we doubt if this man, who holds his daily audiences with heaven, was much invited about in New York. He did not have the polish—which you can easily put on brass.

"What went ye out to see?" said our Savior. A man clothed in soft raiment? Behold, they which wear soft clothing are in the king's houses. But what went ye out for to see? a prophet? yea, I say unto you, and more than a prophet. * * * Verily, I say unto you, among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist."

COMMUNICATIONS.

Evidence that the Kingdom of God is a Future Institution.

It can not now be in existence.

1. Because it is the subject of the promise of the Deity, and the saints are spoken of as the "heirs" of it, and not inheritors, Jas. ii. 5.

2. Because it will be an everlasting dominion, and therefore "flesh and blood," or human nature, which is perishable "can not inherit," 1 Cor. xv. 50.

3. Because a man must be "born of the spirit," and so become "Spirit" or a "Spiritual Body" "to see" or "enter into" Jno. iii. 3-7.

4. Because when it is come and the righteous possess it, they shall shine forth as the sun; and as the kings and priests for God, they shall be associated with Christ in the co-ruling of all nations for a period of a thousand years. Matt. xiii. 43; Rev. ii. 26, 27; v. 9, 10; ii. 4, 6.

5. Because it is therefore the reward guaranteed to "good and faithful servants," and they do not enter upon the possession of this until Christ comes and makes them like himself, Luke xx. 32; Matt. viii. 11; 2 Pet. i. 11; Mark xvi. 27; Matt. xxv. 34; Phil. iii. 20, 21; 1 Jno. iii. 2.

6. Because it is linked with the second appearing of Jesus Christ. 2 Tim.

7. Because the kingdoms of the Gentiles are to be transformed into the dominion of Christ under the sounding of the seventh and last trumpet, Rev. xi. 15.

8. Because its throne is the throne of David, and Christ represents himself as coming from heaven to take possession of this throne. Luke i. 32, 33; Isa. ix. 7; Matt. xxv. 31.

9. Because its throne shall be located in Jerusalem the city of David restored, which shall then be "the joy of the whole earth," "the city of the Great King," a city of righteousness and truth, and a very habitation of holiness in the midst of the earth. Isa. xxiv. 23; Jer. iii. 17; Mic. iv. 7; Psa. xlviii. 2; Isa. i. 26; Zech. viii. 3.

10. Because when set up the twelve tribes of Israel made a united, strong, righteous and holy nation in their own land, shall constitute its "first dominion," and all other people, nations and tongues emancipated from all political and ecclesiastical tyrants, enlightened in the knowledge of God, and made submissive to the king of the Jews and his glorified brethren, shall constitute its secondary dominion or empire. Amos, ix. 11, Ezek. xxxvii. 21, 22; Mic. vii. 8-9; Zeph. iii. 14-20; Dan. vii. 13, 14, 27; ii. 44; Psa. ii. 8; Zech. xiv. 9.

11. Because when it is come Christ will eat bread and drink wine new with his Apostles, who shall then sit upon thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

Lastly, the [illegible] commanded to pray to their Father in heaven, "Thy kingdom come." Matt vi. 9.

Spirit.

Spirit is the formative agent used by Jehovah in his great work of creation. To this agree the words of Job, "by his spirit he hath garnished the heavens," chap. xxvi, 13; and the same is the import of the words of David, "by the word of the Lord were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth. Psa. xxxiii. 6. There is truly such a thing as evolution in nature. The Great Creator has evolved all things out of his own inherent life and energy. Hence the words of Paul, "there is to us one God, the Father, out of whom (ex ou) are all things," 1 Cor. iii. 6; and by his spirit he is in all things and through all things. Eph. iv. 6. "Free spirit," intensely radiant from the "Eternal Spirit," who inhabits the highest heaven and is mantled with light of glory inconceivable; and filling all space, is the substratum of all existence, and the primary cause of all life, light, heat and motion, and in fact, of every phenomena of nature. It invests the lilies of the field with their beautiful tints, develops the hardy monarch of the forest out of an acorn, creates the wonderful mind of man within him (Zech. xii. 1), gives strength to the king of beasts, and produces and perpetuates the harmonious revolution of all the shining worlds of the boundless universe.

LETTER DRAWER.

Editor Restitution:—Please find enclosed postoffice order for one dollar, which apply to my subscription. I have been in arrears for some time, but it is not because I did not want to remit, but owing to the smallness of my purse. I will try to keep up hereafter unless delay is unavoidable. There are but few of the One Faith in these parts—not enough to organize and obey the injunction—yet we see the day approaching. Yes, the light is dawning in the east. Soon the bright day will be here. Thanks be to God that we are not of the number that slumber and sleep, so that day come on us unawares. And may we ever watch and keep our lamps trimmed and burning, if the Lord should seem to delay his coming; for he will come, and they that are ready will enter in with him unto the wedding, and the door will be closed. How many are there that say there is time enough yet? What the import of those words, "and the door was shut?" Matt. xxv. 10. In conclusion, let me say, let us not grow weary; let us not be overcharged with the cares of this age, that when the Master comes, we be not found ready and waiting.

Yours in the Faith,

Editor Restitution:—I herewith send one dollar to apply on my account for THE RESTITUTION. I am very much obliged for your waiting. I have found a few brethren here; am preaching every First Day in different places where we can get a chance to speak. I have baptized one two weeks ago for the remission of sins, who is now rejoicing in the glorious hope of the gospel. Others, I think, will soon be obedient to the faith. Our meetings are not large, but the best of attention. Praise God that now and then one will accept the truth. One year ago last summer I baptized one in Syracuse, N. Y., two in Seneca Falls, N. Y., and thus the good cause moves slowly on.

From your brother in Christ,

Editor Restitution:—Enclosed find $1.00 for THE RESTITUTION. I think it is the most interesting paper in existence and should be more precious to those of the faith. How much more we are profited by such reading as it contains, than we are by reading our political papers or Fireside Friend. I feel that we are living in a time when we should have something more substantial than the "trashy literature" of the day, something which is based on the sure foundation of God's word. Yours in hope of the coming kingdom.

THE GRAND PURPOSE OF THE BIBLE.

No careful reader of its pages will fail to perceive that although it contains history, poetry, laws, prophecies, precepts, doctrines and promises, yet all seem to crystalize around one grand central truth. As the various branches of a tree are supported by one trunk, so all parts of the Bible grow out of and depend upon the all-pervading truth, that God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself. To this center all converges, from it all radiates. It is the sun of the entire system.

BREVITIES.

There are now 91,000 miles of submarine telegraph cable in working order.

The Island of Elba, Napoleon I.'s exile home, has been devastated this spring by an army of locusts from Africa.

The salary of the Czar is $17.40 a minute. It seems good pay when one does not remember that his principal occupation is that of being shot at by some of his beloved subjects.

HOUSE-BUILDING APE.

In the middle of Africa is found an ape which builds a shelter for himself in a tree. He selects a tall tree growing nearly straight out, and about twenty feet from the ground. This branch is for his floor, and over it he makes a roof, exactly in the shape of a large umbrella, with the trunk of the tree for the handle. It is made of leafy branches, tied on to the tree with vines, of which African woods are full, and is so well shaped and neatly made that it would do credit to a human builder. When the ape is at home, he sits in the branch with his head up under the green roof, and an arm around the trunk to hold on. One animal lives in each house alone, and he uses it only until he has eaten all the food he cares for near, and then he builds a new house in another place.

By latest advices from Tennessee, Illinois, Georgia and Mississippi, the tornado had not after a few days blow expended its fury on Sunday last. Dreadful havoc has been made by the storm. It struck Macon, Miss., about eight at night, causing by its violence the demolition of several buildings near the railroad depot, killing by the debris twenty people and fatally injuring thirty-two. The force of the wind was so great as to lift thirteen loaded cars off the track and blow the houses to atoms. In Illinois the storm was similarly destructive to cattle, houses and their inmates. It visited Alabama with terrible results, and in Oakville, Ontario, left a devastating track. The extent of loss in life and property is shocking to contemplate.—Baltimore Herald.

THAT TERRIBLE CYCLONE.

A missionary in the American Sunday School Union in Missouri, in his monthly letter to a Sunday school in New York, describing the destructive tornado that swept the valley of the James River on Sunday afternoon, April 18th, spreading ruin through its course of 150 miles, and culminating in Marshfield, Webster county, where ninety persons were killed and 150 wounded,—160 killed and 250 wounded, including the surrounding country,—says: "It was worse than a battle,—even that of Wilson's Creek, which was fought near by,—in that so many women and children were killed, wounded and crippled. It swept through the centre of my field, in which I have done so much missionary work—not a church, school-house or dwelling left standing in its track; Sunday schools made homeless, their libraries destroyed; some of the scholars gathered in by me killed. I am anxious to restore these ruins and repair these losses so far and so soon as is possible."

AN INTERESTING RELIC.

We have at our office a handsome specimen of the "discoidal stone," a kind of stone implement that has very rarely been found outside of East Tennessee and adjoining sections. These relics deserve a passing notice on account of the rapidly growing interest in archeology, and especially in American antiquities. The name is given to this type of relic by the scientists from its shape—that of a double convex disk. They are usually made of the hardest quartz, very symmetrical, and beautifully polished, and the manufacture of a single one, without the use of metallic tools, must have cost the ancient workman the labor of months. The traditions of the Cherokees do not reach back to the origin of these implements, but only say that their first people found them here and made use of them in playing "chungke," a game described by early writers as being somewhat similar to ten-pins. Like many relics of the stone age, whose use cannot be accounted for, the discoidal stone is ascribed to the mound builders. The present specimen was recently plowed up in a field near Kingston. It is made of beautiful variegated quartzite, polished smooth as the finest marble and so hard that it would turn the edge of the best tempered steel drill. Whatever the original purpose was, it must have been something the owner considered very important. It was probably connected with some superstition, or some religious belief or ceremony.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It therefore stands as a witness for, and to establish the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and his immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the possession of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous; and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and to bring every knee and tongue into a loving belief in the Gospel, repentance and baptism for the remission of sins, and to the performance of other duties essential for final salvation.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Justification.

Some think we, as a people, hold that sins are washed away in the water of baptism, or that pardon is suspended till baptism is performed.

In our utterances, oral and written, there is often some ground for such an inference—a confession, perhaps.

It is obvious that a matter so elementary should be clearly perceived and stated. To do this, however, requires some study and patient carefulness; for, in this, as in some other matters, the Scriptures in the case afford plausible grounds for opposite opinions. Hence, also, the imperative need of charitable respect for differing views.

Justification by faith was the motive force in the revolt of the church from popery. Practically, the papal doctrine of justification was by penance and rituals, as that of Protestantism has been and is, to a large extent, by good works and rituals. Faith, as a vital germ and living force, has been lost sight of in presence of foliage and fruit.

An inert faith and good works that do not spring from faith are equally fruitless of salvation.

Those who have found the Bible to antagonize so many other theological opinions, should not copy too confidently any party theory of conversion. In this, as in other things, we might expect to find the Bible eminently wise. It can not be to the disadvantage of the cause it was given to serve.

To express it humanly, we might say that justification is two-fold, inward and outward,—inward by faith, outward by works; inward before God, outward before men. The inward justification unites to Christ, the outward to the church. The inward precedes and produces the outward; is necessarily genuine, and synchronous with pardon. The outward may be spurious. When a man is pardoned he is free from sin and is united to Christ. The union to the church follows by baptism. This, and the Supper, are part of the profession of faith. The faith exists before the profession of it; and is a matter between the sinner and Christ. No intermediary is necessary or possible. Jesus is the only mediator between us and God. Our intention that nothing but our own will stands or can stand between us and Christ, is born of the truth, and is a recognition of the necessary fitness in the case.

Because Paul said, "Baptized into Jesus Christ," Rom. vi. 3; Gal. iii. 27, and Peter had said, "Be baptized .... for the remission of sins," Acts ii. 38, and because Ananias had said, "Be baptized, and wash away thy sins," Acts xxii. 16, and James, that "Abraham was justified by works," James ii. 21, it has been inferred that sins are pardoned and remitted, and justification gained only in the act of baptism; but there are many (sixty-five) texts which affirm with at least equal clearness that the act of faith initiates into Christ.

A conclusion should be consistent with all the testimony in the case.

Abraham was about 124 years old when he offered Isaac—forty-nine years after he came into Canaan. Had he been in sin till then? Was he converted at that altar on Mount Moriah? He had obeyed God "by faith" fifty years before this, and by faith sojourned in the land in the intervening years, and received the covenant and the promises. "By faith he offered up Isaac," Heb. xi. 17,—faith that God would raise Isaac from the dead, verse 19, so that the promise might be fulfilled in him. His act "showed his faith," (James ii. 18,) in that matter, and had nothing to do with his own conversion, and gives no light at all how others are converted. It relates rather to Christian experience.

"Wash away thy sins." Acts xxii. 16. Does anybody really think that water can take away sin? Why, then, is this text used to prove justification in the act of baptism? "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin." 1 John i. 7; Matt. xxvi. 28. It is made effective "by faith." Does anybody doubt this? Paul believed—exercised this effective faith—when he said, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" Acts ix. 6; and from that time he "was not disobedient." "With the heart he had believed unto (into) righteousness; and with the mouth made confession unto (into) salvation." Rom. x. 10. Was he yet a sinner, and out of Christ? Ananias, because he believed and prayed, recognized him as a "brother," and ordered his public, visible profession of faith by baptism. It would seem that the Holy Ghost was given to him by the laying on of Ananias' hands, Acts ix. 17, 18; and this before his baptism, as in the case of Cornelius and his family. Acts x. 47. Does God give the Holy Spirit, with its miraculous gifts, to persons in sin and out of Christ?

But the history does not say that Paul washed away his sins in the water of baptism. Doubtless his own case was in harmony in this respect with his subsequent exposition: "With the heart man believeth into righteousness;" "justified by faith" before baptism, as Abraham was before circumcision; and baptism was a form, type, symbol of the faith and hope. Paul went through the same process as the great multitude who will have "washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

"Repent, and be baptized ...., into forgiveness of sins."

Here repentance gives virtue to baptism. So intimately connected are faith, repentance and baptism, in conversion, that it is easy to conceive forgiveness suspended till baptism is performed.

Yet the word eis, into, hardly bears so positive and extreme a sense; though, usually, with verbs of motion, it signifies passing the line from outside to inside; still it also, with such verbs, expresses progress in. Faith brings into Christ, repentance and baptism continue "into."

The persons addressed by Peter believed and confessed, and were ready for the "obedience of faith," and inquired, "What shall we do?" Peter, beginning where they were, told them what more to do—"repent and be baptized,"—then, by the grace of God, they would be entitled to the Holy Ghost, and to recognition as members of the church.

So Rom. vi. 3 and Gal. iii. 27, relate to Christian obedience rather than initial conversion. The believer, by his baptism, professed his deadness to sin. He also professed his union to Christ, not to Moses.

But if any insist that "into" (eis) indicates passing the line from outside to inside, positively and always, I ask their attention to some sixty-five texts where eis is used with faith, and in which it has its initiatory force more clearly than in Rom. vi. 3 and Gal. iii. 27: "Believe into Christ"—eis, translated by "on," in," "for," "to," "unto,"—the texts:

Matt. xviii. 6: These little ones which believe in (into) me.

Verse 6: The righteousness which is by faith.

Verse 10: With the heart man believeth unto (into) righteousness.

Verse 14: How then shall they call on him in (into) whom they have not believed?

Verse 21: Who by him do believe in (into) God.

1 John v. 10: He that believeth on (into) the Son of God hath the witness in himself.

Verse 13: I have written unto you that believe on (into) the name of the Son of God, ... and that ye may believe on (into) the name of the Son of God.

Comparing these sixty-five texts that say "believe into Christ" with the two that say "baptized into Christ," it will be observed that the sole thought of the former is saying union to Christ, while the two are compound, the chief point in Rom. vi. 3-5 being that baptism shows the believer's deadness to sin, and that in Gal. iii. 27 being the committal of the Christian to Christ instead of Moses; and both intimate that some Christians—"so many of us," "as many of you"—had not yet been baptized, perhaps recent converts who had not had time to be baptized.

The Greek preposition eis is translated in the New Testament by into, unto, to, for, on, among, against, upon, throughout, in, toward, concerning, for intent, to end, until, till, for purpose. Some other of these seventeen renderings might be used in Rom. vi. 3 and Gal. iii. 27; for certainly the sixty-five texts have more right to the primary sense of eis than the two. There is no occasion for reading them in conflict. Believing unquestionably changes the sinner's relation to Christ, Jesus and his apostles express that change by eis, "into." Before believing he is "out of Christ;" believing brings him "into Christ." From that moment he cannot be lost, if he "abide in the vine."

Of the texts supposed to teach that pardon or remission of sins can be had only in the act of baptism, it may be further said,—

1. The apostles were to and did "baptize into (eis) the name," Matt. xxviii. 19; Acts viii. 16; xix. 5,—only disciples, however. They must have ceased to be sinners and become believing, obedient disciples of Christ before they could claim or receive baptism under the great commission.

2. So they were "all baptized into one body," the church, 1 Cor. xii. 13. They were Christians first, for only Christians could be received into the church.

3. "So many of us as were baptized in Jesus Christ were baptized into his death. Rom. vi. 3. The apostle's argument here is not concerning union to Christ, but deadness to sin. Faith in Christ had killed the body of sin, and in the act of baptism they had buried it. Didn't bury it alive; death first, then burial. The life in Christ and death to sin began at the same time. "We," Christian believers, "are buried with him by baptism." Verse 4. Bury a man a sinner, and raise him a saint? This would suggest a very important "work in hades."

"If we have been planted in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection." Verse 5. Plant tares, and reap wheat! An unpardoned sinner like Christ! Such a person planted in the likeness of Christ's death! Like him first, then planted like him. "We," Christian believers, "are planted." None others can be planted in the likeness of his death, or be raised in the likeness of his resurrection.

4. "As many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." Gal. iii. 27.

Their baptism was a profession of the gospel, not of Judaism. It did not make them Christians; but it did make their lapse into Judaism seem inconsistent. The previous verse tells what made them Christians: "Ye are the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus," (through the faith in Christ Jesus).

5. The argument in these texts turns on the preposition "into" (eis) assuming that in Rom. vi. 3 and Gal. iii. 27 it has its natural and the absolute sense of passing from outside to inside. There is stronger reason for this sense of eis in the sixty-five texts cited, that affirm the cardinal gospel fact of believing into Christ. Gospel faith certainly precedes gospel baptism, and some time must necessarily intervene between the two. Where is the person in that intervening time? Is he in or out of Christ? He cannot be both; he cannot be neither. He is one or the other. Who will say he has believed into Christ, and is yet out of Christ? When he has believed into Christ, is he not a Christian? Has he not been pardoned, justified, converted?

Let no one shut his eyes and fly in the face of this radical and essential fact of the Christian system with, "O, then, you are against baptism, and make it unnecessary." That is unworthy of a Bible student. No fact, truth, promise, or doctrine of the Bible can suffer from any other. We need have no fear of the utmost force of the real natural sense of Scripture. The brighter one shines out, the more beautiful will others appear, and the fitter its relation to them.

The fact is notoriously obvious that no one really believes that pardon and union to Christ are suspended till baptism; for the most positive asserters of that theory always defer baptism to suit convenience. On their theory, they confess themselves triflers with the salvation of those whom they compel to wait their leisure to help them into Christ.

Cannot Jesus pardon a sinner without some other person's consent and help? Has he surrendered to indolent preachers and faithless friends his "power on earth to forgive sin?"

The gospel makes no room for such bold assumption. Jesus and his mercy are not thus in the keeping of frail men. He says, "Come unto me"—not to the preacher. When the preacher sees the evidence of God's pardoning peace he may say, as did Peter, "What am I that I should withstand God?" or as Philip, "Thou mayest."

It would seem like straining for consistency to say that a person might baptize himself. I am not aware that the New Testament ever uses baptize in a deponent or reflexive sense (passive form with active meaning.) It is always either active or passive; one person baptizes another or is baptized by another.

God commands immediate obedience. It is possible for every one to obey. The chief and first thing required is the spirit of obedience: "Give me thy heart." It is a submission of the will to God's authority. It is both intellectual and passional. How much of either depends on the habits of the person. It is a matter so absolutely and closely between the person and Christ that no other can possibly stand between.

The change of relation from enmity to friendship; from hatred, or dread or indifference to love and obedience, must be first of the mind and affections; after that outward, vocal, visible. It is preposterous that a change of heart must wait on ceremony. That is reversing God's order. Simon the sorcerer tried that way, but it did not work; and Peter ordered him to try again, and to begin with "thought and heart." And so he taught his convicted brethren: "Repent and be baptized." Nobody really puts it: "Be baptized and repent." That is grotesque. Yet it amounts to that, as some explain it.

It is noteworthy that "Simon himself believed" "Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ," (Acts viii. 12, 13;) but that was not a sufficient pre-requisite for baptism, a change of thought and heart, and forgiveness, were also necessary. Without these, though ever so correct in the former, he was yet in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity; his had not repented.

The two Christian ordinances beautifully symbol out the Christian faith; the Supper the death, and baptism, the resurrection of Christ—both sacred memorials, helping the church to keep in mind her foundation and hope, each expressing death by sin and recovery of life by grace; one burial and rising in baptism for one burial and resurrection, and the frequent bread and wine for the continual efficacy of the body and blood of Christ.

Faith first, then "show" it. The soul first rooted in Christ, then the beautiful foliage and rich fruit of Christian ritual and good works. As the latter cannot exist without the former, so the former cannot continue alive without the latter. Faith is promptly followed by "the obedience of faith," as surely as leaf shows the vital working of the root.

I conclude then,—

If a person die after believing and repenting and before he has had opportunity to be baptized he can not be lost.

If he deliberately neglect baptism, he can not be saved.

Faith is a vital force uniting to Christ and producing obedience. It is the flowing together of the sap in action and stock.

Baptism is essential because obedience is essential; but obedience is first mental, then actual, and the mental is accepted as sufficient till the actual is possible: "If there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath and not according to that he hath not."

The absolute condition of justification is unchangable. It was the same for Abel, Enoch, Abraham, David and Paul as it now is—faith first, last, and always. Rituals are the dispensational expressions of faith, and vary with the ages. Faith is practical loyalty to God, the fountain of all obedience, and the child of intelligence and love: it is to know God and love him; then obedience springs out as from a spontaneous and resistless force. It seeks no subterfuge, makes no excuses.

To justify is to make just or even with the law. The sinner's only defense is, that Christ died that he might live. Only faith in Christ can yield him justification, by free, unconditional pardon. God, for Christ's sake, forgives, justifies. "Therefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ."

The Situation In Turkey.

The Turkish Government is, in the center of it, all intrigue, incompetency and distraction. Everybody talks of administrative reform, but there are no reformers. Outside of the walls of Constantinople, alike in Europe and Asia, there is a pressing question in every quarter. There is revolt in Albania, which before it is settled may bring about dangerous complications between Austria and Italy. There is a situation in Armenia which may almost any day bring Russia and England face to face before an almost insoluble problem. In Eastern Roumania there is a state of disturbance which may be no more than incidental and temporary, but it may, on the other hand, be the prelude of systematic disorder and a new revolution. The prospect is sombre enough, and shows how little the Berlin treaty achieved in the way of permanent settlement, though it is probable that no treaty could have achieved much more. Mr. Goschen, at any rate, will see with his own eyes. He is a statesman with a clear judgment, experienced in difficult affairs, and without prejudices.

A Moscow correspondant of the Cologne Gazette, who professes to be well acquainted with the situation of China, gives the following facts concerning the force of the army of the Celestial Empire. It is reckoned to consist, according to good authorities, of 600,000 men. Of these, however, only 200,000 infantry and 80,000 horse forming the standing army. The rest only serve as garrisons. This army is not by any means, though it has improved since 1860, to be compared with any European army. Only a small part of it has European weapons and has been drilled by English and French officers; the greater part of it is only supplied with heavy, rusty sabres, pikes, and even bows and arrows. The Guard of the Palace, quartered at Pekin, numbers 17,000 men. It consists of six battalions of infantry, of whom four only are provided with breechloaders, the remaining two with muskets six feet long, which require two men to fire, one serving as support to the weapon while the other shoots, and of 2,000 horses. Also belonging to the Guard are twenty-four Russian mountain-guns. Of the remainder of the army only about 60,000 men have been drilled after European fashion, and these act as the garrison of several of the large towns. As regards the Chinese fleet, consisting of twelve large steamers, three frigates, and fifteen gunboats, its value is often rather underrated. It is however badly officered,

THE RESTITUTION.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JUNE 23, 1880.

BRO. R. CORBALEY expects to be at Lincoln on Friday, June 25, and remain over the following Sunday.

SISTER JANE WRAY, of Richmond, Ill., wants to know Bro. J. M. Stephenson's P. O. address. Will he please send a card.

It may be thought advisable to not issue a paper next week. For the two years past we have published forty-eight numbers for each year, or four numbers each month. We may possibly be able to give fifty numbers this year. The price of paper is much more this year than heretofore. We will do all we can with the means placed at our disposal.

SELECTIONS.

[The Age to Come Herald.]

I got back to Jerusalem from a six weeks tramp to the North, last Saturday, the 10th. I have now traveled the whole length of the land from Beer-sheba to the Lebanon Mountains, Damascus, and Beyrout. I crossed the Lebanon Mountains up at the cedars. The Syrian fevers have troubled me some, but not to hinder my walking in the least; and I am now well, feeling well, and have gained very much in flesh. I shall give an account of our two trips—to Beer-sheba in the South, and the Lebanon Mountains in the North—to the Herald hereafter, if the Lord will.

There has lately been a great deal of trouble here in regard to Turkish money. At Haifa, Acre, Tyre, Sidon, and Tiberias, we found the stores closed on account of the depreciation and fluctuation in the currency. Bishleks, that had been passing for five and one-half piasters, went down to two; and those who had laid up a store for future use, as many had, felt the loss keenly. In Turkish money, forty paras make one piaster. Three piasters (at present, April 13th,) make one bishlek. There are between twenty-one and twenty-two piasters in a mogidee, and one hundred and twenty-one in a Turkish pound. Five piasters are equal to one franc, (French money,) as in exchanging a Napoleon, which is twenty francs, you get one hundred piasters.

A few weeks ago, Baron Ferdinand Rothschild visited Jerusalem, and I was told he purchased a large building and left three hundred Napoleons for poor Jews. But this, for one of his wealth, is a small sum to be distributed among so many. Last week, Mr. Horace Maynard, the American Ambassador at Constantinople, visited the Holy City. He came to Jaffa on the man-of-war steamship Wyoming. It is rumored that a French or English bank is to be established at Jaffa. This would be a great blessing to the people, as something of the kind is very much needed.

April 14th.—We have sudden changes in the weather here, as well as in America. Yesterday it was very warm in the forenoon, though windy. The mud was drying up, the dust was flying through the air, and no more rain was expected this season; but in the afternoon the wind changed, black clouds began to fly, and it soon became very cold. In the night it began to rain, which still continues; and flakes of snow are seen flying. It is very disagreeable being out; the wind is blowing a gale, and the water in the pool of Hezekiah is in commotion.

I will tell you how they do things here. An accident occurred to-day—a camel fell just inside the Jaffa gate, injuring himself so badly that there was no hope of his recovery. When the owner was satisfied of this, he killed the animal on the spot by cutting his throat, and immediately began to take off the hide. When his task was finished, the unskillful butcher began to slash into the carcass of the poor animal and cut it up. Many poor hungry souls stood by ready to devour a piece of fresh camel's meat. Some of those who were fortunate enough to be able to buy a slice, could not wait to have it cooked, but commenced eating it raw, with a little salt. I chanced to be passing up David street, through Jaffa gate, just as the performance of eating the raw camel was going on. When I returned an hour later, the camel had all disappeared, and evidently had all been devoured by the hungry people. Such is life among some of the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

It appears that one Samuel Montague, an English Jew, called a council in London recently to consult and arrange for the opening of a school in Jerusalem for the education of poor Jewish boys, in the English language. The Protestants, Greeks, Latins and Mohammedans have schools for their children, but the Jews have none, and a great complaint consequently has been made. The poor Jew boys go about the streets for employment, wherever they can find it. Some will black boots for one-half cent a pair, and find their own blacking. But at this price, even, they cannot get much to do. But the effort to open a school for these boys has caused a great excitement among the Rabbis, and I am informed by good authority that they have threatened to punish all who attend this school and that they have caused this to be cried through the streets of Jerusalem. You will readily perceive the reason of this opposition. It is two-fold; first, they do not wish to have the boys instructed in any language but the Hebrew; and second, if this school is opened, they think that places of employment will also be opened, whereby the poor can earn their own living. This would cut off a great deal of money that now comes from the nations abroad, and falls into the hands of the Rabbis for distribution among the poor; and it is thought the poor do not always receive it all; hence, if the people are put in a way to earn their own living, this money would not pass through the Rabbis' hands.

It is impossible for the poor laboring classes to live decently. A bottle of flour, which costs two francs, will only last a family of seven persons two days; and that is about all that the laborer can earn, which leaves nothing for other food and clothing. Two francs is the highest price per day for a laboring man; and many do not get more than half a franc. The Jews generally have large families, and if they are ever so economical and industrious, it is impossible for them to live without help from abroad. It seems strange that people should live in such a destitute and distressed condition, in a land capable of producing an abundance for six or eight million inhabitants, when it now has only three hundred thousand, about one-twentieth of what it might be made to support in this present age. But such is prophecy; and the poverty and distress in the land is only the fulfillment of prophecy.

A TRIP TO BETHLEHEM AND SOLOMON'S POOLS.

On the morning of April 11th, I felt like taking a stroll to Bethlehem, the birth-place of the future king of Israel, and to Solomon's pools. So I chose Peace again, for my companion, the guide and interpreter on our northern trip. We left the city through the Jaffa gate, and took the Bethlehem and Hebron road, crossing the upper end of the valley of Hinnom, north of the lower pool of Gihon, near the Jews' house. The road here is rough and ledgy, with steps cut in the ledge. Walking along the west slope of the hill which descends into the valley of Hinnom a short distance, we diverged a little to the right, and were soon at the top of the valley, and passed the hill of evil counsel on our left, covered with thrifty grape-vines. A half-mile distant on our right is a German colony, with a magnificent school-house and several beautiful dwelling houses of European style. Such neat, tidy buildings and surroundings are cheering to one looking for the restoration of the country so long desolate and dreary; and like the budding fig-tree, they are signs that the summer of this land is near.

Soon we cross the plain of Rephaim, a very good carriage-road; but beyond to Bethlehem it is exceedingly rough and rocky. But as bad as it is, a coach, or three-seated wagon, runs over it between Bethlehem and Jerusalem; fare one franc. There is a great deal of travel over this road, especially by the Greeks and Latins, who are frequent visitors to the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem. We passed many of these visitors, some on horses, some on donkeys, and others walking. This being also the Hebron road, makes the amount of travel much greater, as there is considerable transportation carried on between Jerusalem and Hebron, on camels and donkeys. Something less than one mile of Bethlehem, on our right, is the tomb of Rachel, the beloved wife of Jacob, where I stopped to meditate upon the past events connected with Rachel's life and promises concerning the future of the patriarchs and their families. This tomb was purchased and repaired by the Jews. It has a heavy iron door, locked securely. It will be remembered that Rachel died as Jacob was journeying from Bethel to Bethlehem. See Gen. xxxv. 16-20.

Before reaching Bethlehem, the terraced hills upon which it is built could be seen, covered with grape vines, olive and fig-trees. This town excels all other places around Jerusalem in thrift, enterprise and beauty. I saw several new buildings going up, superior to those already built, which shows progression. The inhabitants are Christians, mostly of the Greek and Latin faith. There are no Mohammedans, and but few Protestants. They look intelligent; the women more resemble Europeans than Arabs, in everything except their costume.

On the south side of the town is a fountain of water, coming from Solomon's pools through an aqueduct a distance of two miles or more. We followed this aqueduct up the Valley of Urtas, and visited the little village of Urtas, known as Solomon's Gardens. This is a little paradise of itself, planted with peach, pear, apple trees and garden produce of various kinds. Water is continually running through this garden.

There are three pools called "Solomon's pools." These pools I should think are from three to four hundred feet long, and from two to three hundred feet wide, and probably about thirty feet deep; and at the present time they are full of water.

Mr. Doughty evidently did not measure these pools. Thompson, in giving their size, quotes Robison. He says: "Dr. Robison, with his usual accuracy, gives the measurement of the three as follows: The first, to the east, is five hundred and eighty-two feet by two hundred and seven, and fifty feet deep; the second is four hundred and twenty-three by two hundred and fifty feet, and thirty-nine feet deep: the third is three hundred and eighty by two hundred and thirty-six feet, and twenty-five feet deep." Again, Thompson says: "The proportions of this lower pool of Solomon are truly royal; nearly six hundred long, two hundred feet wide, and fifty deep. When full, it could float the largest ship on the ocean."

From Eccl. ii. 5, 6, it appears that these large pools were made, not wholly for the benefit of Jerusalem itself, but for Solomon's gardens and orchards as well: "I made me gardens and orchards," says Solomon, "and planted trees in them of all kinds of fruits: I made me pools of water, to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees. Dr. Thompson's remarks would seem to favor this idea. In speaking of the large subterranean passage, which must have conducted an immense body of water (immense for that locality) to these pools, he says: (quoting from Maundrell) "In the way, before it arrives at the pools, there is an aqueduct of brick pipes, which receives part of the stream, and carries it, by many turnings and windings about the mountains, to Jerusalem." Again he says: "I suppose there was originally a connection between this aqueduct (the one running to Jerusalem) and the pools, and that when necessary these vast reservoirs could be availed of for the supply of Jerusalem." "If Solomon really constructed these vast reservoirs of El Burak, as they are now called," says Dr. Thompson, "and even Dr. Robison is disposed to admit the fact—it is probable that it was on the neighboring hills that he planted the vineyards, and in the valleys to the north-east of them made the gardens and orchards of all kinds of fruits, and here these pools of water, to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees, by which and other like data he worked out the great problem of human affairs to the final product of 'vanity and vexation of Spirit.'"

Near the upper pool is a large dilapidated old castle, two hundred feet square, with barracks for soldiers; where two or three are kept to protect travellers, as it is far from any inhabitants. There are also many bee-hives in this old castle, and in spots the land was planted with potatoes and other vegetables. A little to the west is the "sealed fountain," which supplies these pools, the gardens of Solomon, and the people at Bethlehem. It is covered up; but from the outside the water can be heard running rapidly. There is an aqueduct laid from these pools to Jerusalem, a distance of eight miles; but the water does not run in it to the city as anciently, because it is badly out of repair. We found men at work, however, cleaning it out and repairing it, and from them we learned that the intention is to carry the water to Jerusalem. To the west of the pools is quite a large field of grain; to the north and south it is mountainous, stony and barren.

We now returned to Jerusalem by the Hebron road, meeting many natives with their loaded camels on their way to Hebron, and many Greek travellers on their way to Bethlehem.

A WALK TO THE HILL COUNTRY OF JUDEA.

April 18, 1880.—To-day, in company with two gentlemen belonging in Jerusalem, I had the pleasure of walking to Ain Kurim, which means "fountain of vineyards;" or, in other words, to the village of St. John; the house of Zacharias and Elizabeth, and the birth-place of John the Baptist. The village is between five and six miles west of Jerusalem, over an exceedingly rough road. One of the greatest objections to walking in Palestine is, in certain parts it is so very rocky, that it is hard for the feet to be continually stepping on stones.

We left the city through the Jaffa gate, passing through the Moslem cemetery and by the mills on the hill, first bearing to our right, and then leaving the road that leads to the Convent of the Cross, a large building in the first valley west of the city, we passed over barren, rocky hills, and through beautiful, fertile valleys, meeting on our way men with their donkeys and camels, and women loaded with produce on their heads, mostly green beans, for the market at Jerusalem. As we drew near the village of St. John, we found the hills terraced and the vines growing splendidly.

On the last hill before reaching the village, the Greek Convent came in view, a fine building on the slope of a hill, near to what is supposed to be the house of Zacharias and Elizabeth. On descending into the valley, we immediately entered the village through the filth and dirt piled up in the narrow streets. The lank dogs commenced their barking, as they have done in every village that I have visited in Palestine. They are not dangerous, however, but noisy.

There are many things beautiful and attractive here, notwithstanding the streets are filth and the old houses just ready to topple over. The peach, pear, mulberry, cypress and olive-trees are thrifty and pleasant.

The village is blessed with a flowing fountain of excellent water, which cannot be too highly prized in this country. The women congregate to wash their clothes at the stream that flows from this everlasting fountain. Their manner of washing was amusing to me. The clothes are first soaked; then soaped and laid on a large, smooth, flat stone. Then with another smooth stone, about the size of a quart dipper, or with a piece of olive-wood, the clothes are beaten thoroughly, which quite effectually destroys the vermin, though it does not leave the clothes so clean and white as our New England process would. There are two Latin and one Greek convent here.

As we left the village, we were followed by beggars from four to fifteen years of age, for half a mile, calling for back-sheesh. On our way back to the city, we met the peasants returning that we had met going to market in the morning. It costs these people, both men and women, a great deal of hard labor and much of their time to market their produce. For a woman to travel five or ten miles on foot, with what she can carry on her head, and then sell it for a trifling sum, and return home the same day, is what our American women would call a hard way to get a living. Jerusalem is the market for all the surrounding villages. The market is now well supplied, and prices are generally low. Owing to extreme poverty, the peasants are obliged at a great loss to cut their grain before it is ripe, and sell it to the muleteers for fodder. It seems to be a shame to cut down such beautiful fields of grain for this purpose. An enterprising spirit, law and order, are greatly needed in this land.—Jerusalem, April 13, 1880.

[The Manchester Guardian.]

The Bishop of Manchester on Fashionable Folly.

Yesterday morning the Bishop of Manchester preached at St. John's Church, Hurst, Ashton-under-Lyne, in aid of the school fund. He took for his text the first four verses of the parable of Dives and Lazarus, the gospel for the day, and in the course of his sermon said that to reflecting minds there was nothing which under some aspects caused more pain than the enormous contrasts which modern society presented. We had in England a large rich class and a large poor class, and between them the great body of the people, who were neither very rich nor very poor, but who were fairly well off, living quietly and comfortably in their houses, eating three meals a day, and so long as their money came in weekly, fortnightly, or quarterly troubling themselves little either about the present or the future. They were much as the people of Corinth in the days of the Apostles, saying to themselves, "Let us eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we die." There was a still larger number of people who were looking forward to the future with the hope that they would be richer ten years hence, and live in bigger houses, keep larger establishments, and be able to spend more upon themselves. Like the rich farmer in the parable, whose ground yielded abundantly, they thought only of their own ease and enjoyment, forgetting that the future was with God. There was no use in any of them dreaming dreams, still less would it be of any avail for them to dream revolutionary dreams. The condition of society was more or less God's ordinance. He did not say God had ordered everything just as it was in England, but God had laid down certain lines for the government of the world, and it was a saying at least as old as the days of Moses that the poor should never cease out of the land. It might not be desirable, and he did not say it was desirable, that there should be this "great gulf fixed" between say the Duke with his £160,000 a year and the pauper in the workhouse. How came it to pass? He did not know that it was God's ordinance that one man should have £100,000 a year and another have to live as an outdoor pauper on 3s. 6d. a week; but he did know that it was to a very large extent man's own doing that according as men were thrifty, industrious, and temperate they were prosperous, and that, on the other hand, intemperance, laziness, and unthriftiness did bring men down in the scale of society. Though he did not mean to say that things were just as God ordered them or that we had attained the best possible state, he did say that what we saw around us was, to a very large extent, the natural consequence of the life people were living. There was no harm in a duke having his £100,000 a year if he made a good and worthy use of it, as many dukes did; the harm came when they lived, as to-day many did, selfishly and without any thought of the misery existing around them. There were people living to-day in cellar dwellings in Manchester, in hovels in Ashton and other towns, eating offal, clothed in rags, and not spending so much on their sustenance as the rich man's horse or hound cost. That kind of thing we had to deplore, and it was a kind of thing which had before now become intolerable. What brought about the French Revolution? It was the intolerable neglect of their duty by the privileged classes. They were for keeping the people down, and were continually going about with that pleasant maxim noblesse oblige on their lips. It was all very well for people to give utterance to these fine sentiments, but the question was, did we fulfill our obligations? It was because the French nobility were not fulfilling the obligations about which they were continually prating that the crash came, and in that crash down went the throne and the church and the distinctions of rank and society; and though these things had re-established themselves in that country, it still remained true that if a large class forgot their obligations and thought only of their privileges we were at the very door of a revolution. There were poor in England to-day just as wretched as was Lazarus. In ninety-nine cases out of one hundred he fancied it was from their own fault, though he knew that in some cases inherent weakness of constitution and other causes over which men had no control brought them to the sad state in which they were found—that sudden misfortune overtook people, and that rich men became poor and poor men poorer. It went to his heart again and again when he thought of his own happy, sheltered, and prosperous lot, and when he read, as he did every day, some half a dozen appeals from all parts of the country, not one half of them true, yet not less saddening—telling one of the sad lot of those who, if our conditions were measured out to us by our deserts, perhaps deserved to be as comfortable as oneself. He quite admitted that there were great difficulties in the way of benevolence. What was called indiscriminate charity—putting one's hand in one's pocket and giving a tramp sixpence, shilling, or half-a-crown—did more harm than good, and was a foolish habit which generated in the world a quantity of hypocrisy and lying quite incalculable. Every one who tried to do good ought to take the further pains of seeing that he was doing good. It was said of Archbishop Whately that he gave away in his life £40,000 in charity and yet never gave sixpence to a man who accosted him in the street. That might seem rather hard, but it was his own rule pretty much. Deserving tramps were, he was afraid, very few and seldom to be met with, and he said again that if he wished to do good it was our duty to see that we did it, and not merely be content with the bestowing of a shilling here and there to anyone who might ask it. He did not find it written in the parable from which he had taken his text that the rich man was a man of immoral or profligate life. There were many who were both, whose wealth did an untold amount of mischief in the world, who surrounded themselves with large establishments of servants, men and women, about whom they cared not one whit so long as they administered to their pleasure. That kind of living was producing a sort of moral poison in the nation. We heard sometimes of poisonous vapors rising from the ground. The Campagna near Rome was once such a place, and people did not care to pass there after nightfall because of the deadly vapors which arose; and there were conditions in society and spots in the world where people gathered themselves which were just as poisonous as the Roman Campagna. They were dangerous to come within contact of for fear we should be caught as moths were caught in candle blazes. He feared there were many young men and young women who went to London for a season or two, and who were caught by the fashionable folly, and who came back to their simple lives in the country demoralized and tainted at heart. He did not read that this rich man kept mistresses, gambled, or sported with women's honor so long as they could be toyed with or minister to his gratification. He could not read that he did more than eat a good dinner and clothe himself according to his station; but he was so wrapped up in his own self-indulgence that he really had not time to look to his right hand and his left and see that there were poor people who would be glad to eat the broken meat sent from his table. Ordinarily speaking, it was not possible to tell what became of people after they were dead. Some people thought they could, and spoke of their dead friends as amongst those who were for a certainty redeemed. But here Christ lifted the curtain, and we caught a glimpse of the nether world and saw to what this self-gratification led. It was not enough to be decent and respectable and pay one's debts. He dared say this rich man did all this. We did not hear that he went employing tradesmen, running up bills and not paying them, as was often done now. He was an honest man after his notions, but he cared simply for his own gratification and neglected to "look on the things of others." We were bound to "look on things of others," as Paul said, not merely from motives of curiosity, but from a desire to do what we could for those who were placed in less favorable circumstances than ourselves. He did not want to dream of doing good up there in the clouds. There was a deal of sorrow and misery and loneliness in the world, and to be dreaming instead of doing seemed almost like saying there was nothing God could give us to do that was good. In conclusion, the Bishop urged his hearers to do what they could to narrow the gulf which existed and would always exist between different ranks of society.—Sent by Brother H. Heyer.

POETRY.

The Daisy.

The following poem, by John Mason Good, is considered by Rev. Dr. Granville Moore, one of the best gems in the English language. It was recited by the late William Cullen Bryant, in his alumni speech, at Williams College some years ago.]

Not worlds on worlds in phalanx deep
Need we to prove that God is here!
The daisy, fresh from winter's sleep,
Tells of His hand in language clear.

For who but He who arched the skies,
And poised the dayspring's golden urn,
Reveal'd to infant eyes
Could bid the lowly flower adorn?

Mid the green strip, its tufty stem,
Its magic leaflet nicely spun,
And the gold-spangled gem
That, set in silver, gleams at noon?

And flung it out strained and free,
O'er hill and dale, and down the road,
That man, who'll be walking, may see
In every step the stamp of God?

CORRESPONDENCE.

Letter to a Sister.

My Dear Sister:—

Procrastination is the thief of time.

I always did hate letter writing, and now I would much rather read. I think the last year of my life the roughest one I have ever spent. I never had the slightest idea, that, if any one undertook to serve the Lord, persecution would be sure to follow, but just you begin to inquire for the old paths and see how long it will be before you will have plenty to call you fool, crazy or fanatical. However the word of the Lord is not changed at all as yet which says, They that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution—that little word shall is not done away with by any means.

I think, my sister, that it was a great deal easier to serve the Lord years ago when people went to the stake for their faith, than it is to-day—at any rate it was a great deal easier then than now to tell who were the Lord's. Now it is, get your name on the church-book and you are supposedly all right for glory. But you ask the Lord to show you where we are religiously and then begin with Isaiah and read through to the end of Revelation and see what you will find.

Mary, I think we are destined to see fearful times of war, bloodshed, famine and pestilence before the Gentile world will awake to their sad condition.

Deeming themselves wise they have become fools and have come to a state of high-mindedness and folly which betokens a fall. See Rom. xi, in connection with much in the Old Testament which tells of a people loved for their Father's sake, who have been smitten and scattered, but will be gathered with great mercy. Mary, the nations are nothing in the sight of the Lord, for that nation that will not serve him shall be destroyed. So also will be the individual. In Amos i. 6, we find, "Wo to them that are at ease in Zion." Can you look abroad in the land and find to-day those that are mourning over lost sinners? No; you cannot, all are at ease and quiet, thinking themselves happy that their lives are fallen in such pleasant places, but alas! I fear a very sad awakening will come to many of earth's children. It makes me feel sad at heart when I think of the many blind guides that are leading the blind and remember the words of Jesus, If the blind lead the blind they will both fall into the ditch. We are told in the New Testament of false teachers who shall arise deceiving, if possible, the very elect. Oh! Mary, Mary, Mary, let us not be in that company, we need not be, if found there it will be our own fault—it will be because we are wilfully ignorant.

The Bible is full of wisdom and full of warning, let us search it and see what we find there—dig there as for hidden treasure, and surely we shall be rewarded.

I will not attempt to recount the trials and troubles of last year only to say that if I had not had them, the Bible would not seem half so true a book as it now does. I know now that if any one will do his (Lord's) will they shall know of the doctrine whether it is of God or whether Jesus spoke of it of himself alone. John vii. 17. Some people get very enthusiastic over the cause of temperance, but after all 'tis only a temporal salvation. Now why not get enthusiastic over our eternal well being? If we do the chances are we shall be called crazy. I pray God that I may ever be more and more crazy in this direction. There are things to which the Apostle exhorts us to give earnest heed lest at any time we let them slip. "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" Another thing of which I am fully persuaded is that a person may obey all the known laws of health and morality in the land and still die and perish at last if God's requirements or plan as brought to view in 1 Cor. i., is not fully accorded with, accompanied by faith and obedience, for we read that the willing and obedient shall eat the good of the land, and it is necessary to remember that it is land every time and things to come which we should look for and be persuaded by them and see them, for if they do seem afar off they will surely come. The Lord is able who has promised.

Our life is hid with Christ in God and when he who is our life shall appear then and not till then shall we appear with him in glory, and it will be by a literal resurrection, from the dead, if sleeping in the dust of earth, or by a change of which Paul tells in 1 Cor. xv.

So we shall come to a time when the faithful will not die at all but be changed from mortal to immortal by the power and spirit of the Almighty, and by that Spirit and power the dead who die in the Lord are to be raised up to life and blessedness to inherit a new and beautiful earth. Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth, says Jesus in Matt. v. 5; and in Psa. xxxvii. the story is repeated o'er and o'er that the meek shall inherit the earth and delight themselves in the abundance of peace.

The earth is the footstool of the Lord, and in Isa. lx. 13 he says that he will make it glorious. Num. xiv. 21 says But as truly as I live all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord.

Jesus said unto Martha, (John xi. 40) Said I not unto thee if thou wouldst believe thou shouldst see the glory of God and he immediately raised Lazarus from the dead. Now if it is for the glory of God that the dead shall be raised and the earth filled with resurrected people—I am sure it will be so. Ezek. xxxvii. is very plain upon this point, so also is Paul in 1 Cor. xv. 12, for he says if there be no resurrection of the dead then is not Christ risen, and we know, as we know any other history, that it was a fact, and facts are stubborn things, that Christ bodily left the tomb.

Again, let us look at 1 Cor. ii. 9, where it says that it hath not entered into the heart of men the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. Remember it is things that are prepared—they will be something and we shall be somebody in the kingdom of God if we are so blest as to get there. In verse 10, it is further stated that God hath revealed these things unto us by his spirit—which is blessedly true. And if we hear his word and believe it, we shall be saved by it—not to be floating around in the air, but as men and women in God's everlasting kingdom, heavenly or holy kingdom—righteous kingdom, or kingdom wherein the righteous shall dwell, (see 2 Peter iii. 13), a kingdom of peace, blessedness and rest, which shall be as literal as all other kingdoms, only more exceedingly so, for it shall stand for ever. Three of the kingdoms are passed away, we are now in the fourth, and the fifth is the kingdom of God, as I have said. Now for a moment return and look at 1 Cor. ii. 15, looking at the marginal reading —If you have a Bible with that in. See also Prov. xxviii. 5, and now let us see what we find in Isa. lxv. 17, (examine the margin also), for behold—or look—see I create new heavens and a new earth, and the former (that is the one we now have) shall not be remembered nor come into mind—or come upon the heart (as in the margin). See also Isa. lxvi. 22; 2 Peter iii. 13, says, Nevertheless we—that is the children of God by faith and obedience, and positively no one else, the truth of which assertion I can adduce plenty proof—according to his promise—look for new heavens and a new earth wherein the righteous shall dwell. If any desire to know how this is to be, read Ezek. xxxvii. 5, 6, 12-14; also, 1 Cor. xv. 12-19; see again Rom. viii. 11. The command is, Search the Scriptures—so let us take time and look them up carefully. In John vii. 17, we read, If any man will do the will of God, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God or whether it is not. I know positively that this is true from actual test—I mean by this that when we come to that place or time when we are willing to do just as the Lord wants us to—that the things of the Lord are taken by by his Spirit and shown unto us, and that is, or constitutes the worth of the Holy Spirit, which Jesus said he would send when he went away, to bring to our remembrances those things he hath said unto us, and by it we know that we are the children of God, for it witnesseth thus with us according to his word. Blessed is God in that he gives us to know these things and we are not left to guess it, or hope we have a hope, but we know we have one big with immortality for it brings to life the dead; for whereas before time nothing was known and testimony was lacking, now we know and are able to testify freely of the things of God. Amen! Amen!

My sickness was a very distressing affair—it is past and let it go. The details of it would be very unpleasant, so I will not try to tell them. My health now is good while one who told me I would not get well without using quinine, and who himself was then using more or less of it, is now in the graveyard sleeping the sleep of death. I trust that he was a servant of the Lord and will awake in the resurrection morning. I believe that only those who are his children and have his spirit will awake. See Rom. viii. 11. Mary, I perceive that your heart is very much bound up in your children. Jesus says, Suffer, or teach—allow—permit and not forbid or hinder (according to Webster) little children to come unto me, for of such as come unto me, be it men, women or children, is the heavenly, holy or righteous kingdom composed.

My dear sister, I believe this to be the spirit of the matter or the truth concerning it—in blessed accord with the rest of the Bible. Now let us not, my dear sister, be deceived in this matter, nor proudly dream that our children unassisted by our prayers and tears will come to a knowledge of the Lord in these degenerate days. They did not years ago, much less will they now.

Mary, I wish you would notice the aversion which little children manifest toward the service of God and older ones too, before they are born of the Holy Spirit. The Bible says we go astray as soon as we are born—speaking lies (Psa. lviii. 3) and how early is the lying propensity manifested in little children. "Ye must be born again" says Jesus. I know it is true, as true of little ones as of older ones, for children of faithful parents have given evidence of being born again, and so will ours if we are faithful to him, who has bought us with his blood—for he is faithful who has promised; and what is the promise? It is this: I will visit the sins of fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generations that hate me; and shew mercy unto thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments. Exod. xx. Again, Deut. vii. 9: Know therefore that the Lord thy God, he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him and keep his commandments, to a thousand generations, and who will by no means clear the guilty. Exod. xxxiv. 7.

Again, let us not be deceived by thinking (although taught it by the churches) that our children at death go to be angels in heaven, for it is false as false can be. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. The children of whom it is said, that they shall come again from the land of the enemy were martyrs for Jesus, not so were those slain at the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. There is a great difference between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not. Those who are born after the Spirit, or, of the Holy Ghost, always have been persecuted by those who are born of the flesh, and always will be.

Another thing, my sister, of which I am thoroughly satisfied is that we have no inherent immortality in us but must seek for it. Rom. xxxvi. 2-7. Hosea iv. 6 tells us, My people are destroyed or cut off for lack of knowledge and very, very many are actually perishing to-day for that reason; for the preachers preach lies and the people are pleased about it, (Jer. v. 6; also xxiii.; and Ezek. xiii.) and many are deceived and defiled. Zion is mourning and languishing. Again, Amos vi. 1 says, Woe to them that are at ease in Zion and truly here we are when the professed people of God are at ease—not troubled at all for those around them—given to pleasure. We read that, she that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth. 1 Tim. v. 6. True either of an individual or a church. You have only to behold and you see that pride, pleasure and folly rules the churches of to-day. Their belief is, "Oh we have immortal souls, we can't die," but the Bible says in Ezra xviii. that they shall die. Again I have heard ministers say concerning the temporal blessing and joys we have, we are glad our lives are fallen to us in such pleasant places, forgetting that special and fierce judgments have been visited upon the children of the ungodly and will be again, and that we should live as did the Israelites of old, as pilgrims and strangers on the earth (Heb. xi. 13) looking for what Paul said, his twelve tribes instantly served God day and night for and hoped to come to (Acts xxvi. 7) even a resurrection out from among dead ones. Luke xv. 35.

From your affectionate brother,

T. J. WILLIAMSON.

[We are born of the spirit at the resurrection—begotten of the spirit is applicable to us now if children of God. —Ed.]

Editor Restitution:—Several months have passed since I took up my pen. The last article I wrote was on feet-washing, just before starting out to care for an aged sufferer. I was with her until strength failed me, and, finding it so difficult to leave my family, that it was decided to bring her to me at my home. Given up to die by all her neighbors and three different physicians, she was brought to me on a bed, and for six weeks after her removal we expected momentarily the grim enemy, death. She was not conscious but a few moments at a time; but one day about 9 o'clock she summoned all the household to her bedside and said she had but a short time to be with us. I summoned a neighbor, who said to me as soon as he saw her, that she was already struck with death; her face was purple as if mortification had set in, and her nails of a still darker hue, and the hands and face had a cold, clammy moisture about them. She made her will, gave all the directions for her burial—even to the hymn to be sung at her funeral. From the first she asked the writer to sit close beside her, and not leave her until all was over. Her dinner hour arrived, no hand but mine had prepared her meals, I looked at the clock, then at her; "no, no," said she, "stay by me; it will soon be over; you have been a faithful daughter all your life; I want you nearest to me to the end." And thus I sat, her hands in mine, my whole soul pleading (even in the hour of death, as we all supposed,) that my precious mother might be spared yet a little longer; sat until the sun sunk in the west, then she slept a sweet, calm sleep, such as she had not had for many a day. The enemy had fled; mother lived; neighbors, friends and physicians were as much astonished as if one had come back from the dead. She began to mend, but slowly, ah! so slowly. For two long months she required constant attendance night and day; and, in all this time, she had no other attendants but husband and the writer. Hence, dear brother, there was no time for writing; no time to read the Bible; no time even to pray (on bended knee), for had there been, the constant strain on mind and body would cause me to wander into dreamland the moment I attempted it, hence my prayers were breathed according to my greatest needs, as I worked over the sufferer; and with my weak body and so many sleepless nights, I had to cry often for that help which never fails, and it must have come. My kind physician told me he would do all in his power to keep me up, but that a higher power than his must have sustained my frail body through so many trying hours, sinking at times through utter exhaustion, but with earnest cries to the Father for help, and a strong, determined will, would rally again, so that my beloved parent was not neglected even in her smallest wants. She was taken ill the first of September and not until the 6th of March did she take her first step out of doors; but she lives, and is as well again as an old lady of seventy could expect to be. About the middle of April she returned home, and has taken under her care four orphan children. Perhaps this was the work God has spared her to do, for the little ones had been without care all winter, hence there was no other one to do it. How great has been God's mercies to me, and his abundant love also! I had no time or strength to protect even my choicest floral treasures last fall, and all my neighbors lost most of theirs, but mine are spared, and so abundantly, that I have been able to replace the lost to my neighbors. The beautiful Crocus blossom (the first herald of spring) began to bloom for me the first of February, and from that time to the present I have had plenty of the floral treasures. But it seems to me that never before have I done so little for the Father who has bestowed so much on me.

Taking my Bible one day when sore, tired and weary with much company, I tried to read a comforting psalm, but my eyes closed, and the book dropped from my hand. I burst into tears and said: "Oh, mother! Think what God is doing for me, and I can do nothing for him—not even to read his holy word without falling asleep." "Mary," said mother, "God does not require of you more than it is possible for you to give; you are working for no selfish interests; the labor was placed upon you, and you are discharging it to the best of your ability, so I do not see why you are not working in the Lord's vineyard, just as much as if you were teaching his commands to others." Her words comforted me; I did not see it in that light until then. It seemed like being cumbered with the things of this life, to the shutting out of all heavenly things. I think one must be with God in thought and prayer often, to feel that nearness to him which is so sacred and comforting. But all this was denied me; not a quiet half hour even on First Day at this long winter. I trust the many correspondents who may chance to see this letter will now forgive my long silence, and, believe me, that it was utterly impossible to write to the best of friends; that I will endeavor, if health and strength returns to me, to answer all my kind correspondents. Have written this letter purposely that you may know until I am able to write you personally that my neglect has not been willful. Health very poor, but with rest, and a skillful physician, trust soon to be much better again. May God bless you all, and keep you from trials and afflictions such as has been mine the past winter.

Yours in the faith,

MRS. O. F. HALL.

Adrian, Mich.

The sun's face is again spotted. A small spyglass shows a row of spots north of his equator, running in a north-east direction, and a group of huge spots just coming into view around the eastern edge of the disk. With a suitable telescope the ridging of the surface about the spots and the broken edges and gloomy depths of the vast caverns can be studied. Jupiter, now very bright in the early morning sky, is hastening toward his perihelion or point of nearest approach to the sun, and some astronomers have conjectured that it is his influence that is throwing the great central orb into such a state of perturbation. The periods of greatest sun-spot activity, at any rate, correspond pretty closely with Jupiter's perihelia. Whether the action of these forces causes cyclones and other atmospherical disturbances on our planet is an unsettled question, but there are two things that the presence of the sun-spots precedes with certainty, to-wit: northern lights and unusual electrical activity.

RESTITUTION FUND.

ARGOS, Fulton Co., Ind., Nov. 29, 1879.

Editor Restitution—With your permission I will make an appeal to the brotherhood for help to support THE RESTITUTION for the year 1880 in view of its weekly visits.

Now, dear brethren, I call upon one and all who feel themselves able, to donate to the cause of Christ the small amount of $5.00 between this and the first of January.

Dear brethren, we could do this, with a few exceptions, if we just thought so. I am well aware that some brethren have contributed nobly, but I make this appeal in a special manner to those who have heretofore done nothing as a free-will offering.

Dear brother, do not say, I am too poor! Perhaps you are using that noxious weed, tobacco, in some form. Consider for one moment: are we who claim to be the chosen of God so poverty stricken that we cannot support a weekly paper.

We do hope that everyone will respond to this appeal. Please let us hear from all those who cannot or will not pay the $5.00, and will they please give us their reasons. I am not a poor man. My cause is Abraham's cause. I am a seven years old and have a sister dearly to support. I have a small farm of 50 acres. I farm and work at the carpenter's trade to support my family. I use neither tobacco nor intoxicating drinks.

And, dear Editor, I will enclose $5.00 for commencement. I read The RESTITUTION, and the Bible, and I hope to meet you all in that coming kingdom. So, farewell. ABRAHAM POSTHOUT.

POETRY.

Futurity.

GEORGE MARTIN.

I.

When Death's unsparing fingers trace
Their pallid hue upon my face,
O, how it glows my cheek with,
And quickened energies me fills to live.
The mystic ray of living light
That warms the breast at peeps quite,
To nature's dust I resign
The hope that promised joys divine,
And count my treasures gilt or tows,
Compared with schemes that me have wove.

II.

Better that all of woman born
Should know no resurrection morn,
Alike forgot of earth and heaven,
Than one poor spirit undriven
Endure, with unavailing tears,
The agony of endless years.
That theologians dare proclaim,
And crown it with them Maker's name!

III.

Believers in the burning lake
Have learned their fortunes at the stake,
And, as they deemed their God would do,
Behold with unrelenting view,
Their groaning victims' writhing frame,
While they invoked Jehovah's name;
Frail woman, with imploring speech,
That even a demon's heart might reach,
Has often begged amid choking sighs,
And face unbiled to the skies,
To spare her life—her kindred claims
But plead in piteous cries in vain.

IV.

O Heaven, could thy slightest ray
Turn ever lead my heart astray?
Does thy celestial essence, clothed
Intruded zeal and murderous hate,
Or teach me to proscribe and hate,
And persecute my fellow man?
O, no! if heaven could not be won,
Without such deeds beneath the sun,
I'd forfeit all your world of bliss,
And love the forms I find in this.

V.

Then, Lenes from me your priestly craft;
The breath of love my sail shall waft,
And Reason's lined me helm shall guide,
Though cumbrous Gospels hath the side;
And as I bear the spirit-coast,
No howling fiend, no moaning ghost,
Shall board my bark on sulphurous wing,
And to my flying pennant cling,
But lightly—all my perils o'er—
I'll drop upon the sinless shore,
Nor fear to meet a tyrant's rod,
Grasped in the hidden hand of God.

Coming Age—Its Proximity—Christ's Literal History Continued — Fifth Period—Signs of His Coming—Religious World—The Subject Defined—Christ's Description.—No. 23.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Religious World.—In delineating the state of the religious world immediately anterior to the return of our Blessed Redeemer many things should be kept in view:

a. The church will be considered as to her membership—their practices, and not with regard to their theology. Their theory as to the cardinal doctrines of Christianity might be quite passable, while their daily practices would be highly censurable. Christ pays special attention to their practice.

b. The church will be so strong in membership as to constitute the ruling element in the world; both, therefore, will be more or less included in the descriptions about to be given, since in every instance they are associated. In every community, are professors of religion, and those that are, by profession, worldlings. In all their social gatherings, there is a mixture, both classes having their special influence.

c. The same may be said of the church and the political world. In all Christian countries, those who profess the name of Christ, constitute the ruling power. They are in every office both of honor and of trust, and shape political character. Their influence is also combined with anti-Christian influences. As in the celestial systems, bodies, mutually attracting cause irregular motion. So in the religious world, foreign, elements affect Christians. We have a Christianity peculiar to the age in which it was brought into being;—Apostolic Christianity in the days of the Apostles; National Christianity in the days of Constantine, and his successors;—Papal Christianity under Papal supremacy;—Protestant Christianity in those countries where there is a union of church and state;—and Republican Christianity, where there is greater political freedom. In a word, Christianity varies with its political and social elements. As the atmosphere is pure and healthy where there are no foreign substances, so is Christianity pure, only when kept free from all foreign ingredients. If our atmosphere is filled with malaria we shall breathe it; so of the Christian atmosphere; if it be full of corrupt political and moral thoughts and notions, the Christian system will be more or less tainted with it.

d. In the days of Christ's first advent the Jewish church was combined with political power, and partook more or less of the character of that element—"We have a law, and by our law he ought to die." John xix. 7. The Christian church (so-called) of the last days will have a strong political element (Rev. xvii. and xix.) which, with its social influences, will shape its character. The character of such a people Christ described to his disciples. It now remains for us to trace that narration and examine very carefully whether that description suits the religious world of our times. Did Christ see our day? All answer. He did; for he saw every generation to the period of his return. Did he describe this generation? He described one with the same features.

Christ's Narration Resumed.—"Then shall two be in the field: the one shall be taken, and the other left." Matt. xxiv. 40. This carries out the idea expressed in the preceding verse. "They knew not;" they will be so ignorant of the approach of that event that they will be working in the field as usual. It does not apply to the overthrow of Jerusalem. Since he had given them such a distinct sign—"Jerusalem compassed with armies," that they all fled from the city. This event in its sudden and unexpected approach, would have no resemblance to the approach of an army and all the movements of a seige. A great army, with all its ponderous fixtures, is not, in its movements, like the secret coming of a thief. The siege and fall of Jerusalem were so unlike the Advent of the Son of Man that the two events could not be represented by the same harbingers.

Verse 41.—"Two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left." This, with the preceding verse describes, what is called the rapture, from the Latin, rapio—I seize, I snatch away. The righteous are seized—"caught up to meet the Lord in the air." As Elijah was caught away from Elisha, so will the righteous be parted from their companions. Where was there any such a rapture at the fall of Jerusalem? It is thought, that, as women are said to be grinding, it must refer to times long since past. The reader will take notice that "women" is a supplied word, Christ did not use the term. In the original it reads, when translated—"Two grinding at the mill"—"Two shall be grinding together." Luke xvii. 35. It simply represents an occupation.

Verse 42.—"Watch therefore; for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come." It was their Lord that was then addressing his four disciples. He was speaking to them of his return. If he had, in his mind, any other than his literal personal return, he would have explained himself, for, it is very evident that his hearers could have understood nothing else. He never told his disciples to watch for the fall of Jerusalem; nor was Titus their "Lord."

In our interpretations we should not allow ourselves to loose sight of Christ's surroundings, nor of the intent of his words. He was on the Mount of Olives, in private with four of his intimate friends; the temple in view with all its splendor, his disciples wanted information relative to certain predicted events, among which was his return. He commences the narration of a chain of events extending down through great national, social, and ecclesiastical revolutions to his coming. He had described the events that would take place before the fall of Jerusalem, had given the signs of that event, had also given the necessary instructions connected with that event, had spoken of the great tribulation which would follow; then gives another list of signs preceding another great event, which he calls his coming. This event he describes very minutely; and also, presents a great variety of signs by which they (or their successors) might discern his approach.

Verse 43.—"But know this, that if the good man of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up." The lesson here taught, is watchfulness, not for the fall of Jerusalem, nor for death, but for One whose advent requires a special preparation. Watching, here enjoined, is not sitting at some window, and gazing into open space, or looking into the face of the heavens; it is something that requires us to look within; to examine our affections, and learn whether we are ready to meet a pure and a holy being; for he that is truly watching, and expecting to see him as he is, and to be made like him; "Every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself even as he is pure." 1 John iii. 3. Such is the nature of that watchfulness required by our Savior. And those that truly watch for the return of their Lord will make this careful preparation. Such as, by any theory, put the personal coming of Christ beyond their possible lifetime will not be disposed to put their hearts in order.

Verse 44.—"Therefore be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh." Christ evidently taught his disciples that the precise moment of his return would not be known, and for that reason they should always have the necessary preparation made; as a man afflicted with a disease, liable to take his life at any moment, but his affairs settled, and himself in readiness, so he that looks for the rapture at any hour, is careful to live prayerfully and in purity.

Verse 45.—"Who then is that faithful and wise servant, whom his Lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season?" By the word "servant," we understand a class of persons to be intended; since the giving of meat implies some considerable duration; and since, by the "household" is understood the church in its numerous membership, it would require very many to do the work; to feed the flock of God would require no dense labors. Besides, there is another servant, an "evil servant." Verse 48. We can safely say, then, that the wise servant represents a class of servants, or ministers, and the evil servant, another class of ministers and that both classes profess to feed the same household.

Verse 46.—"Blessed is that servant, whom his Lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing." How doing? giving meat in due season—giving proper food at the proper time—food to suit the peculiar times.

Verse 47.—"Verily, I say unto you, that he shall make him ruler over all his goods." Since this servant (class of ministers) does what his Lord requires at that special time, he gives him the entire charge of his household and its entire interests are placed under his special management.

Verse 48.—"But and if that evil servant say in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming;" what is the message of this servant? "My lord delayeth his coming." Does he utter it with his lips? No: he speaks it with his heart; He does not wish to see his lord since he knows that he will not be pleased with his works. He is not doing with his master's goods what he was commanded him to do, to feed the flock. In what that evil servant says in his heart we are particularly interested. What put such a thought into his heart? The message that his lord is coming. Nothing but the agitation of the subject of his lord's return would have suggested such an answer. Some persons about the household (the faithful servants) are proclaiming the lord's coming, which stirs the corrupt fountain of the wicked servant's heart, and induces the answer, My lord delays his coming.

Verse 49.—"And shall begin to smite his fellow servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken;" "His fellow servants!" This shows what we have previously stated, viz., that servant stood for a class, as the work would require many. Here they are called servants—"fellow servants"—since they nominally fill the same office—they are ministers of the same household, called to feed the same persons. They are fellows, the same class of servants officially as the little horn among the ten horns, his fellows.

This evil servant does not smite the household, but the feeders of the household; he does not smite the sheep, since he wants their fleeces; he smites the shepherds—the faithful shepherds.

The course which the hireling shepherds take leads him into congenial company; he associates with those that think of nothing beyond the pleasures of life. That evil servant is not said, himself, to get drunk, but to eat and drink with them. These are his companions, in order to gain their friendship and secure their influence. He makes to himself friends of the mammon of unrighteousness.

Verses 50-51.—"The lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of. And shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Such is the analogy drawn by Christ, between a certain householder, his household,—and servants, and himself, his household and servants. His will be like the one he supposed. Christ here very distinctly shows that his household will be divided, and that the division will about his coming.

SELECTIONS.

[New Era, March 15, 1849.]

Prophecies Concerning Israel, Their Land and King, not yet Fulfilled.

Sir:—Your publication of my second poor attempt to touch the "sweet harp of prophecy," whose music has in all ages cheered the hearts of God's people, encourages me to pen a third letter for the New Era. Although few people, comparatively, feel interested, in the glowing predictions of the future of Israel, I cannot but think there are many of your readers whose lack of interest is owing to lack of knowledge, and that they only require to have their attention drawn to the subject, and to be put in the way of understanding it. In order to experience similar sensations to the two wayfarers whose "hearts burned within them," while One whom they knew not opened to them the Scriptures of the prophets. Luke xiv. 13-32. One chief reason, I have no doubt, why the sure word of prophecy is so little heeded—contrary to the Apostle's advice, in 2 Peter i. 19; iii. 2—is, because it is not generally perceived how closely connected are the futures of the glorified church and the nation of Israel. The great truth that the Head and Savior of the body of elect Jews and Gentiles, who are chosen in Christ, called the church, Ephes. v. 23, is not only the Son of God, but "the King of Israel,"—the wonderful Seed promised to Abraham and to David, and consequently, the heir to the land and throne and kingdom of Israel—is not remembered and appreciated as it should be. 2 Tim. ii. 8; Luke i. 32, 33, otherwise Christians who hope to be "ever with the Lord," when caught away to meet him at his coming, would see they are to be "forever with" Israel's King; and as he is to be with Israel, dwelling in their midst, Zeph. iii. 14, 15, of necessity, they must also be with Israel, as the "joint heirs" of the Messiah's throne, kingdom and dominion, which latter shall include all nations; for in that day "the Lord shall be King over all the earth;" and "all nations shall serve him," and "shall go up from year to year (to Jerusalem) to worship the King, the Lord of Hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles." So he that runs may read in Zechariah's last chapter, every word of which must have its accomplishment in the future.

Christ's future as well as Israel's is plainly foretold in the prophetic Scriptures, and it is to be, as might naturally be expected, in his own land, not simply his own native country, where he was born and lived and died and rose again, but his own by virtue of the everlasting covenant which God made with Abraham, Gen. xv. 18; Gal. iii. 16, 18. From the Nile to the Euphrates, lies the land in which Israel of old were allowed to dwell, but could not sell it because it was not yet theirs, but Mine said the Lord, Lev. xxv. 23, chosen out of all the earth to be "the glory of all lands," Ezek. xx. 6, as "thy land, O Immanuel," Isa. viii. 8, ought to be. Long desolate, long a land that "devoured its inhabitants," the day is at hand when in fulfilment of Ezek. xxxvi. 35, "they shall say, this land that was desolate is become like the Garden of Eden; and the waste and desolate and ruined cities are become fenced, and are inhabited." And again, in fulfilment of Isaiah lx. "Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders. . . . . Thy people shall be all righteous; they shall inherit the land forever, the branch of my planting, the work of my hands, that I may be glorified." And in lxi.: "They shall build the old wastes, and they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations. And strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vine-dressers, . . . For your shame you shall have double, and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion; therefore in their land they shall possess the double; everlasting joy shall be unto them." And in lxii. "Thou (Zion, God's chosen holy hill—see Psalm. cxxxii. 13-18; Isaiah, ii. 2-4; iv. 5, 6; ii. 3; ix. 13, 14; Ezek. xliii. 7;) shalt no more be forsaken, neither shall thy land any more be termed desolate; but thou shalt be called Heph-zibah, i. e., my delight is in her, and thy land Beulah, i. e., married, for the Lord delighteth in thee and thy land shall be married, . . . The Lord hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength. Surely, I will no more give thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for the which thou hast labored, but they that have gathered it shall eat it and praise the Lord; and they that have brought it together shall drink it in the courts of my holiness." . . . "Behold, the Lord hath proclaimed unto the end of the world, say ye to the daughter of Zion, behold thy salvation cometh, behold his reward is with him, and his work before him. And they shall call them the holy people, the redeemed of the Lord, and thou shalt be called, sought out, a city not forsaken."

The same Spirit that inspired Zechariah to call upon Zion and Jerusalem to rejoice because their King was coming "riding upon an ass," moved Isaiah and Ezekiel to speak what I have transcribed above. Surely, then, no one who knows how literally Zechariah's words were accomplished in and by the great Fulfiller of prophecy, will doubt the fulfilment, in due time, of all the glorious things spoken of the land and people and King of Israel.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Editor Restitution:—The general election, looked upon by the governments of all Europe with interest, and this not limited to Europe, is over. Elections with you are frequent; here they are, comparatively, seldom; and we need not wonder that in every part of the world, more or less, there should be interest in an election where every constituency throughout the United Kingdom is called upon to speak.

There are those, who, disliking the Tories, expect flush times now. Even the cautious Manchester Guardian's London Commercial Editor has indulged in the hope of coming prosperity; and had I nought but this world's wisdom to sway me, I might regard such judgment. But I must dare to tell my mind as a Christian; unwelcome as what I say is to some. The Liberals are triumphant; the Tories are down; "good times coming!" Well, people have always looked to changes as denoting good; but people have always been disappointed. It is true that for some years when Mr. Gladstone was Premier wages were higher than usual; yet the folly of thousands of colliers, miners, and cotton operatives, caused their families to be in no really better condition than when wages were less. There are those among these who are sober, steady, and devout; but truth obliges me to say that such are the minority.

My infirm health prevents my saying much as I otherwise would. The Times I now mail you has an editorial on what not only interests people here, and wherever the English language is spoken, but, depend on this, that Germans and Frenchmen by the multitude, and also men of other nations will view the issue with interest. The case of Bradlaugh is unprecedented. Thomas Paine stirred up society in England and America; but he never stood before the world as Bradlaugh does;—an elected member of Parliament. When it is considered that Bradlaugh is returned for Northampton, how striking is the fact of infidelity on the English mind! Had the man been returned from some manufacturing borough where socialistic principles have especially prevailed, the matter would not have been so telling as it is. But here is an old town, where, from time immemorial, nominal Christianity has been, as it were, a matter of course, sending a man to the House of Commons of world-wide celebrity as an Atheist; an open one, without, it seems, the slightest reservation. What will the French think? It is less than ten years short of the centenary of their revolution that shook the civilized world; and the remembrances of that convulsion will be excited by Bradlaugh's case. Before this reaches you the Cable will have informed the American press of the course toward Bradlaugh by the committee;—but (D. V.) more anon.

We have been favored with rain. The admirably-written article in the Times on "Agricultural Prospects," must be viewed as being penned before this gracious visitation.

BREVITIES.

In Ourmiah, Persia, there are from twenty to thirty deaths daily from famine. One man who dropped down exhausted in the street was half devoured by dogs before assistance arrived.

One hundred and forty-eight million copies of the Bible, translated into two hundred and twenty-six different languages and dialects, and distributed in different parts of the world, constitute one of the achievements of foreign missions in the last hundred years.

Rome spends two hundred thousand dollars on its public schools, of which ten years ago it had none at all. The Romans now evince great alacrity in attending the schools, and the latter are entirely inadequate to the demand of the population.

The Waldensian Church has now 100 agents in evangelizing Italy—not foreigners, but Italians by birth, by civil rights and privileges, they constitute a native agency. The gospel is preached by them in forty-seven towns and villages. The number who attend public worship under them is about 4,000, and of these 2,414 are communicants, the majority of whom have come out of the Church of Rome.

The condition of Turkey is desperate. A speedy reopening of the Eastern question is anticipated by European statesmen. The country is politically dying. In the coming crisis, which we are glad to see rapidly approaching, we are content to know that the coup de grace to the moribund "curse of the East," "the abomination of desolation," by which Jerusalem is now being "trodden down" of the Turkish "Gentiles," will be administered by the fittest agent to do the work. The collapse and death of Turkey is imminent. Then may be expected to come on the last question in the great controversy;—"the battle of the eagles and the vultures," to decide who is to possess the prey; and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on Israel, the return of Judah and Israel to their own land, and their acquisition at the Gate in anticipation of the time of yet greater sorrows, when "the coming struggle" and the dreaded Armageddon war shall arrive.

JEWS PERSECUTED IN NORTHERN AFRICA.

Private letters received in London from Morocco report a barbarous anti-Jewish movement amongst the Mahometans of Fez. The Echo says a fierce attack was made upon them in the neighborhood of the Imperial Gardens and that many were beaten and wounded. A party of Mahometans rescued a number of the Jews and escorted them in safety to the Jews' quarter. For this service they demanded ransom-money, which the Jewish community was compelled to pay. An old Jew, seventy-five years of age, who has always been highly esteemed for his character, was seized, drenched with petroleum, and then actually set on fire. The Jews barricaded themselves in their quarter, where they had to endure a siege at the hand of the mob. It appears that the Spanish Consul at Tangier had informed the Government of Morocco that the Spanish Government would no longer impart to certain Jews and other natives the protection with which it had hitherto guarded them, and that the news of this withdrawl of Spanish patronage let loose the Mohametan mob on the defenceless Jews.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings and Lord of lords, immortal nature as joint heir and joint possessor of the throne of the universe; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the honorable reward of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ and many other kindred truths. Hence those seeking a hearty God-fed theological pap-state, are cheerfully informed that this publication is not prepared for their nourishment.

Coming Age—Its Proximity—Liberal Narration Continued—FINAL Period—Signs in the Moral World—Political—Social—Religious—The Church, or Household of Christ—Its Elements—Scripture View—Its History as it Now Exists—Similarity—Church Practices.—No. 25.

J. P. WEETHEE.

The Modern Church—Christ's Household.—We are about to enter upon that division of the signs which most intimately concern Christian practice. The question which we now propose to discuss, is the following: Do the elements and practices of the Christian Church at large correspond with those given in the Bible as the characteristics and practices of the Church of the "Last Days?" If they are similar, the Advent of Christ is upon us; if not, we are not authorized to expect that event as impending. We may conclude, My Lord delays his coming.

What are its elements and practices as noted in the Scriptures? Christ's description we find in two parables which have already been given. Below will be found a brief summary:

1. The household is divided into two classes relative to the Lord's coming.

2. Faithful and wise servant—giving meat in due season,—or proclaiming the events connected with the Lord's return; and persuading all to prepare for that event.

3. That evil servant, who says in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming. Such are his heart's overflowing. He has no faith in Christ's near approach, neither has he any desire for it.

His acts are the embodiment of his thoughts. He dislikes to hear of his Lord's return, and, therefore, hates those that desire and proclaim his advent. "He smites his fellow servants, and eats and drinks (associates) with the drunken" Such is the division of Christ's family, when he is about to return to take possession of his territory. The division becomes more distinct as his delay is protracted. The gulf between the parties widens as the disputation advances. One party proclaims his coming, in season and out of season, the other, never. The subject is so distasteful as not to allow him to keep his hand off of his fellow servant.

4. The elements and practices, are shown in the parable of the ten virgins. This scene transpires previous to Christ's marriage. The invited guests show the same division. Both classes profess to look for Christ's return; but they finally give up the hope, fall asleep and continue in that state till the Bridegroom heralds his approach by a swift messenger, when it will be found too late to make the necessary preparations.

Let the reader investigate these two parables, that he may fully understand their obvious import, and comprehend the intended meaning of our Savior in giving them.

5. Paul's View of Christ's Household in the Last Days.—Paul claims that his instructions came directly from Christ. His picture of the elements and practices of the professing household are quite full and distinct.

"This know, also, that in the last days perilous times shall come, for men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." 2 Tim. iii. 1-5.

"The Last Days."—This expression belongs to, and is the name of a period which describes the church as it will be when Christ returns. Such elements must produce "perilous times." How could there be any other result? Extreme selfishness is the parent of extreme sensuality. A person that begins with supreme self-love, will end in supreme self-gratification. These persons begin with the love of themselves, and close with loving pleasure more than God. There are here given nineteen traits of character, all of which are designed in their nature, to demoralize their possessors. A person cursed with such a spurious Christianity marks the return of Christ. Let us look into the general nature of these elements since our subject will require us to use them hereafter.

1. Self-Love.—Love is an element of nature. Its exercise violates no command, when not abused. We are commanded to love the Lord our God with all our heart, soul, and strength, and our neighbor as ourselves, but we are not commanded to love ourselves; this we do without a command; we also love those that love us. We are required to love enemies. Love is a Divine element when rightly exercised. It is the cohesive law of the universe—God is love in its purity—take away love and creation falls to pieces; when, however, we make self the central love of our affections, we dishonor the element, and bring on us and others painful and disastrous results.

2. Covetousness.—A heart possessed of extreme selfishness, its first act is gratification; it craves every thing—seeks after every object that will satisfy it, whether lawful or forbidden. An inordinate desire for such things as belong, generally, to others. Some persons develop it in lust and sexual indulgence, while others seek honor and wealth. In the passage above, wealth may be principally intended. Since in 1 Tim. vi. 10 we have the following: "For the love of money is the root of all evil; which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows." Covetousness is self-love's first-born, and one of the most debasing and ruinous of lusts; hence its prohibition on the tables of stone: "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, nor his man-servant, nor his maid-servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that is thy neighbor's." Covetousness begets cheating, theft and robbery. A true and devoted Christian is limited to one species of covetousness, that of the "best gifts."

3. Boasters.—This is another class in the Christian household of "the last days." It is not stated of what they boast; but, from other traits of character, it will not be difficult to conjecture. Being church members their occasions of boasting are quite numerous. They can boast of their numbers, wealth, respectability, learning, piety, and many other things. The Jews boasted over the heathen; the pharisee over the publican. Christian boasting is founded on blindness. They see not their own characters, nor the purity of the great invisible. Boasting is here anti-Christian.

4. Proud.—There is no trait of character, more offensive to the Deity, than pride, none more unreasonable; none so disastrous in its consequences. It shuts out the Divine character, and makes a god of self. It will not allow us to see others' virtues. Pride elevates, and always goes before a fall. It is, in its essence, anti-Christian, and, when it is possessed by a church member it is a sign of apostacy, since it is founded on a high opinion of self.

5. Blasphemers.—Men that speak against God, Christ or Holy Spirit. They speak against God by speaking against his providence, his judgments, or his revelation; against Christ by neglecting his atonement, and his promises; against the Holy Spirit when they ascribe his agency to Satan. The purely selfish blaspheme in a great variety of ways, by words, by actions, by omission, and even by thought. Blasphemy is the offspring of selfishness and pride. Such members will be excluded from the kingdom of God, since no one will be admitted without having clean hands and a pure heart.

6. Parental Disobedience.—The command is, "Honor thy father and thy mother; that thy days may long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." Reason is late in its development, passions, early. Youth, therefore, must be under the control of mature minds. The last day professors grow up under little or no restraint; they become fast and wise in their own conceit. They follow inclination, and sooner or later reap what they blindly sow.

7. Unthankful.—Want of gratitude—great in their own estimation—they look on blessings as the tribute of well earned merit. "Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honor of my majesty?" They know no being superior to self; they see no God behind the throne.

If they prosper, it is because of their great wisdom; if adversity overtakes them, it is attributed to the stars that are hostile and envious; it is not their fault; they have none.

8. Unholy.—Professing the name of Christ, and to follow him as their Divine guide—they turn away from his holiness. 'They hear not the injunction. "Be ye holy for I am holy." They tread the foot of the mountain with shoes on, when the Jews came only in their bare feet.

9. Without Natural Affection.—such as parents have for their children, and children have for their parents. Self-love and covetousness have dried up these fountains, and made of their hearts, an Arabian desert. Family ties give way to the love of gain, and worldly interests obscure the glories of the coming paradise.

10. Truce-Breakers.—Bargain breakers. They hold to a contract only while it is to their interest. When they can do better their word has no binding power. They are of those that would sell their master for thirty pieces of silver. This bond of society is but low.

11. False Accusers.—[illegible] devils, slanderers, spies, always seeking an occasion to injure those that stand in the way of self-gratification, called devils because they imitate their master, in his original seduction of our first parents.

12. Incontinent.—[illegible] unable to curb the appetites, intemperate, unchaste, such as know the requirements of the law but allow debasing lust to dominate.

13. Fierce.—[illegible] wild, savage, pitiless, such as intent on gain or self-gratification, have no regard for the wants and sufferings of their fellow beings.

14. Despisers of the Good.—[illegible] no lover of the good, ill-disposed, evil-minded. They work against goodness, against the good, and shun their society.

15. Traitors.—[illegible] those who betray persons, or any principle—a deserter. Having supreme love for self, they like Judas, will betray any person or cause for the sake of gain. Gain is their god.

16. Heady.—[illegible]—headlong, rash, forward, bold. Being governed by passions instead of reason, they push on without regard to consequences.

17. High Minded.—[illegible]—making a smoke, puffed up with pride. Pride, like smoke, hides the true nature of objects—being insane or foolish with pride.

18. "Lovers of Pleasure More than Lovers of God."—[illegible]—This quality is a necessary result from the seventeen.

19. Having a Form of Godliness, but Denying its Power.—By this we learn that these are attributes of church members—since they have a form of godliness, but, simply, deny its power.

The trouble you dread may never come, and if it does, its character may be so changed by the time it reaches you, that you may not dread it.

SELECTIONS.

[New Era.]

Prophecies Concerning Israel. Their Land and King, not yet Fulfilled.

Sir,—The subject of this letter, as announced in my last, is the miraculous events attendant on the future conversion and restoration of Israel. So numerous are the portions which speak of these events, that merely to put down the chapters and verses would fill a column of the New Era; their publication in full, without a word of comment, would fill many issues. Hence, in endeavoring to place this subject before your readers, the great difficulty is not the lack but the abundance of material to choose from, and the very limited space you can spare in justice to subjects of more general interest.

One of the oldest and most comprehensive of the prophecies concerning Israel and their land, wherein the blessings consequent upon their obedience, and the curses and calamities consequent upon their disobedience, were minutely foretold and truthfully, as every reader must acknowledge—is contained in Deut. xxviii. Therein (v. 1 to) their great Prophet foretold what came to pass in the days of Solomon, (1 Kings vi. 20-25), when Israel's sun was at its zenith; and therein also he forewarned them of what came upon them at the hands of the Assyrians (2 Kings xvii. 1-23) and Chaldeans (2 Kings xxiv., xxv.) and Romans, and at the hands of the Gentiles generally, in their cast-off, forsaken, scattered condition, "an astonishment, a proverb, and a by-word among all nations." Their land, too, which in Moses' day was a well-watered, fruitful land, upon which the "Lord's eyes were always, from the beginning unto the end of the year," (Deut. xi. 12), he foretold, would "be desolate, and their cities waste," (Lev. xxvi. 33), as it is at this day. "Yet, for all that," said their God, who "will not always chide," (Psa. ciii. 9), "I will not cast them away, neither will I abhor them to destroy them utterly, and to break my covenant with them, for I am the Lord their God." Compare Lev. xxvi. 44 with Rom. xi. 2-28 29.

Moses, having in Deut. xxviii. and xxix., faithfully foretold the blessing and the curse to come upon Israel, proceeds in chap. xxx. as follows: "And it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations, whither the Lord thy God hath driven thee, and shalt return unto the Lord thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day .... that then the Lord thy God will turn thy captivity (compare Jer. xxxiii. 7-26; Ezek. xxxix. 22-29) and have compassion upon thee, and will return and gather thee from all the nations whither the Lord thy God hath scattered thee. If any of thine be driven out into the outmost parts of heaven, from thence will the Lord thy God gather thee, and from thence will he fetch thee." Had God's inspired servant stopped here, some of us Gentiles, "wise in our own conceits," despite Paul's warning in Rom. xi. 25, might with some show of reason have said: "O yes; we believe Israel will be 'restored' to God's favor; the Lord will yet have compassion upon them, and remove the veil that is upon their heart, and graft them in again; they shall 'yet turn unto the Lord,' and become Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists or Evangelical Christians of some sort, not, of course, High Church or Catholics, and thus they shall become 'one nation' and God's people; but, as for becoming a literal nation in Palestine, as of old, with 'one king, king to them all,' as God by Ezekiel (xxxvii. 21, 22) and other prophets seems (!) to say we have no such carnal belief." Moses, however, as if anticipating such Gentile "conceits" and unbelief, goes on to say: "And the Lord thy God will bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed," (not into the churches, neither into Britain nor any other country than Palestine,) "and thou shalt possess it," (compare this with Ezek. xxxvi. 24-28; xlvii. 13-21; xlviii. 29,) "and he will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers." Nor does Moses stop here, with promises of restoration to the land covenanted to Abraham and to his seed, the Messiah, but goes on to foretell Israel's regeneration and consequent love of the Lord their God: "And the Lord thy God will circumcise thine heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the Lord thy God with all thine heart and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live," (v. 6.)

What a stupendous miracle will the fulfillment of that verse be! A whole nation loving the Lord their God with all their heart and soul! A nation "all righteous," (Isa. lx. 21) yielding loving obedience to their once crucified King, in whom they recognize the antitype of Joseph, sent of God to "save their lives by a great deliverance." Now "shall the times of refreshing come from the presence of the Lord!" Acts iii. 19. Now shall there be "showers of blessing" upon Israel and their land! See Ezek. xxxiv. 26. Now shall Israel be a "blessing in the midst of the earth." Isa. xix. 24, compared with Zech. viii. 13. Now shall "the remnant of Jacob be in the midst of many people as a dew from the Lord, as the showers upon the grass." Micah v. 7. Now shall there be a nation of Paul's, Peter's and John's; and "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Isa. xi. 9.

Well might our beloved Apostle Paul, of the tribe of Benjamin, say of Israel, his brethren, according to the flesh, (Rom. ix. 3): "Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness? .... If the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead?" If we Gentiles receive blessings through Israel's unbelief, how much greater blessings shall follow Israel's return unto the Lord and joyous reception by him? Let those, then, that "are the Lord's remembrancers," that call upon his name, "give him no rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth." Isa. lxii. 6, 7. Israel, cast off and afflicted, "are beloved for their father's sake." Rom. xi. 28. Their father was God's friend. See Isa. xli. 8; James ii. 23.—Omega.

Immortality.

The word "immortal" is found but once in the Bible, and the word "immortality" five times, and it is remarkable that these words occur only in the writings of Paul. This primitive missionary wrote his Epistles in the Greek characters for the instruction of his friends who spoke and understood the Greek language, and, consequently, he used words and phrases not employed by the Apostles, who wrote for the benefit of the Hebrews or Nazarenes, who used the Hebrew dialect. The ancient Hebrews had no idea of a future existence after death, except through a resurrection or "a rising again," and to only a favored few the manner in which this "rising again" was to be accomplished seems to have been but faintly understood. They knew that Jehovah had promised "the kingdom" to Abraham and his seed for ever, but they knew that Abraham was dead, and that themselves were mortal and doomed to die, and how the "sleeping ones" were again to become possessed of life was not revealed in the law, or the traditions of their fathers. Hence, as Paul shows "life" (from the dead) and "immortality" not already possessed was brought to light by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, for, as the Christ the head of the body, arose again from the dark and cheerless gloom of death, and became possessed of "immortality," which in his flesh-and-blood state he did not inherit, so in "the time of restitution" of all things" will the bodies who sleep in Christ, whose names are written in the Book of Life, come forth by a similar process, and obtain immortality, eternal life, and an inheritance in the kingdom of God, which is in preparation from the foundation of the world; for the kingdom and the greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heavens, (not above the sky) will be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, and they shall reign for ever and ever, and the King of this great and everlasting kingdom is to be Jesus, the once lowly, despised and persecuted Nazarene who, in the days of his pilgrimage, was stigmatized as the carpenter's son, "for he shall sit on the throne of his father, David, and of his kingdom there shall be no end."

But let us examine a little more closely the heading of our article. The word immortal occurs in conjunction with the words eternal and invisible in a short form of prayer which Paul uses in the following manner: "Now unto the King eternal, immortal and invisible, the only wise God, be honor and glory for ever and ever. Amen. 1 Timothy, i. 17. That God only is immortal is further proved by the testimony of the same writer, who, further on in the same epistle, speaks of God as "the King of kings, and Lord of lords, who only hath immortality dwelling in light, which no man can approach unto, whom no man hath seen or can see." 1 Tim. vi. 16.

But immortality is spoken of as obtainable by those who seek for it by a patient continuance in well-doing, Rom. ii. 7, and the manner in which immortality is to be obtained was made manifest by the appearing of Our Savior Jesus Christ, who abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." 2 Tim. i. 10. The time at which immortality will be obtained is also stated by Paul to be at "the resurrection." Behold, I show you a mystery, (something unknown before the gospel was preached) "we (the true believers) shall not all sleep" (death to the dead in Christ, is always spoken of as a sleep), but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible (body) must put on incorruption, and this mortal (body) must put on immortality. So when (time indicated) this corruptible (body) shall have put on incorruption and this mortal (body) shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory, O death, where is thy sting, O grave where is thy victory!..... thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

Thus it will been seen that the Pagano-papal dogma of the immortality of the soul is not only not countenanced in the Apostolic writings, but is positively refuted there, for, if the doctrine was true, it would have been taught by Moses and the prophets, as well as by the Pagan classics, and the body having an immortal nature within it would not need to put it on, and Jesus would not have needed to have died and rose again in order to prove the manner of obtaining "life and immortality," nor would Christ and his apostles have made the doctrine of the resurrection so prominent a feature of their preaching. If it was an unnecessary thing, which it would be if the Heathen idea of inherent immortality was true.—Wm. L. K.

[The Revealed Mystery.]

Immortality.

Immortality is deathlessness. God only has a nature in which the death principle never existed. Incorruptibility and life constitute immortality; so that immortality may be defined life manifested through an incorruptible body. A diamond is incorruptible, but not living; therefore, it is not immortal. Paganism defines immortality to be a particle of Divine effluence in all men, hereditarily transmitted, and having personality and consciousness after death! The Scriptures, however, reveal no such conceit. The immortality they bring to light is, "life and incorruptibility through the Gospel;" or eternal life through the Christ Name. Immortality is promised only to those who are justified by the name of Jesus; and, being justified, walk worthy of the name. In being introduced "into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit," a right-minded believer of the truth obtains "a right to the tree of life, and to an entrance through the gates into the city," or kingdom of God.

Forgiveness.

The following beautiful passage is from the pen of John G. Whittier one of the most eminent of American poets, Mr. W. is a member of the society of Friends or Quakers, who have ever been noted as a peace loving, and upright people.

"My heart was heavy, for its trust had been abused, its kindness answered with foul wrong—so turning gloomily from my fellow-men, one summer Sabbath day, I strolled among the green mounds of the village burial-place; where pondering where all human love and hate find one sad level, and how, soon or late, wronged and wrong-doer, each with meekened face and cold hands over a still heart, pass the green threshold of our common grave, whither all footsteps tend—whence none depart. Awed for myself, and pitying my race, our common sorrow like a mighty wave swept all my pride away, and, trembling, I forgave."

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JULY 14, 1880.

WAR clouds gather over the distant east. A conflict between Turkey and Greece seems imminent. History is rapidly filling up the lineaments of prophecy. The near future is eventful. We will take the utmost care to keep our readers posted in the grand moves of events. THE RESTITUTION has not completed its mission.

WE have not as yet found the time to read Bro. J. A. Wilson's "Thrilling Story of the Rebellion." Will read our brother's narrative of sufferings in the scenes of internecine strife in one of the most calamitous fratricidal wars. The distressing records of the sufferings of individuals and nations cause us to long for Christ's reign of peace over a universal brotherhood of nations.

WE have only found time to read a few chapters of Dr. Hitch's book entitled Christ Yet to Come. It is a neat volume of about two hundred pages, published by the American Millennial Association, 71 Kneeland Street, Boston, Mass. Price $1—in cloth, and 75 cents in paper covers. We are much pleased with that part of the work we have read. It thoroughly refutes some popular errors on the Parousia of Christ.

THE Egyptian Pyramids; an analysis of A Great Mystery, is the title of a compact, though admirably full and instructive work on the most stupendous monumental wonder ever erected by human hands. The author, E. W. Fish, M. D., has carefully localized the scattered rays of light that have reached our times through the shadows that hide a perfect history of this Miracle in Stone, whose erection antedates the rise, glory, and overthrow of those mighty empires whose records were written in languages that ceased to be spoken two thousand years ago. We have only space to say that this volume is well calculated to supply the general reader with a very comprehensive knowledge of the symbolized science contained in the construction of this majestic pile of wonders. The volume is fully illustrated. Price $1. Address the author, 150 Monroe Street, Chicago, Ill.

The following extracts from our exchanges will present our readers with an account of some incidents connected with the present and past events in the life of a noted atheist. How far Socinian creeds and Pharisaic exclusiveness may be responsible for the mad infidelity of both Ingersoll and Bradlaugh is known only to him by whom the heart and actions of men are scrutinized.

The British Government has espoused the cause of Mr. Bradlaugh, the Atheist member of Parliament, Mr. Gladstone himself urging the House of Commons to allow him to make an affirmation instead of taking the usual oath. Considerable pressure was put on the liberal members to induce them to vote as Mr. Gladstone desired and on July 1st, the house rescinded its former decision, and Mr. Bradlaugh was allowed to take his seat.

A letter to the London Standard, by a gentleman having an extensive acquaintance with Indian affairs, states that the idea is now beginning to be current in India, that Mr. Bradlaugh's views are gaining ground in society and that England is abandoning Christianity. The effect of this impression will be to inflict a serious blow to the cause of all those missions in India in which the various Christian bodies are interested—a blow from which they will not recover for many years.

(New York Times.)

CHARLES BRADLAUGH.—SOMETHING ABOUT HIS EARLY LIFE.

Mr. Charles Bradlaugh's preference of an affirmation instead of an oath in the house of commons was thoroughly characteristic of him, and the faithful following out of his early antecedents. In his sixteenth year he was a model young Christian, an enthusiastic Sunday-school teacher, and a promising member of the church of England, but when the Bishop of London was announced to hold a confirmation in Bethnal Green, the incumbent of St. Peter's Hockney road in an evil hour requested his youthful Sunday-school teacher to be prepared with suitable answers to any question which the Bishop might put in regard to the thirty-nine articles. This led young Bradlaugh to compare the articles with the gospels, and, on coming across the difficulties, to address a respectful note to his clergyman in order that he might see his way through them. The incumbent, instead of helping the boy out of his troubles, informed his parents that their son had turned atheist, and suspended him for three months from the exercise of his functions as Sunday-school teacher. Young Bradlaugh refused to attend church during the interval of his suspension as teacher, and soon began to spend his Sundays elsewhere and otherwise. It was the time of the Chartist movement, when thought was at a ferment both in and out of Freedom, and Charles Bradlaugh was soon a regular out-of-door disputant in Bonner's Fields, a suburb of the city, at first on the orthodox Christian side, then as a deist, then as a full-fledged atheist.

The next step in his career was to become a teetotaler. The crisis of his life now came. The incumbent of St. Peter's had laid the case of young Bradlaugh before the firm of coal merchants by whom he had been employed, and they gave him three days to change his opinions or lose his situation. He gave up both "beer and the Bible," and started out upon his father's house a social outcast, being reduced to such straits in his seventeenth year that he enlisted in the Seventh Dragoon Guards, and served with his regiment three years in Ireland. Inheriting from his aunt, in 1853, a small property, he bought his discharge from the army and began his studies for the bar, lecturing frequently before free-thought institutions, and taking radical grounds on every question that came up. In 1862 he compelled an Anglican clergyman to pay $100 and the costs in a suit for libel affecting his wife and daughters, and yet withhold the name of his assailant from the public, in order that the priest might not be degraded from his office. His recent preference of the declaration to the oath in the House of Commons is of a piece with his early questionings, and the Church of England has to thank a blundering clergyman for the radicalism of one who knows how to hit hard, and whose position among the British Radicals is one of unquestioned power. Mr. Bradlaugh is now in his 45th year.

Prophecy and Fulfillment.

PROPHECY.

And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared. Rev. xvi. 12.

FULFILLMENT.

The condition of Turkey is considered hopeless even by Sir A. H. Layard, the ex-Minister of Great Britain to that country, who was prior to his residence at Constantinople, a firm believer in the good intentions of the Sultan. In a recent letter he said, "Never perhaps was this Empire in so disorganized and critical a state; everywhere are misgovernment, corruption, incompetency of the Turkish functionaries; everywhere Mussulmans and Christians suffer alike." Sir A. H. Layard says he has tried expostulation with the Sultan, and even "menaces;" and he advises the English Government, "If it is in earnest in wishing to save Turkey and reform its administration, so that its people may be justly governed, it must be prepared to go further than mere menaces." He further states, "There is little or no protection for life and property in Macedonia, Epirus, and Thessaly. Brigandage is rife, the Christians are ill-treated and oppressed with impunity, and the state of these provinces is bordering on anarchy."

LAST DAYS OF ISLAMISM.

A traveller among the mountains of Asia Minor, who had pitched his tent in the province of Cicilia, was surprised, the other day, by a poor, ignorant Turkish woman coming up to his tent door and asking him if it was really true that the Day of Judgment was near. "On questioning her," he writes, "as to her reasons for making such an inquiry, I found that she had heard the villagers especially the leading men, express the opinion that the last days of Islamism had come, and that the whole world is about to be judged for its wickedness. To-day I had a long conversation with a Turkish cadi, or judge, the drift of whose conversation took the same direction. These two persons represent the extremes of society among the Turks, yet they are agreed as to the decadence, and probable collapse of the Turkish power. A large majority of the Turks are despondent. Their despondency is rather increased, than otherwise, by seeing their Christian neighbors hopeful, and increasing in prosperity. The Christians are looking in all directions to see what they can do to prepare themselves and their children for the new era that seems to be dawning upon them."—London Sunday at Home.

A curious feature of the creeks and lagoons of Northern Queenstown is mentioned. It is called "floating grass." It grows on the surface of the water, putting forth stems and roots which become so densely interwoven that, even with twenty feet of water underneath, horses have been known to cross on the mats thus formed.

Faith and Works.

There is, it seems, in the minds of many, a difficulty in understanding the nature and relation of faith and works. From many passages it would appear that faith in and of itself saves alone, that "faith without works is dead." The trouble is just here. It lies in confounding, by assent to the word of truth, with our being faith that must of necessity include works of obedience. "Faith worketh by love and purifieth the heart." Grace is not of the works of the law—see Rom. xi. 6. It has come to the elect, who hear, see, believe, who stand by faith, who continue in the goodness of God. Confession must be made with the mouth of the word of faith. To have faith made alive, we must be obedient to the faith. We must be made free from the law of sin and of death, be married to him who is raised from the dead. It is true, we believe into Christ, but believe into him only by an OBEDIENT faith.

If the blood of Christ cleanses us from all sin, that we believe it, we will come to the blood. As soon as we are persuaded of the truth of the Gospel of the kingdom, and fear to get into that kingdom, atonement by blood has been made, and to receive atonement, must come to Christ's death. In baptism, will not tarry, but will raise the same hour of the night and be baptized. God has not separated faith and works, let both go together.

SELECTIONS.

Turkey's Sick-Bed.

The "sick man" has fallen so low with the decease of his religious faith and his unreligious practices, his squandering of the money wrung from the poor people who unfortunately are his subjects, while the obligations of his government are ignored or neglected. In this he is so low on a political couch that it resembles a death-bed, and he a corpse—that the signatory powers have found it necessary to come to an understanding in his case, and they have agreed upon a meeting of their representatives to make a political diagnosis of the case, and prescribe a balm for the cure. Turkey is politically sick—very sick. She has neither money nor credit, neither the power to pay her debts, nor apparently the desire to do so. She would not exist to-day as a power in Europe had not the signatory powers intervened just as Russia was hammering away at the gates of Constantinople. Jealousy of Russia saved Turkey. In a month or two more, if not interfered with, Russia would have blotted the name of Turkey from the map of Europe, as it should have been. But she was saved, upon condition of performing certain stipulations, which she agreed to fulfill, and which she immediately determined not to fulfill, and has not.

She has not kept faith with Greece, nor Montenegro, nor with any other power. And she fails in all her professed purposes. Without money and without credit, the business of her Sultan is to squander money obtained by any possible means, to maintain his seraglio in splendor, while his subjects starve; and his pashas use their opportunities and their authority to grow rich by their system of enforced collection of taxes. Germany, which has been holding back, has at length agreed to hold a conference in common with the other signatory powers, but requiring that a definite programme shall be prepared before the conference takes place. Then will be the conference which shall hold its consultation over the "sick man." And they agreed beforehand that what they decide upon must be done, and, if military force shall be required in Turkey to ensure the carrying out of the work they agreed upon as necessary, each of the plenary powers must furnish its complement. Turkey, most likely, will ere long furnish a repetition of the dismemberment of Poland. Nothing but the mutual jealousies of several of the powers can prevent this result. Turkey is doomed, and civilization has no reason to sorrow over it.

What is Your Motive?

It is specially worthy of remark that love to God is the only motive which he acknowledges as rendering any service acceptable to him; and that such love surpasses all other homage in his sight.

The intense love and devotion which breathes through David's psalms gave him the wonderful title of "the man according to God's own heart," notwithstanding his exceedingly faulty character and life. The same thing is seen in the case of the sinful woman, who washed the Savior's feet with her tears. Her deep penitence and passionate love were far more acceptable to Jesus than all the costly hospitalities and high character of Simon the Pharisee. The parable of the prodigal son teaches the same lesson, namely, that sincere humble penitence and warm affections induce much more sympathy in the parental heart than the most correct behavior without any special filial love.

The most striking instance of the high value the Lord places upon love, is his incomparable commendation of the woman who broke a box of exceedingly precious ointment in order to pour it upon his head. This act, which was one of foolish and reprehensible waste in the eyes of the mere worldling, is characterized by Christ as exceedingly valuable in his estimation as being the manifestation of intense love for him.

Similar lessons may be drawn from other portions of the Divine Word all showing a deep longing of with reverence we may so speak, on the part of the Lord himself for the love of those he has redeemed.

Adam was made in God's image that he might appreciate his Creator's goodness and return intelligent love and praise; and redemption restores the believer to the high position in this respect which Adam lost.

In this view of our relations to the Lord we may regard him as asking all who aspire to render him service. What is your motive? Is it, he says, "Love to me and to your fellow-men for my sake?" Did you build this college, or hospital, or church, for love of me? Did you make that large donation to a missionary society or a charitable fund from love to me? Do you preach your sermon as those women offered their ointments out of an intense longing to manifest the love you have to me, or was there any other motive in all those services? Do you wish to be seen and admired of men in them, or to have your name perpetuated as a benefactor, or do you give out of emulation to do as well as or better than some other men, or did you regard the promise that God would repay all charitable gifts as to be understood literally, and expect your store to be ultimately increased instead of diminished on account of your investment in Christ's cause?

When a man loses a much-beloved wife, son or daughter, he sometimes, out of the intensity of his love, founds a religious or charitable institution bearing the name of the deceased. In this case, his love for the lost one is much greater than his love for Christ. With all our gifts to Christ's cause, is love to him the prominent motive in giving?

Unless those who make sacrifices for such objects can reply to the question, "What is your motive?" is there not danger that their real position may be that pointed out by the Apostle Paul, when he said: "Though I speak with the tongues of men and angels and have not love, I am become as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal; and though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not love, it profiteth nothing."

The parting questions which our Lord asked of Simon Peter should sink deep into the heart of every disciple, "Lovest thou me?" "Lovest thou me?" "Lovest thou me more than these?"

God's Providence.

"Everything relating to the physical and moral universe is under the eye, and moves obedient to the will of God. God's hand is visible in all things: to him all things must be ascribed, or else to nothing. A Providence controlling the affairs of the empires, and those of individuals; or of the great things, and not of the least things also, is impossible. The history of the world shows that most momentous results often depend on causes too insignificant to arrest the reader's attention, unless especially awakened. The telescope and the microscope furnish proof both of the magnitude of God's universe, and of his care for the minutest of his creatures. We cannot always explain the mystery of his dealings with us; but we know that all things work together for good to them that love God;' and that the ordeal through which we are called to pass, however severe, will in the issue be glorious. The assurance of this faith enables the possessor to bear the cross, and to walk with Christ-like patience, till we clearly see and understand and can say: God knew best."—Rev. O. M. Howe, Princeton, Mass.

Law in Nature.

There is a thing in these days much talked about which is called Law. Law is not a force or a power, much less a god; it is only a steady, strictly moderated method of operation; not a deed much less the cause of a deed, but only a way of doing; the sure procedure of the self-existent, self-consistent and self-persistent working Reason which shapes forth the universe; a method of operation to which we willingly pay all reasonable homage, addressing it in the words of the poet:—

"Thou canst preserve the stars from wrong;
And the most ancient heavens, through Thee are fresh and strong."

And what the omnipresent, ever-working reason of God does in the universe by the calm process of regulated work which we call law, even this thing, it is the problem of our human life to believe by the formation of which we call character. Character, said Novalis, is a perfectly trained will, and a perfectly trained will is only a well-calculated and a well-regulated working power. The excessive thought put forth to-day, as it is generally the offspring of laziness yesterday, so it is sure to end in laziness to-morrow. "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." But how? Not with much observation and blare of trumpets, but like the seed that swells beneath the soil with an increase which no eye can measure when it is doing, but all must admire when it is done.—Prof. Blackie.

Increase of Mohammedanism.

Dr. Dollinger, in the Contemporary Review gives a remarkable account of the revival of the Arabian religion, which is extending itself almost as rapidly and vigorously, by the peaceful methods of persuasion, as formerly by the sword. In Africa, it advances like a torrent. In Sierra Leone, there is a Moslem high school with 1,500 pupils, and in China and Java, the conversions are immense.

Dr. Dollinger assigns as one of the chief causes of this astonishing revival, "the facility afforded by steam navigation for the pilgrims to Mecca; for, the numerous pilgrims or Hadjis, who return from thence, become as a rule, zealous missionaries of the Prophet." "Moreover," he adds, "in Eastern Asia and Africa, as everywhere, Islam, has one important advantage over the Christian churches, from its knowing nothing of any sharp distinction between the clergy and laity; so that, every Moslem feels bound to take part in the conversion of unbelievers, while Christians are accustomed to treat mission work as an affair of the clergy."

The editor of the Prophetic News, remarks, would it not seem as though all the great powers which have affected the world for good or evil, were being summoned once more to take part in the last great conflict now so rapidly approaching?

Coming Again.

The ascension of Christ is interwoven with an angelic promise that he will come again. No words could possibly be plainer than the message which angels brought to those grieving hearts of the little group on Olivet. "This same Jesus shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." And this message is in perfect harmony with the repeated utterances of of our Lord before his crucifixion. I have no theory upon the subject. I am satisfied with the simple Word of God, and am willing to leave the theorizing to others—more than satisfied with the stupendous, glorious fact that he is coming to crush Satan and death under his feet; coming to claim his own, who will be caught up to meet him in the air; coming to reign on earth as in heaven; coming to make earth a heaven below. Do you ask, When is he coming? He has expressly told us that we are not to know this, but we are to expect him every day and hour, and this is to be the inspiration of earnest toil and patient waiting. He is coming, and he may come to-day. Do you ask, How is he coming? I only know so far as the angels has told us, "In like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." The cloud of glory will form his stairway earthward, as it once was his stairway heavenward.—E. A. Ellsredge.

The Folly of Human Creeds.

It has not pleased God to declare his truth to men in the form of creeds and confessions and catechisms. It has come to us in histories and biographies in psalms and prophecies, in proverbs and parables scattered over the pages of many authors, and in works written with the usual variety of human taste and talent. It has not come to us in the form which human reason would have anticipated as the least likely to give rise to misapprehension and division. In this, as in other things, God's ways are not as our ways. But in the study of God's ways there always shines forth the evidence of a Divine and heavenly wisdom. The Scriptures from their very variety are suited to gain access into men's minds, however differently constituted. A mind which result from abstract truth may be won by the charm of a narrative in which the truth is embodied. . . . There is this peculiar disadvantage in respect of all creeds, that whoever heartily adopts any of them is thenceforth too often and too much disposed to interpret Scripture in conformity with his system, rather than to correct his system by a just interpretation of Scripture. From a Sermon by Dr. Cook, in Free Church.

BREVITIES.

M. Jules Ferry, the French Minister who introduced the bill for the expulsion of the Jesuits from France, is the direct descendant of a man who, 126 years ago, established several houses of the same order in that country. M. Ferry's ancestor having lost his wife, joined the order of the Jesuits' college at Rome, was ordained a priest. He returned to France one of the most ardent followers of St. Ignatius. His name was also Jules. The present minister is the great-grandson of the son that this reverend father had had before he embraced the monastic career.

Probably the oldest paid teacher of youth in the world is the German Government school-master of Heringen, in the province of Limburg, one Abraham Levi Bickatein, who recently completed the sixtieth year of his activity as a pedagogue and the hundred and fourth year of his age. The son of a Jewish rabbi, he fought gallantly as a volunteer through the war of emancipation, and at its conclusion entered the Hissen High School as a student of theology. There he went through the customary curriculum, and having passed his examinations, applied for a subordinate appointment in the Educational Department, which he speedily obtained, and has held from the year 1800 to the present day. His salary only amounts to the modest sum of 120 marks, or about thirty dollars per annum.

In Nazareth, the place which our Savior chose for his earthly home, the Female Education Society of England have established an orphanage. It has been opened four years, and there are in it now thirty-six girls, of ages varying from four to fifteen. Here, whether of Greek or Latin, Moslem or Jewish parentage, they are all taught to love the one true God, and Jesus Christ whom he has sent. They have a beautiful home built by the generosity of English travelers, and during the four years it has been opened no case of illness requiring a doctor has occurred. This orphanage stands high up in the dear old Galilean hills, with large, open arms, saying, in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, "Suffer the little children to come unto Me."

A GIGANTIC FLOWER.

Sumatra carries away the palm in producing a plant whose bloom surpasses all others in size. Signor E. Beccari, an Italian, has given to this plant the name of Conophallus Titanum. Its flowers completely obscure the blossom of the Victoria Regia. According to the published description of this plant, the swell of the spathe is thirty-two and a half inches in diameter, and the naked portions of the spadix measure no less than five and one half feet. The color of the spathe is a brownish purple-red, and that of the spadix a dirty yellow, as is generally the case with flowers which, like the Canophallus and the Rafflesia, attract, by their peculiar odor, insects and animals feeding on carrion. The tuft of this plant, of which, at first, Beccari only succeeded in finding one specimen, was three and one-eighth feet in circumference, and so heavy that two strong men could scarcely manage to carry it; its single leaf had a stalk ten and one-half feet long, and thirty-four inches in circumference at its base. The leaf stem is smooth, green, and thickly covered with circular white spots. The three branches into which this stem divided at its upper end were as thick as a man's leg, and by repeated subdivisions form a spread over eight feet long, supporting a leaf whose superficial surface exceeds fifteen square yards. The stalk of the fruit is about the same thickness as the leaf stem, and in the example found by Beccari the fruit-bearing portion of it was twenty inches long by thirty inches in circumference, and thickly covered with olive-shaped fruit of a reddish color.

A FOSSIL FOREST.

An interesting discovery has been made at Edge Lane Quarry, Oldham, England. The quarrymen, in the course of their excavations, have come upon what has been described as a fossil forest. The trees number about twelve, and some of them are two feet in diameter. They are in good preservation. The roots can be seen interlacing the rock, and the fronds of the ferns are to be found imprinted on every piece of stone. The discovery has excited much interest in geological circles round Manchester, and the "forest" has been visited by a large number of persons. The trees belong to the middle coal measure period, although it has been regarded as somewhat remarkable that no coal has been discovered near them. The coal is found about two hundred and fifty yards beneath. Prof. Boyd-Dawkins, of Owens College, has visited the quarry, and declares that there is not such a sight in Europe.

POETRY.

Weary and Faint.

The day is hot, and I am faint and weary,
Oer burdened by the labor and the heat,
The way is rough and overgrown and dreary,
And thick beset with thorns that pierce my feet.

I fain would rest me in the pleasant meadows
And near cool waters which are gliding by:
But still press on through sunshine and the shadows,
With fevered frame and hot lips parched and dry.

What is my recompence? Why should I bear it,
Nor stop to lay my heavy burden down?
The day grows late, I may no longer bear it,
Along the pathway desolate and brown.

I hear in other paths the wild birds singing;
See happy pilgrims loiter on the banks;
In verdant fields I watch the bright flowers springing,
And catch the laughter from the careless ranks.

Nor may I stay. Why is my pathway narrow?
It leads through darkness from the sight of joy.
It bears no song; no twitter of a sparrow
Breaks on the silence. Can it end in light?

Oh, dreadful road! Wide are thy paths of danger!
And straight and barren that in which you travel;
But by Him loved, who was on earth a stranger,
Weary and faint, your footsteps still are led.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Luke XIV. 18.

"And they all began to make excuse. The first said unto him, I have bought a piece of ground, and I must needs go and see it; I pray thee have me excused. And another said, I have bought five yoke of oxen, and I go to prove them; I pray thee have me excused. And another said, I have married a wife, and therefore I cannot come."

With nine-tenths of professing Christians these excuses far outweigh the consideration of the kingdom of God and the gift of eternal life through Jesus the life-giver. How benevolent; how free and how strongly impregnated with the love of God are the offers of salvation through a crucified Redeemer! The manner of God's love to poor, fallen man, can only be understood in the gift of his Son. How precious those heavenly words, God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but might have everlasting life! How painfully amusing are the excuses men make to evade the requirements of the gospel! Those named in our heading are a fair sample of the thousand and one that we hear in our intercourse with men; yea, how weak, how frivolous, and how wanting in good common sense, when we realize what God proposes to do for the children of men through his Son, the Savior of the world! What argument can we use, or what motives can we set before the men of this generation to induce them to look at and to consider their own best interest, yea, their eternal life? The boon or gift of eternal life is beyond all estimate or calculation. Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath, will he give for his life (the adversary, yet true); yet how persistently, yea, how knowingly and how wittingly do men reject the great salvation! Take the Hebrew nation and church for example. It is no wonder that Jesus wept over their city, temple and hierarchy, when, with his prophetic vision, he spanned the times of the Gentiles—the length of their dispersion, degradation and suffering. All this for their willful rejection of God's dear Son. How sarcastic! How cutting that saying in his parable, "This is the heir; come, let us kill him; let us seize on the inheritance." No more strange, no more wicked, and no more ungrateful was the conduct of the Jews than that of the Gentiles of our own day. The Jews had an abundance of light as to the Messiahship of Jesus of Nazareth, and were left without excuse. They killed the Prince of life, lost the first dominion—as in the parable—had to take with shame a lower seat. With what shamefulness must the Gentiles of the gospel age meet the judge of quick and dead! They have all the light the Jews had with the increasing light of the gospel age. Well and truly did Christ say, the men of Nineveh shall rise up in the judgment and condemn the men of that age. How much more culpable the men of the present generation, who have all the light of the past 6,000 years, with the full, unmistakable light and signs of the close of the times of the Gentiles, and the ushering in the day of God, day of judgment, day or age of restitution—the day of millennial glory. Oh, for an angel's trumpet to sound out the good news of the kingdom of God!

How very strange it is that many who a few years or months ago were all alive in the interest of our soon-coming Lord, whose pens and tongues are still and silent! Are they not virtually saying, "I have gone into business which pays better than preaching an unpopular gospel? I pray thee have me excused; don't be too severe; you don't expect we are going to let our families suffer. No, we do not." There are but rare cases where we cannot find time to write a few lines for the comfort and encouragement of the poor pilgrims. We know what it is to be poor in this world's goods; yes, and we know full well what it is to preach an unpopular gospel for a decade without fee or reward from any man, to have our names cast out as evil, and be dragged before Cæsars bar for preaching heresy, as we now feel it must be something more than all this to silence our pen or tongue from giving the last word of warning to a perishing world, or pray Lord, have me excused.

Lovely spring has returned; nature has put on her finest and most beautiful dress. It does look splendid; the air is balmy and invigorating; the old almost feel young; the young are elated and exchange congratulations, are making arrangements for social pleasure and enjoyment. Many are going to Europe, many to the mountains and to the springs, and anticipating a good time. We really hope you may realize your desires, but we dare not encourage, no, not for a moment. The Master's injunction is, "Watch; for in such an hour as ye think not of the Son of Man cometh." Hark! do you hear that roaring, rushing hurricane; that fearful tornado? God is speaking. Behold, the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. Oh, my dear brethren, do you want to be excused from the glory and joy of beholding the King in his beauty and sharing or having an eternal home in God's kingdom? Gird on the armor afresh, trim your lamps, fill your vessels with pure oil, quit yourselves like men. But what shall we say to the foolish virgins and the many who are saying, "my Lord delayeth his coming, and are eating and drinking with the drunken; and are smiting their fellow servants?" What a fearful condition to be found in, when the voice of the archangel shall sound, "Awake, ye sleeping saints, and with the righteous living arise to meet the Lord in the air!" What a thrilling announcement for the poor, despised followers of the meek and lowly Jesus! The struggle is over; the weary forever at rest. Dearly beloved, have we a realizing sense that the things we are trying to set forth are about to break forth upon our astonished vision? If so, how can we sleep or be engrossed in the things of the world to the neglect of sounding the last word of warning to our perishing fellow men?

The text we have written the foregoing upon is a part of our Lord's parable of the great Supper. We ask a few questions in relation to the parable.

1. What is the scope of the parable? Does it cover or span the gospel age only, or does it reach back into the prophetic or Jewish age; or does it reach forward into the age to come? Who are the servants? When was, or when is the Supper-time? What are the lanes and streets? What the highways and hedges; and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled; "For I say unto you that none of those men which were bidden shall taste of my Supper?" We do not feel qualified or able to give an exposition of the parable, and shall only say a few things in relation to it that seem clear to our mind. Among the things most prominently set forth in our Lord's teaching by parables are his Messiahship as predicted by the prophets.

2. The Jews, their past, present and future history and condition.

3. The call of the Gentiles—the gospel age called the times of the Gentiles—a time or age for taking out a people for God's name. Acts xv. There was nothing so disdainful and so cutting to the Jew as our Lord's reference to himself being their Messiah or their King in his noble confession before Pilate, and in his parable,—"This is the heir; come, let us kill him," etc. In his parable of the Nobleman going into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return, these clearly prove the point that he made frequent reference to himself in his teaching. As to the Jews, they were often, and pointedly referred to in his parables. The rich man and Lazarus, the prodigal son, these two have not only reference to the Jew, but to the Gentile also.

Much more proof, clear and positive, might be adduced to show that Jesus of Nazareth was God's Messiah whom the Jews were looking for, to come and deliver the Hebrew nation from the Roman yoke; but they stumbled and fell; through unbelief were broken off that the Gentiles might be grafted in and become fellow heirs (through faith) of the kingdom of God—made a great supper and bade many, if this, as many believe, symbolizes the gospel age, which began 1880 years ago, and spans the times of the Gentiles down to the second coming of Christ, the resurrection of the dead and the setting up of the kingdom. What are we to understand by the expression at supper-time? We confess not to be an adept at expounding parables, figures or symbols. Supper-time is at the close or evening portion of the day. Our Lord, in his explanation of his parable of the wheat and the tares, represents it under the figure of the harvest which he locates at the end of the age. May not supper-time more properly be the time of the end, as spoken of by Daniel when God's servants are commanded to go out into the high-ways and hedges, and compel them to come in, that God's house may be filled? A poor time for the servants. I pray thee have me excused. You can be excused if you really wish it, but you will have to sit down at the second table. There are two suppers named in Revelations xix. You can have your choice, at which you will be a guest. There is a slight difference between the two. One is the marriage supper of the Lamb; the guests are there by invitation; they have accepted the offers of salvation; have washed their robes, made them clean in the blood of the Lamb. These compose the Bride, the Lamb's wife. Do you want to be excused from participating with that company of the holy, the pure and the good. Again, we say, you can have your choice. Join in the cry, "My Lord delayeth his coming." Hug your gold and greenbacks; nurse your covetousness; say to your soul, "Thou hast much goods laid up in store; eat, drink and be merry. Thou fool, this night shall thy soul (life) be required of thee; for in such an hour as ye think not of the Son of Man cometh." The other is denominated the Supper of the great God. Rev. xix 17, 18; Ezek. xxxix. 17, 18. In these two passages the reading is almost the same. What a vivid and fearful contrast between the two gatherings, and between the two suppers! What tongue can tell, or what pen can describe the ineffable glory and joy of the one, or describe the horror, the shame and everlasting contempt of the other? These scenes are located in the evening-time, or at the close of the gospel age. Oh, my dear brethren of the One Faith, could you enter into and participate in a relying sense of the opening scenes of the day of God as they thrill and electrify the writer while he is trying to set them forth to your understanding, I am sure you would never again say, "I pray thee have me excused." There is much more that might be said upon this subject, but we must forbear. Our article is much longer than we intended when we began.

THE BENEDICTION.

Be admonished, oh, ye servants of the Most High God; quit yourselves like men. See well to it that your hands are clean, your hearts pure, and your garments unspotted from the world. God has a high and holy position for such to fill in the kingdom. Remember it will be the tried, the purified, and those made white and clean through the blood of the Lamb. May the choicest of heaven's blessings rest upon and abide with you till the Master shall come and give you an honorable discharge, with the happy applaudit, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." NEWELL BOND.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Editor Restitution:—As saith the Psalmist, Fools because of their transgression and because of their iniquities afflict themselves.

Their soul abhoreth all manner of meat and they draw near unto the gates of death. Then they cry unto the Lord in their troubles.

This is my experience since the last of April; not being able to write myself I engage the services of my son.

I have suffered in mind as well as in heart, and have found it difficult to respond to the Divine will as I desired. I thought with pleasure of mingling among the brotherhood and of being spared to circulate pearls and do good to the household of faith.

Praise the Lord, that it may yet be (D. V.) that even in 1883. The Master will come when he gets ready, and therefore be sober and watch unto prayer.

CHRISTADELPHIAN.

Conference Report of Iowa.

Without going into detail of the work of day by day, the meeting was called to order by the Chairman C. R. Chown; and as the secretary was absent, A. J. Ferguson, of Marysville, was chosen pro tem, and delegates from Lester, Hudson and Waterloo, Blackhawk county, Marysville, Benton county, Irving, Land county, Newell, Sunnyside county, and Dresden, Fowkick county, were reported present.

Six dollars were raised and paid over to C. M. Myers for tent expenses for the past year. C. M. Myers reported twenty dollars of missionary money on old subscriptions collected and expended and two baptized as the result of the same. Also the subscription papers returned. He also reported the congregations for which he is laboring, Dresden, Gifford, Timber Creek and Marysville, to be in good order and free from discussions of all kinds. The chairman is to appoint the place of the annual meeting, which is to convene on Thursday, Oct. 14th, 1880.

The preaching was done by T. P. Whitesitt of Newell, Sunnysista county, Wm. Brayton, of Hudson, Blackhawk county, and G. M. Myers, of Belle Plaine. The result of our meeting was five additions, three of which were baptized, and all were strengthened. A. J. FERGASON.

SENTENTIOUS PARAGRAPHS.

Great things are not accomplished by idle dreams, but by years of patient study.

However things may seem, no evil thing succeeds, and no good thing is a failure.

When science has at last completed her appropriate and noble work, she will be found in perfect harmony with the Bible. Believers can afford to wait for the coming of that day.

The mystery of the untried days
I close my eyes from reading;
His will be done whose darkest ways
To light and life are leading!
—John Greenleaf Whittier.

Outward actions can never give a just estimate of us, since there are many perfections of a man which are not capable of appearing in actions.

It is a man's relations to his God that must adjust and determine his relations to his fellow-creatures. The symmetrical position of the points in the circumference arises from their common relation to a common centre. Set a man right with God, and he will certainly be set right with his neighbors.

Truth is always consistent with itself and needs nothing to help it out. It is always near at hand, sits upon our lips, and is ready to drop out before we are aware. A lie is troublesome, and sets a man's invention on the rack, and one trick needs a great many more to make it good. It is building upon a false foundation, which continually stands in need of props to shore it up; and proves at last more chargeable than to have raised a substantial building at first upon a true and solid foundation.—Addison.

THE LIGHT LIES AHEAD.

We walked to-day under the shadow of the mountains, where the sun no longer shone upon our path. But far up the valley, beyond the range of hills, the sunlight still flooded the landscape. We were reminded how often in this life, we walk through vales where some sorrow, for the time, casts its shadows over us, but beyond, the eye of faith sees the light of hope shine across the way, and we have but to go forward that we may escape the shadow and chill which would fall upon us with increasing power if we were to linger in the old places where trouble found us. They who go forward find the openings where the sunshine lies.

From the stars of heaven and the flowers of earth:
From the pageant of power and the voice of mirth;
From the rabbi of the morn on the mountain brow;
From childhood's song and affection's vow;
From all save eternity's endless day,
There breathes but one record—"passing away."

It is grand to worship God amid the aisles of nature's majestic cathedral—sublime to stand upon the mountain top, and let the delighted eye wander over valley and plain mapped out in glowing beauty, and burning with the blushes of summer. It is sweet to roam through the murmuring woods, and beneath the shadow of some giant oak, spend an hour of soul-reflection and spirit-thankfulness, holding silent communion with things unseen, and catching, as it were, a few faint, tremulous rays streaming earthward from the Aiden yet to come.

THE CARE OF GOD.

There is an Eye that never sleeps
Beneath the wing of night;
There is an Ear that never shuts
When sink the beams of light.

There is an Arm that never tires
When human strength gives way;
There is a Love that never fails
When earthly joys decay.

That Eye is fixed on seraph thrones;
That Ear is filled with angel's songs;
That Arm upholds the worlds on high;
That love is throned beyond the sky.
—Bishop Heber.

A reviewer in the Jüdische Berliner, writing of Huxley's book on the Crayfish, defines the status of the evolution discussion in the following terse paragraph: "It is somewhat remarkable that a man so keen and clear-headed as Prof. Huxley can think to settle the origin of all things by merely pushing the difficulty of transformation from the non-living elements to living organisms back a few millions of years. A miracle differs from ordinary phenomena, not in degree but in kind. Granted a force able to transform one atom of inorganic matter into a living germ, and we have a God capable of creating a universe. With all his brilliancy of intellect and power of logical thought, Prof. Huxley can believe that somehow, in some infinite distance of time, by a fortuitous combination of force and matter, some fragment of inorganic matter became endued with life, which was by the action of blind force, developed into the well ordered system of the organic world, and yet he scoffs at the absurdity of the belief that Will the one uncorrelated force of which we know, should have anything to do with that or any other transformation. Truly, the faith that science demands puts to shame the faith of religion."

British Possessions.

Here is a birdseye view of them: England holds Gibraltar, Malta, and Cyprus; controls the navigation of the Suez Canal and the Red Sea; holds Aden on the south coast of Arabia; the whole of India, with three hundred millions of people, with whom forty-one millions are Mohammedan; Singapore and Hong-Kong; the Island world of Australia, New Zealand, Cape Colony, Natal, the Transvaal, and Sierra Leone; and to-day colonies of Anglo-Saxon Christian men are pushing their way inward from the eastern coast of Africa to that great lake region of Central Africa discovered by Burton, Speke, Baker, Livingstone, and Stanley. And not only does British power encircle Islam, the Queen of England ruling over more Mohammedans than the Sultan and the Shah combined, but there is another fact of no less importance which will have a direct bearing on the future of Islam. It is this: that everywhere the Moslems hold the English—the Anglez—in the highest esteem. At the time of the annual pilgrimage to Mecca, when hundreds of thousands of pilgrims often meet together from all parts of Asia and Northern Africa, they compare notes and interchange views with regard to their respective countries. The Mohammedans of India testify to the Moslems of the West that they have in India what no other Moslems possess—a just government and an incorruptible judiciary.

POETRY.

Life Experiences.

MRS. U. F. HALL.

Oh! sad the thought that comes to me,
That in this world so bounteous fair,
There are no joys in store for me,
But leave some sorrow hidden there.

O yes, the wildwood I can roam,
And free fair nature is my joy
When to her bowers, I am at home,
And find sweet bliss without alloy.

But when I seek amid the throng,
Some friendly soul my own to cheer,
Some grateful word, some burst of song,
Will often cast the scalding tear.

Is there no place for me to fill?
Was this construction all in vain?
Is there no voice my soul to thrill,
But leaves some agonizing pain?

Was this bright world one scene of woe?
Was there no thought my soul to cheer?
Is there no joys that I should know,
No Eden, but a desert drear?

Such thoughts as these have found a part,
Within my bosom's deepest cell,
When words unkind like fiery dart,
Have pierced their victim but too well.

* * * * * * * * *

An aged form bowed low with years,
Once passed a brooklet where I lay,
My bright-child eyes suffused with tears,
Although 'twas budding, blooming May.

I watched the aged form passing by;
And wondered if his weight of years
Sat peacefully. When lo! a cry—
I quickly sprang and dried my tears.

I raised the aged sufferer up,
And brushed the dust from off his vest,
And of some leaves I made a cup,
And to his lips some water pressed.

I wiped the moisture from his brow,
A wound I saw, and quickly dressed,
A dampened kerchief I allow,
Was all the little Miss possessed.

Dear grandpa,—and the voice was glad,—
I'll lead you to our cottage door,
And you shall rest and not be sad,
For you are weak and lame and sore.

And as he walked, a story told.
Of seeds, and sheaves, and blessings thought,
And name should be a crown of gold,
If to the King rich sheaves I brought.

O sire, I asked, with bitter sigh,
If I should toil for the sheaves of grain.
Is it all the great God hath on high?
Is a golden crown all I should gain?

Child! and the voice seemed strange and cold.
What wouldst thou ask of God above?
O sire, I want not the crown of gold,
But only a PRECIOUS FATHER'S love.

God bless the little maid he cried,
And placed his aged hand on my head,
And from that hour my tears were dried
And to my little bower I sped.

I crept beneath a spreading tree,
My little secret bower of prayer,
And on the moss-couch bent the knee,
And told my Father all my care.

Father, have I brought sheaves to-day?
Has aught I've done been good and true?
Only a mistiful, but Father, pray,
Will not my little handful do?

Great el cares, I cannot expect to bring,
And lay with care at thy blest feet,
But little blades all round me spring,
And I will bring thee all I meet.

And as I passed from the sacred tree,
I felt I had not been in vain,
I'll watch, and every sheaves I see,
Will seethe same I show being's pain.

And while I raised the fallen up,
And sought to dry the orphan's tear,
My soul was calm, as still as my cup,
Of blue, I had not known for years.

Then treasure I found, and who were they?
The night, the flame, the hail, the bird.
What quiet quaint talk says sudden gay,
And sweeping by leaves me behind.

Had I not found the cherished friend?
The sympathetic, tried and true?
Oh yes, and love and beauty blend,
With all the joys I in life view.

My Father owns me for his child,
Nor chides me for my love so true,
However erring, quaint or wild,
He ever keeps his own in view.

Sometimes I meet the gay and fair,
With vestures rich and fashioned fine,
My own more plain, but donned with care,
Call forth some words untrue, unkind.

But let my spirit's seen to soar,
For, far above the thoughtless throng,
While God and nature ope the door,
And fills my soul with gladsome song.

I roam so free 'mid scenes more fair,
Than aught this sin cursed earth can give,
Beyond myself, beyond all care,
That life's a blessed thing to live.

But oh! beyond this vale of blue,
There are joys so pure for lives that's good;
And there the mother pure and true,
Will be forever understood.

The Changes Through Which Mortals Must Pass to Inherit the Kingdom of God.

J. M. STEPHENSON.

"There was a man of the Pharisees named Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews. The same came to Jesus by night, and said unto him, Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God; for no man can do these miracles which thou doest, except God be with him. Jesus answered and said unto him, verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. Nicodemus saith unto him, how can a man be born when he is old? can he enter the second time into his mother's womb and be born? Jesus answered, verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born of water, and of the spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, ye must be born again. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the spirit." John iii. 1-8.

1. The Bible teaches two fathers, two begettals, two births, two natures, two lives. It would be just as inappropriate to have a second birth without a second begettal as to have a first birth without a previous begettal. It is only necessary to prove a second begettal, as a first begettal will be admitted by all. Paul says, "For though ye have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers; for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel." 1 Cor. iv. 15. How did he beget them through the gospel? Answer: He preached the gospel and they believed and obeyed it, and the hope of the gospel was produced. According to Peter's testimony the hope of immortal life was begotten. Hear Peter's triumphant language when the glorious truth burst upon his mind that God had raised his Son from the dead. He exclaimed, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which, according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us to a lively hope thope of life—Syriacy by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." 1 Pet. i. 3.

If the resurrection of Christ to an "incorruptible inheritance," as affirmed by Peter, and endless life, as affirmed by Paul, is a begettal, then the realization of this hope will be the second birth. To this agree the words of the apostle. He says, "And he (Christ) is the head of the body, the church, who is the beginning, (the first born of every creature, verse 15) the first born from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence." Col. i. 18. I shall have use for this testimony in the further development of this thrillingly interesting subject. Paul, in writing to his dear brother Philemon concerning his son Onesimus whom he had begotten in his bonds, says: "I beseech thee for my son Onesimus whom I have begotten in my bonds." Philemon 10. Onesimus was Paul's son whom he had begotten through the gospel. James also refers to the instrumentality through which this second begettal is effected. He says, "Having willed it, he (God) begat us by the word of truth in order that we might be a first fruit of his creatures." Jas. i. 18,—Diaglott. Thus, the begettal is in order to the new birth of which Christ was the "first fruits among many brethren." Rom. viii. 29.

2. There are just two births. Again, signifies a second time. I am aware that the Greek word anoothan is rendered by some "above." It is equally true that this word occurs where it necessarily denotes a repetition. Greenfield gives as definitions of this word (and quotes Acts xv. 10 as an example), "to erect again, rebuild." The text quoted, reads, "After this I will return and build again the tabernacle of David which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof," etc. In these occurrences, this word necessarily signifies "again." The analogy between the premise and the conclusion leads us to this conclusion. Thus, "except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." To supply the ellipsis the conclusion would read, "That man which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that man which is born of the spirit is spirit." Therefore, "marvel not that I said unto you, ye must be born again." In the conclusion there are just two births. It is a series of couplets all the way through. Thus, two fathers, two begettals, two births, two lives, two natures—a regeneration, a re-living; and it will be to all intents and purposes a recreation, differing only from the first creation in that the subjects of the new creation will be incorruptible and immortal. This will be a difference in nature, not in identity; the new creatures having been made out of the old creature, not out of new material—one man born twice, and not two men born once. The intermediate statement should be harmonized with the statements going before and following after. For this to be true, the birth of water and of spirit must constitute one birth. To illustrate, the shadow and the tree are not two trees, but one and the same tree, the same as the picture of a man and the man thus pictorialized. They are not two men but only one man, and yet both are called by the same name. The symbol and the thing symbolized, the figure and the thing prefigured, are called by the same names, because they are inseparable. So with a symbolical burial and resurrection. So also with a figurative and matter of fact birth. The water and spirit are united into one birth by the conjuntive conjunction. The figure and the fact are inseparable until in one birth. To illustrate, the shadow and the tree are not two trees, but one and the same tree, the same as the picture of a man and the man thus pictorialized. They are not two men but only one man, and yet both are called by the same name. The symbol and the thing symbolized, the figure and the thing prefigured, are called by the same names, because they are inseparable. So with a symbolical burial and resurrection. So also with a figurative and matter of fact birth. The water and spirit are united into one birth by the conjuntive conjunction. The figure and the fact are inseparable until in one birth. Like a symbolical burial and resurrection in water, a symbolic birth in water is made just as essential as the thing symbolized—the birth of the spirit. There are no exceptions. Except a man (any man) be born of water and of the spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. This was just true of Christ, and will be of all the righteous living when he returns, that they will have been born again or they cannot inherit the kingdom. Christ was born of water and of the spirit. Thus, he has set a perfect example. "Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John to be baptized of him. But John forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me? And Jesus answering said unto him, suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness. Then he suffered him. And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water, and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the spirit of God descending as a dove, and lighting upon him: and lo a voice from heaven, saying, this is my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased." Matt. iii. 13-17. The father had laid a righteous requirement upon him which he could not obey without being baptized in water. The Father did not acknowledge Christ as his Son until he had thus obeyed him. This was a figurative birth of water, or a figurative burial and resurrection. But this figurative, or symbolic birth of water did not make him a Son in fact any more than a figurative birth of water, or a figurtive resurrection would be a literal resurrection. When born of God, born of the spirit, or born again, he will be a real Son, having the same nature of his heavenly Father just as really as he previously had the nature of his earthy father. As the result of having been born of the flesh he was flesh; and as the result of having been born of the spirit he is spirit, and possesses the spirit nature which is the immortal and incorruptible nature of all who shall be born again of the spirit will be. John iii. 6; 2 Pet. iii. 1.

Christ was flesh and blood the same as his brethren, therefore, there was the same necessity of his passing through that physical change called the new birth that there was that Enoch and Elijah should; and that all the righteous living and dead shall be changed when the Lord returns to qualify them, in nature and life to inherit the incorruptible and everlasting kingdom of God. According to 1 Cor. xv. 50, flesh and blood are used synonymously with an animal, corruptible and mortal body, in contrast with an incorruptible, spiritual and an immortal body. In the last half of the 50th verse the reason given why flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God is, that "corruption cannot inherit incorruption." Thus, the kingdom of God will be incorruptible—corruption cannot inherit incorruption; therefore, before corruptible man can inherit the incorruptible kingdom, he must be changed. Having thus prepared the mind of the reader, the apostle boldly affirms that all the saints, whether living or dead, shall be changed, in a moment, at the last trump, from corruption to incorruption, and from mortal to immortality; and thus be prepared to inherit the incorruptible kingdom of God forever.

That a resurrection of the dead abstract from the above named change is not the new birth, is evident (1) from the fact that Christ teaches the absolute necessity of every man being born again before any can inherit the kingdom of God. Enoch and Elijah have not, and all the righteous living will not be raised from the dead, but they will inherit the kingdom of God; therefore, the resurrection is not an essential pre-requisite to inheriting the kingdom of God. To be born of the spirit, or to be changed from corruption to incorruption, and from mortal to immortality by the spirit is just as necessary for the righteous living as for the righteous dead before they can inherit the kingdom; therefore, the conclusion is irresistible that the new, or second birth, is a necessary physical change, and not a resurrection of dead men. Of course this wonderful change will necessarily involve the resurrection of the righteous dead, but it cannot of the righteous living.

2. It is not every rule that will work both ways. It does not follow that because a change from corruption to incorruption and from mortal to immortality, necessitates a resurrection of dead ones; that, therefore, such a change is necessarily involved in a resurrection. The dead raised by the prophets, Christ and his apostles were raised corruptible and mortal, or they could not have died again. The word as plainly teaches the resurrection of the "bad" and the "unjust" as of the "good" and "just." These will be raised corruptible and mortal or they could not suffer the second death.

3. Christ is declared to be the "first born from the dead." He was not the first dead man raised to life, therefore a simple resurrection is not the new birth. He was the first dead man changed to incorruption to live "forevermore;" therefore, he being the first dead man upon whom this great physical change had passed constituted him exclusively the first born from the dead. Enoch was the first and Elijah the second man born from the living. They fitly represent that wonderful change which shall except the righteous living when Christ returns who shall not die, but be changed from corruption to incorruption, and from mortal to immortality. Christ was born again through the spirit, and, therefore, according to his own declaration, he was a spirit. Paul says, "And he is the head of the body, the church, who is the beginning, the first born from the dead." Col. i. 18. That this birth was effected by the spirit is evident from the following evidence. Peter says: "For Christ also hath once suffered the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh but quickened by the spirit." 1 Pet. iii. 18. Again, Paul says, "But if the spirit of him that raised up Christ from the dead dwell in you," etc. Rom. viii. 11. That this birth of the spirit involved a physical change from corruption to incorruption, and from mortal to immortality is evident from 1 Cor. xv. 42-50.

To prove that all the sleeping saints will be raised incorruptible and spiritual, Paul refers to Christ who had been raised a spiritual body or a life-giving spirit, as the direct antithesis of a corruptible and animal body. He also represents incorruptible and spiritual bodies as being in the image of Christ's glorious body. See verse 49. The apostle says: "So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption. It is sown a natural (animal) body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural (animal) body, and there is a spiritual body. And so it is written the first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening (life-giving) spirit. And as we have borne the image of the earthy (Adam) so shall bear the image of the heavenly (Adam)." Thus it is plain that Christ and all the saints will be incorruptible and immortal spirits. Thus the same result will be produced by this change of nature and life which will be produced by the new birth—they must, therefore, be one and the same thing. When all the saints shall be spirits then will they be invested with the divine nature which is the spirit nature. 2 Pet. i. 4; Heb. i. 14. Then will they be equal unto the angels, being the sons of God because they are the sons of that selective resurrection from among the dead. Christ says, "But those deemed worthy to obtain that age, and that resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage; for they can die no more; because they are like the angels; and are the sons of God, being sons of the resurrection." Luke xx. 35, 36.

Please observe, (1). The foregoing promise refers exclusively to those dead men involved, in whose change to the deathless nature of angels there is necessarily included a resurrection from the dead. But not an ordinary resurrection does not involve this change of nature. The Greek word anastasis simply means the standing again of that which had fallen down without any reference to any change whatever from its nature or position previously to its having fallen down. Any such change or privilege not expressed in this word, must be expressed by other word or words. All except Christ who have been raised from the dead were raised with the same nature they had before, and died again and returned to corruption. In this exception, other words except those ordinarily used for the resurrection of the dead are used. Thus, associated with Christ's resurrection are other words besides those used with reference to mortal resurrection, or ordinary resurrection. Prwtotokas ekkoon nekroon, literally "first born out of the dead ones." He was not the first dead man who had been raised from the dead, but he was the first born from the dead, or the first dead man who had been born of the spirit, and therefore was a spirit. Of him alone has it ever been affirmed that he was "born from the dead no more to return to corruption,"—"a spiritual body," "a life-giving spirit," etc. His was a special, eclectic resurrection, one representing those exclusively who are joint-heirs with him to the glorious position of equality with angels as sons of the most high God. The great Father is a spirit and his great family in heaven and on earth must be spirit sons that they may have the nature and life of their spirit Father. Thus, the spirit birth will constitute them spirits, as the flesh birth had constituted them flesh beings.

In Luke xx. 35, 36, there are other qualifying words added to anastasis, expressive of equality with angels—worthiness to obtain "that age," and an eclectic resurrection from among the dead—denoting a radical change from the human to the divine nature, from flesh to spirit, as involved in the new birth, and equality with angels—a change of relation from the sons of men to the sons of God. Such qualifications are never applied to any living or dead except the righteous. All these expressions of position, relation and nature are just as applicable to living as to dead Christians. If dead, they must live; but whether living or dead, they must all be changed, regenerated or born again. None need comprehend the extraordinary resurrection of the righteous with that of the wicked, or any other class. Not only are all the qualifying words already mentioned used with reference to the righteous dead exclusively, but such also, as "incorruptible," "glorious, honorable, spiritual"—also a change of nature "from corruption to incorruption, and from mortal to immortality"—terms as before stated expressive of the result of the second birth, and, which, apart from the precedent of a part being dead and a resurrection being involved—all are just as applicable to the righteous living when Christ comes, as to the righteous dead. That Christ has been born again, and that all the righteous living and dead will be born of the spirit, or born again, will further appear in the light of the following testimony. Paul says: "But if the spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead, dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwelleth in you." Rom. viii. 11. Thus, as far as all the dead in Christ are concerned they will be born of the spirit the same as Christ was, and, therefore, will be spirits; and, if spirits, then the spirit sons of the great spirit Father. That all the righteous living have received the spirit of adoption into the family of God, and are joint-heirs with all the righteous dead to the new birth and sonship with the Father of the spirit family, is evident from Rom. viii. 15-17th verses of the same chapter. Paul continues, "For as many as are led by the spirit of God, they are the sons of God. For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God: and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ." Thus, all the righteous living at the return of Christ will have received the spirit of adoption and be joint-heirs with all the righteous dead, to the birth of the spirit, by which alone any will become the sons of God in fact. According to the foregoing language of Paul, they are heirs now; and according to his language in Gal. iii., Christians are only the children, God by faith now. He says, "For now ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus." All christians have received the spirit of adoption, but must wait until the new birth state shall be ushered in, when all the saints sleeping or waking shall be regenerated, or changed in a moment from flesh to spirit, and from the sons of men to the sons of God.

Christ is not only the first fruits of all the sleeping saints, but of all the sheaves which shall be garnered in the kingdom of God in the great day of salvation. Paul appealed to the fact that Christ was the first fruits of them that slept to prove the resurrection. But in his conclusion he includes all in the harvest who are Christ's. Thus, "Christ the first fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at his coming." 1 Cor. xv. 23. The harvest embraced every sheaf from first to last in the type, so will the great harvest of the new birth. All the sheaves were of the same nature. So of all the saints of Christ. As the first fruit was born again, so will every saint be born again in the great harvest of all the sheaves. If sin was a birth of the spirit, and, as the result, he was a spirit, so will it be with all the joint-heirs with Christ the elder brother of the great family of God. Paul represents Christ as the "first born among many brethren." Rom. viii. 29. According to the first half of this verse the many brethren include all whom God foreknew would be conformed to the image of his Son, and, therefore, includes all Christians, sleeping or waking. For Christ to be the first born among many brethren, then the many brethren must be born also. Christ and the many brethren have, or will have been previously born, therefore it will be a second birth. And, as has been abundantly proven, Christ's birth was of the spirit, and the birth of all his children will be effected by the same spirit; therefore, according to Christ's word they will all be spirits. According to the same apostle the general assembly, or the whole congregation of God, will be included with Christ as first borns. He says: "But you have approached to Zion, a mountain and city of the living God—the heavenly Jerusalem; and to myriads of angels—a full assembly and congregation of first borns, having been enrolled in heaven." Heb. xii. 22, 23. The Greek word ecclesia, rendered congregation, signifies called out ones. Thus, the general assembly of called ones, whose names are enrolled in heaven, will all have been born again. Upon Mount Zion shall stand the two great families of the sons of God—angels and men—all deathless spirits. Such shall be the correlation of all the saints as spirit brothers, not only with each other, but with the holy angels who are spirit sons of the great spirit Father also. Such, too, is the correlation of all living or dead souls to the Adamic nature, that all must pass through the same change from flesh to spirit, or from mortal to immortality before they can possibly inherit the incorruptible and everlasting kingdom of God. Some have, and many will, rise from the dead; who have not, and never will be born of the spirit; therefore a simple resurrection is not the spirit birth. None will ever be changed from flesh to spirit, from the human to the divine nature, from the sons of men to the sons of God, from corruption to incorruption, from mortal to immortality, except those who shall be born of the spirit, and Paul positively affirms that all the saints living and dead shall thus be changed, the conclusion, therefore, is irresistible, that all are born of the spirit.

Thoughts Dedneed from Searching. Romans ix-xi.

First In Romans ix. 6. Not as though the word of God hath taken none effect, for they are not all Israel, which are of Israel. From this I conclude that the word of God was efficacious in taking some Israelites out, who should not thenceforth be called in the name Israel, but according to verse 7, they should be called in Isaac.

Having faith in Jesus or attained unto the law of righteousness, they are the children of the promise, are children of God (by faith) Romans xi. 7. Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; but the election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded.

In short I think God makes the name Israel doubly adhere to a people, whom He hath concluded all in unbelief xi. 32. If those who are of Israel and are not Israel, are not those whom God hath elected or chosen out of Israel, then I am in darkness and would thankfully have my darkness dispelled by light. Conscious of much weakness. I hope ever to be teachable, ever ready to exchange error for truth, that I may grow in the knowledge of at least some of the everlasting truth of God. Yours truly, American Effort in Asia Minor.

A correspondent of the Philadelphia Times, writing from Beirut, says concerning the educational enterprises that have grown out of the American mission: At present there are in Syria about 11,000 children and youths in Protestant schools, American, English, Scotch, German, Swiss and native Syrian. Nearly one-half of these pupils are girls. The Greeks, Maronites and Catholics, as well as the Jews, Armenians, Druzes and Moslems, have also opened schools for their children, and the rising generation of Syrians bids fair to be a reading generation. The Moslems have even had the audacity to open schools for girls, and one could judge from the tone of their newspapers that female education is of paramount importance. They are now erecting several buildings in Beirut for boys' and girl's schools. Beirut is eminently a city of schools. There is the American College, the Jesuit college, an immense establishment; the Maronites' Bishops' College, the Papal Greek Patriarchs' College, the Moslem Civil Service College, the American Female Seminary, and Theological Seminary, the British Syrian Female Seminary, the German Lutheran Deaconesses' great establishment, with Orphan House and Girls' Boarding School; Miss Taylor's Moslem Girls' Boarding School, the French Sisters of Charity and Sisters of Nazareth, both immense institutions; the Jewish Academy, the Orthodox Greek Academy and about fifty lesser schools, native and foreign, making not less than 9,000 children under instruction in this Syrian Athens. The educational edifices of Beirut are the finest buildings in Syria, and loom up over the city, being visible far out at sea and along Lebanon for thirty miles. The change wrought in the popular mind by these schools, almost all of which have grown up as the result of the antagonism of the American schools, is apparent on every side. The press, too, is wielding a great influence in the city and the country. Almost every community has its organ. Daily telegrams come from all parts of Europe, and the Syrians discuss European politics with the greatest interest.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JULY 21, 1880.

We shall give place to some communications on hand as soon as we can. Our object is to so diversify our columns as to interest and instruct all classes of our readers. As we are to look to the lands of the Orient for the fulfillment of prophecy relative to the last days, we endeavor to keep our readers fully informed of all that occurs in the distant east.

OUR readers will notice the advertisement of the American Bee Exchange in this number of our paper. Chambers's Encyclopedia is one of the standard works in the class of literature to which it belongs, and is well worthy of a place in the library of every reader desirous of full and accurate information on all topics of general interest. It will be noticed that a number of popular works are offered at rates of marvelous cheapness. For the Encyclopedia address the manager at once.

Now that God has blessed the people of this land with bountiful harvests, and as financial matters have greatly improved during the past year or two, we pressingly urge our friends to aid our paper. We are thankful for all done in the past. Like several other papers proclaiming the coming Messiah, and the establishment of his kingdom, THE RESTITUTION owes its continuance to the sacrifices of its friends. Its mission is not done. The proximate future will demand its continuance as a disseminator of truth, a chronicler of startling events, and a herald of our soon coming Redeemer. Those that discontinue it to take rabid politicl papers in its place may regret the step when too late.

FAITH is a cardinal virtue without which it is impossible to please God. Yet in the economy of salvation faith and obedience are inseperably wedded. If, when faith is spoken of singly, we are instructed that salvation is through faith, even so, when obedience is spoken of singly, we learn that Jesus Christ has become the author of eternal salvation to all that obey him. It is a most solemn truth that at the judgment everlasting destruction will come upon those that obey not the gospel, while those that do Christ's commandments will have right to the tree of life and the privilege of going through the gates into the city. Disobedience lost Eden. Let us be careful lest we come short of the paradise of God, and lose a crown of glory by our non-compliance with the requisitions of the gospel.

THE state of affairs in the east is one calculated to inspire gloomy forebodings. A Conference Supplementary to the Berlin Conference of 1878 has brought the "Eastern Question" once more into the foreground, and it has emphatically announced that its decisions shall be carried into effect even if the employment of force should become necessary. By one of these decisions a portion of the Turkish dominion is assigned to the Kingdom of Greece. Turkey is sternly opposed to any further dismemberment of her empire, and Greece only waits an official negative to unsheath her sword and not only seize the territory assigned her by the Conference, but to avenge herself for the murderous outrages inflicted upon the people of the classic realm during the supremacy of her Mohammedan oppressors for the last four hundred years. Turkey wasted by the last conflict with Russia is but ilty prepared to marshall armies from the broken remnants of her people and still worse prepared to replenish her exhausted treasury from her bankrupt and despoiled population. To the dread depletions of an exhausting war, and the weakening effects of insurrection and famines are to be added the want of confidence in the stability of the government, and the despair felt by the people in the ability of the rulers to protect industry and property. Hence Turkey is in a state of complete paralysis, and her hour of dissolution is evidently near. In the conflicts for the supremacy over the lands stretching from the Mediterranean to India that will most probably be waged between the great rival powers, Russia and Britain, the prophecies relative to Palestine and the Jewish people, as well as relative to Egypt, Assyria, Moab, and Ammon, will develop into their fulfillment. And we may notice that Turkey is not alone in suffering as a Mohammedan country. The subjoined extract will show that Persia is drinking some preliminations from that prophetic wine-cup of fury that is finally to be drained by the wicked nations throughout the whole world. Watchfulness and prayer are imperative duties in this crisis of the world's history. Let us be faithful to our high and holy trusts, and work while the day lasts. The night is near: "The famine in Persia continues with unabated severity. Mr. Shedd, an American missionary at Oroomiah, Persia, writes: 'The past two weeks have been the worst we have seen. In the city the Moslem charity, after three weeks' effort, failed, and nearly 3,000 whom they had been feeding were turned into the streets. Fifty or more are daily dying—dying men, little children thrown into the streets to die, corpses half eaten of dogs are common sights. With a few exceptions, there is no money or care shown by the Khans and the wealthy, and nothing is done by the government. In Moslem villages the death-rate is increasing. In one village three women were taken in the act of eating a child. Where our relief committees are at work, few deaths have occurred, but unless the relief is increased, many persons thus far preserved will drop off. Many are greatly reduced in strength, and the two months to come threaten a worse condition than in the two months past. The price of grain is very high, and the supply by importation only.'"

Drying up the Euphrates.

The wasting effects of the sixth vial on the nation symbolized by the great river that intersects the national domain is illustrated by the following extracts from different papers, in which the action of the supplementary Berlin congress in giving additional territory to Greece, and the opposition manifested by the Sublime Porte to accepting the decisions of the conference, are the subjects of comment. That war between Turkey and Greece will be the result appears to be a foregone conclusion. That the results of such a war would be most disastrous to the Ottoman government is also regarded as certain. This dispensation nears its close.

[Chicago Evening Journal.]

THE BERLIN CONFERENCE.

The Berlin congress of 1878, under the influence of Beaconsfield, it was said, almost ignored the claims of Greece and left open the whole frontier question. The supplementary Conference of Berlin, called at the instance of England, has extended the Greek frontier of a line suggested as a compromise by the representative of France. This gives to Greece nearly all of Thessaly and the greater part of Epirus, or all that part south of Janina and the line of the Kalamis river. The ceded territory includes Janina, the capital of Epirus, a city of about 40,000 inhabitants.

The decision as to the Greek boundary question was unanimous, and will doubtless be approved by the great powers. The question is an old one, and has been before Europe ever since 1854. In 1853 the Greeks, under the encouragement of Russia, made an attempt to occupy Thessaly and Epirus, but were forced out by England and France. When the Turco-Russian war broke out Greece made preparations to occupy the coveted provinces, but was restrained by England, with the promise that she would gain more by maintaining a peaceful attitude. Under this promise Greece looked for definite action on the part of England at the Berlin congress, but was disappointed, as were the Liberals in England. Greece continued the agitation, however, until England called the supplementary conference, which has decided in her favor.

Turkey protests, and, it is said, will oppose the cession of territory, but as against united Europe this opposition will serve only to open up new questions to be decided against her.

[New York Observer.]

TURKEY AND GREECE.

A Berlin despatch to the London Times says: "Turkish diplomatists continue to declare that the Porte cannot but regard the resolutions of the Berlin conference as arbitrary, and that it is impossible to concede so large a territory. If the sultan agreed to do so he would lose all prestige with the Moslems and would be unable to pacify the different tribes in the ceded districts. The Porte will, therefore, very probably try to shirk from carrying out the wishes of the powers by bringing forward new explanations. But the Porte must soon be convinced that the intentions of the powers are this time very serious, and that reopening of the Eastern question by war would certainly end in the total destruction of the Turkish Empire in Europe. Nevertheless the opinion prevails in political circles here that the Porte will decline to accept the resolutions of the conference, and that it will be impossible to prevent bloodshed between the Turks and Greeks."

England and France have advised Greece to postpone calling out the reserves until the Collective Note has been received and replied to by Turkey and Greece, in order to avoid offering the Porte any pretext for resistance.

New York weekly Witness:—The knell of Turkish rule in Europe seems to be ringing in every telegram from Constantinople. The refusal of the Porte to accept the new boundary line proposed by the European powers for Greece, renders war between Greece and Turkey imminent, and in view of the failure of the Sultan to fulfil any of the promised ameliorations of his government it is not likely that he has now any friends among the powers. Russia appears virtually to rule in Bulgaria and to be instigating a war of liberation for Roumelia. The union of that province with Bulgaria would be carrying out the treaty of San Stephano, which was set aside by the Berlin Conference. Austria seeing that Russia is likely virtually to obtain all she asked for is determined also to annex still more of Turkey; and Greece means to have a large slice. Britain has already got the island of Cyprus and has a sort of protectorate over Turkey-in-Asia—a rather dangerous acquisition. The end of a cruel, unjust, extravagant and faithless power, which cannot on account of its devotion to the Koran be reformed, seems to be drawing on pretty rapidly.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Prayer and Pardon.

Ask, seek, knock; receive, find, it shall be opened unto you. So Jesus said; and so it always is. Prayer brings us near to God; fills the valleys and covers the mountains with the hosts of his power. God never trifles with

"The soul's sincere de-ire, Uttered or expressed."

"Behold, he prayeth!" is the Lord's way of describing the chief of sinner's surrender and his readiness to enter the holy service. Need not fear him now. Yesterday mad with rage against Christ and his church; to-day deeile under the hand of the venerable disciple. He prays, and is pardoned, and would know what to do for the Lord whom he has so misunderstood and persecuted. What tenner solicitude for the sinner: "It is hard for thee." Jesus and his cause were safe. It was hard for the persecutor.

Mercy is nimble-footed. It ignores form and ceremony; never stands on etiquette; cannot wait even on the promptest words. Thought can scarcely measure its speed. It keeps even with the mind's penitent emotions. "It is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart; the word of faith which we preach." "While I was praying, the angel touched me." "What things so ever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them." "According to thy faith"—that is the rule. "Thy faith hath saved thee"—"Thy sins are forgiven."

So delicate is the relation between Jesus and the human soul, that the system of mercy seems almost automatic. A touch of his garment brought "immediate" healing; "Thy faith hath made thee whole." "Virtue" passed from Jesus to the believing soul unbidden. His mercy is a spontaneous and exhaustless source of healing and pardon.

When the "prodigal came to himself," and arose to go to his father, his heart was changed; he had faith in his father; he had repented. His father's compassion anticipated his confession and humiliation, and blessed him with abundant pardon. It was no time for sad recitals. Every body must be merry over the restored son. No higgling about the tittles of legal formality. The boy's repentance went straight to the father's heart; the father's mercy bounded over all obstacles and embraced the boy, and kissed his pardon; they wept together in mutual confidence. Ceremony would be impertinent till restoration is complete. The real conversion done, now the proofs follow: cast off the rags of sin, put on the best robe; wash away the dirt of vile habits, celebrate with joy, because "the lost is found."

A sinner pray? Yes. Who needs it more? Pray all sorts of prayer—in thought, in act, and word. Did not Peter tell the Samaritan sorcerer to pray when he was "in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity." Fine theorists make God too much like Baal—out of hearing when most needed; but the Bible and common sense put him "nigh unto all who call upon." And he is not parsimonious; has no fear of exhausting his supply; is lavish of his bounties in grace as well as in nature. The sinner has but to open the windows and doors and let in the light, and blessing, and joy. The world is full of it,—and more than free; God is more ready to give than we are to ask. When we yield the negative, how soon, how sweet the Spirit and the truth come in.

God needs no appeasing. Jesus' death did all that, if it needed to be done. We, only we need to be reconciled; and when we pray, how easy, how precious the at-one-ment comes. Lord, have mercy on our unbelief!

Prayer implies faith. All things, subject to the will of God, are possible to faith.

The sinner, believing, penitent, submissive may pray, must pray—no promise without asking, and receiving is as sure as asking.

The answer—how much better than we thought it.

The right and power of prayer are above circumstances, and masters of every possible situation. God has given us Jesus, and with him surrendered all things to faith.

SELECTIONS.

[The Christian Observer.]

Progress in Palestine.

The Times recently contained the following: "In a letter in the Austrian Zeitschrift fur den Orient (Oriental Journal) Herr C. Schick, government surveyor of buildings in Jerusalem, gives some interesting facts to show the progress which has been made in Palestine during the last twenty-five years. This is especially evident in the erection of many new buildings. In the small villages very few new houses are to be seen, while on the other hand great extensions have been made in the larger places, especially in towns—a sure sign of centralization. This is especially the case with the Christian population. In Jerusalem, inside the town, neglected or ruined houses have been restored or rebuilt by private persons or companies, outside the old town are entirely new suburbs, the extension being made especially towards the west. The Jews have formed among themselves building societies, which have erected long barrack-like buildings adapted for several families. It may be estimated that the number of dwellings during the past twenty-five years has been more than doubled, probably trebled. This is especially the case with Bethlehem, which conveys the impression of a newly-built town. In Jaffa the town-wall has been demolished, the ditch filled up, and a number of large new houses and magazines, even palatial buildings, been erected."

Herr Schick mentions similar changes as to be seen at Nazareth, Kaifa, Ramleh, Tiberias, and other places.

"Through the schools and the increasing trade, the working people have acquired greater style and taste, and the newer houses are mostly a great improvement on the old—not oldest, which as a rule are well built. Nearly all the houses have [illegible] windows [illegible] ago.

"As a sign of the advance in agriculture, it may be mentioned that in Jaffa the gardens have increased in extent four-fold during a quarter of a century. Besides the German colony referred to (at the foot of Mount Carmel), new settlements are to be seen on the Anjeh River, in the plains near Bir Addes, and Kefr Saba, as also many new gardens, especially in Hable. New plantations are seen here and there; the country people are investing their capital abundantly in cattle rearing. At Kolonieh several new houses have been built, and the gardens there are noteworthy; so also in Antos. In the vicinity and in the region round Jerusalem, the land has nearly all been taken up, trees have been planted, and cisterns dug. So also the aqueduct, which brought the spring-water in the olden time from the so-called pools of Solomon to Jerusalem, has been again erected, so that it again discharges at the place of the Temple.

"A very notable advance is to be seen in the lighting of the streets of the towns, and the arrangements for keeping them clean; in the latter respect, however, there is still much to be desired. No longer are the gates of the town shut at sundown, to the obstruction of trade and the imprisonment of the inhabitants within the walls. There has also been a great advance in the paving of the towns; in Bethlehem, even in the winter time, the streets are quite passable, which was far from being the case formerly. In Jerusalem, the tanneries and the slaughter houses have been removed outside the town. On several buildings clocks have been placed, which strike the hours for the public benefit. Herr Schick notices as a great advance the increasing toleration between the different religionists during the past twenty-five years; Jews, Moslems, and Christians, as a rule, live in harmony, and a non-Mussulman seldom suffers in any respect on account of his creed. Even the red fez is not obligatory on non-Mussulman government servants. European clothing is now common both with men and women, and many of the latter may be seen dressed in the latest Paris fashions. The Pashas no longer move about in constant state, but may often be seen on foot in the streets with only one or two attendants. European furniture, chairs, sofas, and tables, are now common. Great bells are now allowed to be [illegible] of the Christian churches; old Christian churches have been restored and new ones built in Jerusalem, Nazareth, Tiberias, Tabor, Nablous, Jifne, Remallah, Beit-Jal, Lydd, etc. So also have a number of synagogues, especially in Jerusalem, been built during these twenty-five years. All this progress must not be taken as a sign of any laxity in religion on the part of Mahommedans, who have during this time built many new mosques, and otherwise shown themselves as much attached to their religion as ever.

"Justice also is much more impartially administered, and the old barbarous punishments have been abolished. In Jerusalem the sanitary department is in charge of a German physician, and building affairs are in the hands of a German architect.

"From these statements, which we believe are perfectly trustworthy, it is evident that great progress has been made in Palestine during the past twenty-five years. We would hope that this example might prove infectious, and that in the next twenty-five years a like progress might be seen in the whole of Turkey in Asia."

A series of letters from Jerusalem have lately appeared in the Jewish Chronicle, by a Hebrew, giving confirmation to some points in this statement, especially as regards the superior success of Christian schemes of civilization. He highly praises the efficiency and success of the schools and hospitals at Jerusalem, under the auspices of the London Society for the Conversion of the Jews, and confesses that "considering that the amount of our (Jewish) charity annually directed to Jerusalem equals if not exceeds the income of this well-organized enemy, (!) it is pitiable that want of organization, and ignorant obstacles, should prevent our work of defence from being equally efficient." He speaks hopefully, however, of some Jewish agricultural settlements at Lydda, Safed, and Kulonyeh (Kolonieh).

"Mr. Lawrence Oliphant has returned from Constantinople without having obtained the signature of the Sultan to the firade authorizing the formation of a company for the purpose of colonizing the fertile and unoccupied lands to the east of the Jordan with Jews." But, says the Jewish Chronicle, "he by no means despairs of ultimate success," as the present "attitude of fixed resistance to foreign influence" on the part of the Sultan [illegible] of Jerusalem. Interesting as is Jaffa, we can hardly bide the time when our eyes shall behold Zion, city of our God.—Henry M. Goodell.

[illegible] the cordial support [illegible] some of the more intelligent of the Turkish statesmen, including Khatred-din and Midhat Pashas.—H. W. S.

* Mr. H. Gueulette, of London, writer to the Jewish Chronicle, that Sir Moses Monte fiore has just caused to be planted 32 trees on the land at Jerusalem, opposite the house known by the English name of Judah Touro's Almshouse.

Glimpses of the Holy Land.—Stray Leaves from my Journal.

JAFFA.

At last the ardent desire of many years is gratified. Mine eyes behold the Land of Promise; this path upon which I am treading leads up to Jerusalem, and those hazy, many tented hills beyond the plain of Sharon were the mountain house of Judah and Benjamin. What a strange sensation, full of pleasurable emotions to know that we are about to visit the home of Jacob and David, of Rachel and Ruth, the land in which our Savior lived and died. Here it has been the scenes of our sweetest fancies, our childish prayers, and household songs. Since I was taught to lisp the name of Jesus, how few days have passed but what my thoughts have been directed hither. There comes to my throbbing heart a full and quiet joy. The dream of years is now being realized.

It is impossible to describe the scene on landing at one of the Syrian ports. There are no piers or wharves, so you have to debark in a little boat. Before the steamer has fairly stopped scores of dark, strangely dressed barbarians are clambering up her sides, eagerly spring on board, and rush among the passengers and crew like pirates bent on rapine and murder. Usually a number of Arabs are on the deck, and immediately there is bargaining, pushing, hauling, angry ejaculations, and vociferous shouting, until the unitiated traveller is seized with terror and stands guard over his baggage. Yet his guide-book advises him to remain "perfectly cool and unperturbed by the noise and bustle and the fierce contentions that surround him." Patent frauds are on every hand, an exorbitant price is asked for landing, and as I could not understand a word of Arabic, I regarded my situation as utterly helpless. At last a young American whom I could understand and who was very civil and obliging, proffered to take me on shore for a reasonable charge, and under his care all difficulties immediately vanished.

Jaffa is quite a pretty little town, looking at it from the sea, though when you are winding among its narrow crowded and filthy streets, crowded and jostled by men, donkeys and camels, you will think it decidedly unpleasant and disagreeable. But there is no need for distance to lend enchantment to the environs of Jaffa. The green orange groves laden with golden fruit, are it is said the finest in the world. The fruit is very large, an orange sometimes measuring ten or fifteen inches in circumference, and on account of their exceedingly fine flavor, they are in great demand in the market. We visited one of these gardens belonging to the Latin convent. We are enamored and delighted to wander among the large trees fragrant with the delicious, delicate perfume of the white blossoms. The good old monk who attended us, showed us one tree from which no fruit had lately been plucked. It was a glory to behold. We were pressed to carry away about a dozen of its rarest treasures. There are a great many interesting associations connected with Jaffa. My wife and I are stopping at the Latin convent right on the sea shore, which they claim is built on the original site of Simon the Tanner's house where Peter had that remarkable vision, showing him that the distinction between Jew and Gentile was forever abolished. And why not? Here is the flat roof, an open view of the wide noon-day heavens, the long bright sweep of the blue Mediterranean. And down here at our feet are the reefs famous in Gentile legends as the rocks of Andromeda. This is the port to which Hiram of Tyre brought the wood of Lebanon and cedar trees on floats—the timber used by Solomon in the construction of the Temple. How many times when a boy I listened to discussions on that wonderful whale story of the Bible: right there is the ancient roadstead from which Jonah took ship bound for Tarshish, a perilous journey on and under water. Here Dorcas died "full of good works and alms deeds:" but was raised to life by Peter who had been sent for by her fellow converts. "And it was known throughout all Joppa; and many believed in the Lord." We have visited the mission schools here, and find the work prospering. The children sang for us in both Arabic and English, among other Sunday-school hymns "Hold the Fort," that came to our ears like the [illegible]

Every event of life has meaning to those, who, in the simple trust of a childlike faith, give themselves up to the leadings and guidance of God's providence. No wind can blow wrong; no event be mistimed; no result be disastrous. If in all things God is caring for our inward and eternal life, nothing can occur which is not for our good.

The Pilgrim Song.

BY A. PETER CUYKER, D. D.

When the sky is bright all are free,
When around all seem to love me,
When not a cross or trouble move me,
Then I'll not be in fetters.
Then the name of all my pleasure,
Dear one! his object treasure,
Is me, without stint or measure,
Plies at home, abroad.

When the way is dark and dreary,
When my path are worn and weary,
When my heart is sunken heavy,
Then I'll trust in God.
If it is who kindly leads me
He it is who daily feeds me;
And I know whither my steps be,
He will help aboard.

Whether hill, or in the valley,
In shine or rain or shades,
I my heart with courage rally,
Singing, "Trust in God."
He's my all, I want no other,
He's my rock and brother,
To bring a home to mother
Is my blessed God.

Editor Restitution:—I am very sorry to trouble you to make a few corrections in my notice in THE RESTITUTION of July 7th,—"Is the Sinner to be Punished with Death on Account of his Personal Transgression?" In the second paragraph, beginning at the last part of the eleventh line, please make it read, "This involved their posterity in the ruin and brought death upon the race, because they, as mortal, dying people could only transmit to their posterity the same nature they themselves possessed. But they did not by their transgression make all the race personal sinners." In the seventh paragraph, fifth line from the bottom, read Korah instead of Kosmik. In the fifteenth paragraph, tenth line from top of paragraph, omit the "a." In the eleventh line of same paragraph, read, "to illustrate" instead of "illustration." In the sixteenth paragraph, tenth line from top of paragraph, read "retreat" instead of "ritual." In same paragraph, fifth line from bottom of paragraph, read "sins" instead of "arms."

Editor Restitution:—Perhaps some of the dear brethren and sisters would like to hear from me once more. I am still battling away for the truth, preaching every Sunday. I think that the truth is gaining ground in our neighborhood; prejudice is giving way. A clear, bright sky is opening up. I am not in the organizing business [illegible] ter brother to [illegible] up his church and kingdom both, and then he will take the reins of government in his own hands, and then he will show us who is the only potentate, King of kings and Lord of lords, who only hath immortality. And then will that true light be revealed that enlighteneth every one that cometh into the world. And then will that due time come when that ransom that God gave to be made known unto every man, then will it be made known unto all men. Then shall the righteous shine forth in their Father's kingdom. Then, with Paul and all the saints of all ages, we shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away. And then shall the overcomers set down with Christ on his throne, as Christ overcome and set down with his Father on his throne. And then shall the overcomer help Christ to rule the nations. Oh, glorious thought, to think that we may be among the overcomers; for none but the overcomers can help Christ and Abraham to bless the nations. None but that class can be the spiritual Eve or bride of the second Adam, but the overcomer can be of the bride that will say, "The spirit and the bride say, come and take of the water of life." I must close on this, as this is all old to most of the dear brethren and sisters, but ever is new to me, as I daily ask, "Shall I be amongst the overcomers or not?" If not, I will lose all. If I shall be worthy, I will gain all. Read! Read!

I have been in Kansas now, in a few days, ten years. I have had many sore trials hard to bear; many hard sayings; traveled over a portion of twelve counties in Kansas and some five or six counties in Missouri, with the exceptions of a few places, all on my own expenses; became very much involved by it. I have a few calls from several of the northern states, but I rather think they are from God's poor who can do but little towards my expenses. I also have strong ties in Indiana, as my dear father and mother are still alive, and a host of other dear friends, brothers and sisters in the Lord; and, as my health has failed me some, on account of exposure here in Kansas trying to spread the glad tidings of the kingdom of God, I will now make an offer to the dear brethren in the north and eastern states. Those of you who never have been needy, eat up by grasshoppers and chintz bugs, and who are trying to work for the Lord, that, if you would like to see me and hear me upon the glorious restitution and blessing of all nations and kindred things, if you are willing to defray traveling expenses, we will try to give you a call all along the line on our route to old Indiana. My time will be nothing, so the iron horse is fed and I am fed. My wife and I thought that would be only a trifle to each of you, and would be a big thing to us. I had a sunstroke last harvest and have not been rid of a severe headache ever since. The doctor says it would help me to take a trip north some time this fall, but I am so involved in debt that I cannot and do my family justice. Some of the brethren say to me, "trust in the Lord." I have so much confidence in the Lord that I can trust him easily for everything that he promised me, but the Lord never promised me that he would plow my ground and plant, sow, or reap my crops; the Lord never promised that he would shower bread from heaven for me; he never said, "if you go and preach, I will pay your expenses on the train and feed you when you get hungry;" neither did he say to me, "go without purse or scrip, and preach, and I will take care of your family," but he did say through an apostle that, "he that provideth not for his house hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." He also said it is a light thing if we administer unto you spiritual things that we should be partakers of your carnal things. He has said that, "they that preach the gospel shall live of the gospel," and I think that is all right, of the brethren in the One Faith have come to the conclusion the reader could eat old Bibles and clothe themselves with the cover or lids of the Bibles. Be aware, my dear brethren, that the poor you have with you always, and, that when you have laid up silver and gold, that it will perish, while you could have made many of your brethren comfortable. I can see that my dear brother, J. F. Wagoner, on account of not having the means, was driven to hard labor to keep soul and body together, as the old saying is, while some of the brethren have money out on interest,—"laying up treasure as though they expected to stay always," when Paul says, "having food and raiment, therewith be content." I see an appeal by Abraham Pontius, one of my old stand-by brethren—one of the old-fashioned Paul Christians—and to the brethren scattered abroad, for the aid of the dear RESTITUTION. There are plenty of brethren who are taking political [illegible] tremble for them. [illegible] partake too much of the spirit of the world. May the good Lord open their understanding ye, so that brethren can discern between Christianity and churchanity. May the good Lord bless and keep us all, and, finally save both reader and writer in his Kingdom, is my prayer. Amen.

I may say I get THE RESTITUTION regularly and like it much for the doctrine it advocates and the spirit in which it is conducted. It is refreshing to my mind to read the simple, artless letters which from time to time appear in the paper expressing their love for it and the principles taught there. It convinces me that the paper is a power for good at least in the rural districts of the west, and as such ought to have the support of all holding similar views of truth and desiring the good of mankind.

Our meeting in Brooklyn moves along quietly and harmoniously, patiently waiting and looking for the Lord from heaven and rejoicing in the hope of the glory of God. Our principal object now ought to be to see that we walk worthy of our high vocation, personal salvation, personal purity, consisting in our every day walk and conversation with the principles professed, for after all this is a powerful influence in the world and which the world does not overlook but inflexibly applies to all professors of Christianity. Hoping that we may all obtain an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ is the earnest prayer of your brother.

SELECTIONS.

[New Era.]

Prophecies Concerning Israel, Their Land and King, not yet Fulfilled.

Thus far, about a page of the New Era has been devoted to letters on the above Divine theme, the one above all others, if "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," God loves to dwell on—which more than all others evoked the sublime eloquence of the Spirit in the holy men of old by whom God revealed his purposes. Glorious things, gloriously spoken! Blessed are the ears that hear and the eyes that see, even afar off, and the hearts that are pursuaded of and embrace what the prophets have recorded of the future of Israel, their land and King. They have been "spirit and life" to the pilgrims of all ages, who, having the faith and hope of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, to whom God's promises were made, have looked for a city having foundations whose builder and maker is God, and "for a kingdom which cannot be moved;" both hereafter to be established in Palestine, "the 'only' land of promise,"—then to be a "heavenly country," hallowed by Immanuel's presence, and inherited by men who shall do God's will on earth as it is done by the angles in heaven.

Only to those who know the revealed future of Immanuel's land, and of Jerusalem, "the city of the great King," and of Zion, God's holy mountain, is the full significance of such Scriptures as the following apparent:

"Wait on the Lord and keep his way and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land." Psa. xxxvii. 34. "He that putteth his trust in me shall possess the land, and shall inherit my holy mountain." xxv. lvii. 13. "Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? Who shall dwell in thy holy hill?" Psalm. xv. 1, 2. "Who shall ascend into the Hill of the Lord? Or who shall stand in his holy place?" Psa. xxiv. 3, 4. "Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth," (or Land). Matt. v. 5.

The Line in all these and similar texts is the land which God promised to Abraham. The "holy mountain," "holy hill" and "city of the Lord," are one—Zion, whereon once stood the city of David, a city of palaces; now, and for centuries past, "plowed as a field," as foretold in Micah iii. 12, but hereafter to be the glorified dwelling-place of Immanuel—"the place of the soles of his feet, where he will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel forever."

Read and weep as Paul preached (Acts xxiii. 14; Isa. ii. 2; iv. 5; xxiv. 23; xxxi. 4; xxxiii. 20, 21; l. 4, 5, 10; xlvi. 7; Jer. xxxi. 10, 11; Micah iv. 12, compared with iv. 1, 2; Zech. ii. 5, 6, 10. To "inherit God's holy mountain," is equivalent to "inheriting the kingdom of God;" and to "inherit the kingdom of God" includes "judging the world," as may be seen by comparing 1 Cor. vi. 2, with verses 9 and 10. The saints, Christ's "joint heirs," are, with him, to "judge the world," as God's appointed kings, chosen out of Jews and Gentiles to share Christ's throne and kingdom, have power with him over the nations, reign with him on the earth. This is the doctrine of both the Old and New Scriptures. See Psa. lx. 8; lxvii. 4; xcvi. to 13; Micah iv. 1-8; Isa. xl.; when speak of that joyous day in which Christ shall judge and govern the nations in righteousness; then turn to 1 Cor. vi. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 12; Rev. i. 6; ii. 26, 27; iii. 21; v. 9, 10; which texts speak of the saints judging the world, reigning with Christ, receiving from Him "power over the nations," sitting down with him on his throne, and reigning "on the earth."

Such is the high and holy calling, or invitation, extended by God in his Gospel to Jews and Gentiles alike; an invitation unto the future kingdom and glory of his Son, an invitation to become joint heirs with the anointed King of Israel and of all the earth," (Zech. xiv. 9), and reign with him glorious, when, "having received the kingdom," he returns from heaven, (see Luke xix. 11-15); and as regards the calling or invitation wherewith every God-taught disciple of Christ is "called," see Rom. viii. 28, 30; 1 Cor. i. 9; Phil. iii. 14; 1 Thess. ii. 12; 2 Thess. ii. 14; 2 Tim. i. 9; Heb. iii. 1.

Whoever would be taught of God concerning the high and heavenly calling of the church, should study these texts, always bearing in mind the fundamental truth, that Jesus is "the Christ," (that is, "the King of Israel;" temporarily rejected by his nation, and seated at the right hand of God, till the time appointed for the resumption of His work on earth, as foretold by the prophets and preached by the apostles. Then he will suddenly return and gather unto himself in the air his saints from among the dead and the living; "the Lord knoweth them that are his," even "all that the Father hath given unto him," all who have walked "worthy of God" and of his high and holy calling. Blessed, then, shall those servants of Christ be who are found watching and ready at that momentous crisis! Alas, for those who in that day are not looking for him; not waiting, not loving his appearing. The disciple so found can hardly expect—in view of Heb. ix. 28; 2 Tim. iv. 8; 1 Thess. i. 10; Matt. xxv. 12—to be caught away to meet him. And it "left," then no crown of life and righteousness; no abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom; but weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth; useless, unavailing lamentations and trenblings; the door is shut! Oh! in view of the reality of the salvation there is to be obtained through Christ, with eternal glory how his disciples should give earnest heed to the warnings and exhortations of the Scriptures. "Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for strait is the gate, and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it. Many shall seek to enter in, and shall not be able. Let us labor to enter into that rest. So run that ye may obtain. Seeing ye look for such things, be diligent that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless. Follow peace with all men, and that holiness without which no man shall see the Lord. Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life. To him that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end, will I give power over the nations; and he shall rule them with a rod of iron. To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I overcame and am set down with my Father in his throne."

My reader, is not this future of Israel's King worth living for? worth suffering for? worth, if need be, dying for? No wonder that Paul, looking at these glorious, eternal things, could say: "I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." Rom. viii. 18. "In us," that is, in Christ's fellow heirs, who shall inherit God's holy mountain, where the glory is to be revealed, and where all flesh shall see it together. Isa. xl. 5; lx. 1, 2.—Omega.

The Boston Congregationalist says: "To Lieut. Col. Ingersoll blasphemy his Maker through two hours and a quarter, in a New York theatre the other evening, and the price of admission was given by crowds of men. They would have rebelled themselves heavily over the exorbitance of a church that should charge two cents per month for rent of a pew in God's house, for themselves and their families; and over the minister who should presume to preach more than forty minutes. And with about corresponding impotence does this apostle of atheism unroll the wealth of the Lord's blood, in vituperation at the 'professional liar who lies for pay'—for the support of pastors, toiling a year to help men upward, on less income than he receives for a single evening, by dragging men downwards. Consistency is a jewel, sirs, after all." Another paper remarks: "Robert Ingersoll having made $15,000 from his lectures last year, should be the last man to sneer at the 'hired and salaried clergy.'"

[World's Crisis]

"The Eternal Years are Long Enough."

BY A. T. HOBBIAL.

[A dear elder, who has suffered much from bodily affliction, writes: "I expect endless, immortal youth, unbending beauty, and strength like the angels, way down in the kingdom of God. I can say 'the eternal years are long enough.'"]

I wait for life's immortal crown on yonder sinless shore,
Whose pearl on my dim sight throws all born forevermore.
While victor-anthems proudly roll through-out the starry skies,
Where vaults of cloudless azure bend over Abba's paradise,
No yell of grief or din can my view, nor pang of mortal pain
Through those poor, weak, rec ll ss nerves can ever dart again;
Love-crowned and rai ed I shall stand upon the jasper sea,
Where God's eternal, sunlit years are long enough for me.

Immortal youth with magic wand shall touch my furrowed brow,
And "silver threads among the gold" shall gleam no more, as now;
Upon these faded, pallid cheeks, celestial bloom shall rise,
And new-born life and beauty burn forth from these weary eyes.
Time's ruthless eyes no'er can draw the ever-fresh'ning charms
Of them that roam the hills of light and dwell within His arms.
Ay, I can wait till from the curse of sin and sorrow free,
For God's eternal, sunlit years are long enough for me.

'Tis sad, indeed, from day to day to count life's pain and loss,
While woman weakness bows and shrinks beneath the heavy cross:
'Tis sad to sit with folded palms when there is work to do—
With God's rare vintage fully ripe, and le lucre so few.
Yet I can wait, for soon within that unseen land of song,
My purple pulse shall leap with joy—my trembling limbs be strong;
With hosts of heaven I shall see the king in beauty rise,
And God's eternal, sunlit years are long enough for me.

A trumpet-blast, a clarion call the air with warning thrills,
And deepening shadows darkly unroll upon the risen hills;
From plain and prairie, field and flood, every quickened sinner—
A sound as if of charging hosts—a rush of countless wings,
I halt with joy that warning note as ever on I roam,
The herald of that glorious day that ushers in "sweet home."
I wait amid the shades of night the rosy morn I see,
For God's eternal, sunlit years are long enough for me.

Then courage, courage, faltering heart! more courage, laggard hands!
Behold where at the myrtle door the royal Bridegroom stands!
How before the will of Him to whom my spirit clings—
The Star that o'er my lonely path its fa lest glory flings,
I see the distant turrets gleam I hear the angels sing;
I watch the sure, prophetic signs in grandeur sweep along,
With meekness—patience I will wait till One shall set me free,
Whose sunlit, smiling, endless years are long enough for me.

The Bible Versus Trinitarianism.

No. 1.

Yet to us there is but one God, the Father, out of whom are all things, and we for him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, through whom are all things, and we through him. Emphatic Diaglott. 1 Cor. viii. 6.

And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and him whom thou didst send, Jesus Christ. Emphatic Diaglott. John xvii. 3.

I. What is Trinitarianism?

II. Where did it come from?

III. Why has it been embraced by Protestants?

IV. Is it true?

I. Trinitarians teach that there are three distinct persons in the Godhead—the Father, Son and Holy Ghost; and that these three persons are the same in substance, equal in, power and glory; and constitute the one only God of the Bible, the Creator and upholder of all things.

They further teach that the Father is God, the Son is God and the Holy Ghost is God. Or, in other words, they say "God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost," thus making, if their position be the true one, really three Gods!

They also teach—notwithstanding its palpable absurdity, the system requiring it—that the Son of God, "the second person in the trinity," has existed co-eternally with the Father, thus contradicting the oft repeated declaration of inspiration that Christ is the Son of God, "the only begotten of the Father." Their poet sings,—

There is one God, and only one,
No rivals can His throne share;
He's Jehovah, He alone,
And with the Lord none can compare.

But the last stanza of the same hymn contradicts the above as follows:

All glory to the eternal Three,
The sacred undivided One;
To Father, Son, and Spirit be
Co-equal praise and honors done.

Another writes:

Great One in Three, great Three in One.

And then reverses it:

Great Three in One, great One in Three.

Then their true position is: Three Gods in one God, and one God in three Gods! Or, in other words, they claim there is only one "undivided" God, but that it requires three persons—God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, thus making three Gods, divided and named, notwithstanding the denial—to constitute the "one God" of the Bible. That we thus show (and shall further show) the absolute absurdity of this popular doctrine we do not deny, and that we correctly represent it in every feature we affirm. We have the same sentiment repeated by author s of their poets, as follows:

Adorable! Father, Spirit, Son,
Mysterious, dreadful, Three in One!
Before Thy throne we sinners bend,
Grace, pardon, life to us extend.

"Mysterious," indeed! that the Son of God—who must have been begotten in order to be a "Son," and who, the Scriptures say, was "begotten of the Father," and could not, therefore, have co-eternally existed with the Father—should be a fractional part of the God-head, or "the second person in the trinity," when, in order to be such, he must have always existed!

"Mystery" forsooth! that "the only begotten Son of God" should be "the supreme, self-existent God, the Creator of all things," older than himself being the Father, yet younger than himself being the Son; always existing, yet being begotten; "begotten by the Father," yet begetting himself; creating the universe, yet only "the heir of all things;" inherently possessing all power as the supreme God, yet dependent on the Father for the exercise; being the Creator and ruler of all, yet suffering and dying on the cross!

It is not my object to ridicule any doctrine that a Christian may have honestly embraced, and yet it is proper and a duty to expose the inconsistencies, contradictions and absurdities, if they exist, of any dogma the church, or any part of it, may have received and promulgated as truth.

II. Where did Trinitarianism come from? I answer, first negatively: It did not come from God, nor from Christ, nor from any inspired penman; in a word, then, it did not come from the Bible, though great and good men have supposed it to be therein taught. The Bible, as we shall see, very clearly teaches that, "there is but one God, the Father, and one Lord Jesus Christ"—that the Father—not the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, as alleged—is "the only true God," who, in the beginning, "created the heavens and the earth," whose only begotten Son is Jesus Christ, the Savi r of the world, born of the Virgin Mary—"made of a woman," who suffered and died under Pontius Pilate, whom God raised from the dead, who ascended on high, where he sitteth at the right hand of the Father as our intercessor, who shall soon come again without a sin-offering to judge the quick and the dead. This is in harmony with what is called the Apostle's Creed as at first adopted by the church.

The Apostle's Creed so called from having been written so soon after the apostolic age, being the creed of the two first Christian centuries, and, therefore, more likely to be the true teachings of the apostles than the Nicene creed, which is semi-trinitarian; or the creed of Athanasius, so-called, but probably not written till the fifth century by some one else, which is boldly and radically Trinitarian—does not enunciate, or even hint the doctrine of the Trinity; but recognizes "God the Father Almighty" as "the maker of heaven and earth, and Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord; who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, (spirit) and born of the Virgin Mary," etc. Whereas the first general church council called by Constantine—at the instigation of the opponents of Arius, who maintained that Christ, the Son of God was inferior to, (as Christ himself taught) and dependent on God the Father—and convened at Nice A. D., 325,—in the interest of the opinions of Athanasius, who taught the doctrine of the Trinity in unity on the principle that the Son of God was of the same substance and co-eternal with God the Father—adopted the following as the creed of the church: "I believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth; and of things visible and invisible. And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God; begotten of his Father before all worlds; God of (or from) God; light of (or from) light; very God of (or from) very God; begotten, not made; being of one substance with the Father; by whom all things were made; who for us men, and for our salvation, came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost (spirit) of the Virgin Mary; and was made man," etc.

But the action of this council did not fully decide the great contest between the followers of Arius and the followers of Athanasius; for, although upon this occasion, Arius was condemned and banished as a heretic, he was recalled ten years after ards by a council at Jerusalem, which agreed to accept his confession of faith as satisfactory. On the other hand, although Athanasius was for a time held in high favor, he was afterwards "five times expelled from his episcopal throne in Alexandria, and passed" twenty years as an exile or fugitive, whilst his doctrine fluctuated between honor and disgrace, just as his party or that of Arius prevailed."—Forrest's History of the Trin. But at length the victory resulted in favor of the adherents of Athanasius, towards the end of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth centuries, 11 Hist. and the Germanic nations, the Goths, Vandals and Lombards to whom the unity of the Godhead had been proclaimed by Arian missionaries, continued to the same faith for a century after the council of Nice, although they were soon anathematized and driven out as heretics from the Catholic-Universal church.

"And in consequence of this triunity," says Forrest in his history, "and because the doctrine of the conqueror was a step nearer than that of his opponent to Trinitarianism as afterwards prevalent, the unfortunate Arius has been abandoned by posterity to the despised fate of a heretic, while honors have been heaped in succession upon Athanasius, and his name has been recorded among those of the choicest champions of Orthodoxy, as well as of the most holy and revered saints of both eastern and western churches."

I here give this noted "Athanasian Creed"—omitting a few words of unnecessary repetition—which the reader will find so unlike anything found in the Bible, and which, as is believed by learned men, was produced by Vigilius, of Tapsa, who flourished in the latter end of the fifth century, "one who was known," says Forrest, (quoting Bingham, Jortin and Dr. Cave, authors,) "to be the fabricator of various writings, which he published as the works of Athanasius." "But, whoever was its author," says Forrest, "it was not much known till towards the end of the sixth century, when it began to be commented on by its 'admirers.' Several centuries afterwards it was successively introduced into France, Spain, Germany, Italy, and England, where it still forms part of the public worship. But it has been disputed whether it was ever received among the Greek churches." And, let me add that, it is the same unscriptural, contradictory, and absurd doctrine—gradually developed in the third and fourth centuries when the church had lost much of the true light, but more fully brought out in its completeness by the action of the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon in A. D. 431 and 451, when, in addition to the Trinitarian creed it was "decreed that the Virgin Mary should be received and honored as a supplement to the Trinity under the title of Theotokos, or mother of God"—that is now held and believed by the "Orthodox" church!

"Whosoever will be saved, before all things it is necessary that he hold the Catholic faith; which faith except every one do keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly." And the Catholic faith is this, that we worship one God in Trinity, and Trinity in unity; neither confounding the persons nor dividing the substance. For there is one person of the Father, another of the Son, and another of the Holy Ghost; but the Godhead of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is all one; the glory equal, the majesty co-eternal. Such as the Father is, such is the Son, and such is the Holy Ghost; the Father uncreate, the Son uncreate, and the Holy Ghost uncreate; the Father incomprehensible, the Son incomprehensible, and the Holy Ghost incomprehensible; the Father eternal, the Son eternal, and the Holy Ghost eternal; and yet they are not three eternals, (!) but one eternal; as also there are not three incomprehensibles, nor three uncreated, but one uncreated, and one incomprehensible. So likewise the Father is Almighty, the Son Almighty and the Holy Ghost Almighty; and yet they are not three Almighties, but one Almighty. So the Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Ghost is God; and yet there are not three Gods, but one God(!) .... And in this Trinity none is afore or after the other, (If this be true, the Son of God was not "begotten,"] none is greater or less than the other; [Christ said, "My Father is greater than I,"] but the whole three persons are co-eternal together, and co-equal. So that in all things, as is aforesaid, the unity in trinity and the Trinity in unity is to be worshipped. He therefore that will be saved, must thus think of the trinity. Furthermore, it is necessary to everlasting salvation, that he also believe rightly the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ. For the right faith is, that we believe and confess that our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is God and man; God of the substance of the Father, begotten before the worlds, [if then, he was thus "begotten," he was not co-eternal with the Father,] and man of the substance of his mother, born in the world; perfect God, and perfect man; of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting; equal to the Father as touching his Godhead, and inferior to the Father as touching his manhood. Who, although he be God and man, yet he is not two, but one Christ; one, not by conversion of the Godhead into flesh, but by taking of the manhood into God; one altogether; not by confusion of substance, but by unity of person; for as the reasonable soul and flesh is one man, so God and man is one Christ. Who suffered for our salvation, descended into hell, rose again the third day from the dead, he ascended into heaven, he sitteth on the right hand of the Father God Almighty, from whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. At whose coming all men shall rise again with their bodies, and shall give account of their own works; and they that have done good shall go into life everlasting, and they that have done evil into everlasting fire. This is the Catholic faith, which except a man believe faithfully, he cannot be saved. Glory to the Father," etc.

It must be palpable to every candid person that this Trinitarian Creed is not only contradictory as to the principal point, but absolutely absurd and contrary to scripture facts.

Take the one point—the assumption that Christ is self-existent and equal with the Father in all respects, as he must be, if he be the second person in the Trinity—and how, in the name of reason I ask, can he be the Son of God, when, in order to be such, he must be begotten by the Father, who must exist before the Son in order to beget a son? I affirm, then, without the fear of successful contradiction that, if Christ is "the only begotten son of God, as the Scriptures declare, he is not, and cannot be the second person in the Trinity. This creed says: "The Father is made of none, neither created, nor begotten. The Son is of the Father alone; is not made, the apostle says he was "made of a woman," and is of his mother, he was made of the Father also, nor created, but begotten."

Thus we have a begging of the main question by the unfounded and absurd assumption that, the Son of God existed as a personal, living being before he was begotten by the Father—"begotten before the worlds," as the creed has it. If he was "begotten," then he was "brought into being." Beget, means "to procreate, as a father or sire, to generate, to get," says Webster. So it is very evident that Christ, as a personal being, did not exist till he was begotten by the Father.

Having shown, I think, (1) negatively that Trinitarianism did not come from the Bible; and, (2) positively that it [illegible] tion [illegible] and Chalcedon, resulting in the establishment of the Creed Power throughout Christendom, I proceed to answer more fully (for the above anticipates the answer) question.

III. Why has Trinitarianism been embraced by Protestants? I answer unhesitatingly because of the Creed Power. They have embraced it, because the church somehow pronounced it to be the true doctrine of the church! Those pro-tem-fathers, in that comparatively ignorant and corrupt age settled the question, so far as liberty of belief and speech were concerned, almost as effectually as if it had been proclaimed from high heaven by God himself.

Thus, by an assumed popish authority (for there is no authority in the Bible, nor necessity, for making creeds) this absurd dogma has been palmed off upon the great body of the unsuspecting Christian church, as the true or Orthodox faith. Napoleon Bonaparte well understood the power of authority and law. So when he had any great project in view, about which there was a doubt of its legality, or of its being acceptable to the people of France, he, instead of foolishly acting the tyrant, had only to give the cue to some friend or friends in the assembly, and, lo, the coveted project was forthwith clothed with all the authority of law; and that satisfied the people and settled the question.

So, when a large body of bishops do congregate to make a creed for the universal church, whether Scriptural or unscriptural, harmonious or contradictory, truthful or absurd, it is expected that the church will accept it, and quite natural that she should embrace it. Thus it was in the era of church councils, and thus it is now with regard to the creeds of the different church sects.

It is true, however, that there have been in all times and are now some independent thinkers and actors, who have not and will not believe, embrace, or obey—even at the sacrifice of losing caste, of being called heretics and excommunicated, or burned at the stake as such,—the ipse dixit of any man, the popish creed of any church, the decree (ex cathedra) of any council, or the bull of any pope.

The intelligent reader need not be informed that, at a very early day in the Christian era, even in the first and second centuries, as before intimated, the church fell into some grievous errors and embraced some false doctrines, so that gradually the way was prepared after a few centuries for the full manifestation of Paul's "man of sin," "the mystery of iniquity," that he said was already working in his day—the "antichrist"—that Bloody, persecuting power which has murdered more than fifty millions of God's dear saints, and has it the same [illegible] and continues to murder on, if it were possible, the true church of Christ would be exterminated. And this is the corrupt and wicked church of Rome which has not only handed down to Protestants the doctrine of the Trinity in all its absurdity, even to the calling of Mary, the mother of God, but the respective doctrine of the immortality of the soul, which Luther said was only found "among the Roman dunghill of decretals, lack of which Protestants have received and embraced as the true doctrines of the Bible. And, in addition to these as corner-stone of the latter, they have more slowly received the unscriptural and irrational doctrine of endless torment in an endless, unscriptural hell—the papist's purgatory, out of which, for money, the priests, through "the intercession of saints," deliver "immortal souls." (!)

The fact is that a large and powerful trap was adroitly prepared and carefully set by the arch enemy of man, that old serpent, which is the devil, and so skillfully covered up with the deceptive sophistry that God had not in the Bible enunciated in sufficiently plain terms the true doctrines of the gospel; and had not in explicit words given definite directions for church organization and church government, that a revolt was laid to the convocation of church councils from which emanated the wonderful creed power, which, as before stated, has been handed down by the church of Rome; and Protestants—notwithstanding the glorious results of the reformation, which delivered them, in a good degree, from the Roman yoke and Roman power—have not, and, in all probability will not be fully delivered from this powerful creed-trap placed by Satan. But in his machinations against the people of God, however, in so far as holding them in that anti-christian church of his own invention is concerned, with the object of their ultimate destruction, Satan has been utterly foiled. For, in the [illegible] voice was heard [illegible] that ye receive not of her plagues. For her sins have reached into heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities."

Although the reformation of Luther and his coadjutors gave new life to the church of Christ, and a better hope for the world, the power of written creeds (though fundamentally produced in an ignorant and superstitious age) and the power of tradition was such as to forestall a complete deliverance of the church from the egregious errors and the manifested inconsistencies of Pagan and Papal Rome. Hence the creed power, although very strong, was not strong enough to hold in one fold all of Christ's sheep. For as men were permitted, and began to think and investigate for themselves, they became dissatisfied with parts of this and that creed, until the creeds (the creed power being Omnipotent) were multiplied, and division followed division till there are now a thousand Christian sects, which, with few exceptions, are so bound up by their creeds to special doctrines and special church government that—though each sects differ on some points from all the rest—they can see nothing in the Bible outside their creeds. And among the lamentable fruits of all these divisions and sub-divisions—besides the enormous expense of supporting sectarianism, and aside from the selfishness, the strife, the endless contentions and consequent heart-burnings among Christians, all of which are not small matters—is this one—that the church of Christ has been greatly shorn of her strength and power for good, by thus furnishing a most powerful weapon for evil which the ungodly, the skeptic and infidel, have not failed to use with destructive effect in poisoning the minds of men, thereby holding them in unbelief, and keeping them from the church of God.

BREVITIES.

A Roman Catholic journal of Milan says, since 1870, the Protestants have built fourteen new churches in free Rome; opened many schools, asylums, meeting rooms; given away millions of Bibles and tracts; distributed alms, and made use of various means to induce the sheep to enter their fold.

Capt. Snowden, of the Philadelphia mint says American coinage is more meritorious than that of any other country. While English sovereigns and French francs are nearly always below the standard fineness, out of many hundred millions which he has delivered of United States money, not a single package of $5,000 has ever varied like part of an ounce.

Mr. H. O. Dwight furnishes the following statement of books sent out from the Bible House at Constantinople during the last year: The American and British and Foreign Bible Societies agencies sent to various sections of Turkey 50,015 copies of the Bible, or Portions; 4,000 of these going to the hands of Moslems. There were also sent 4,852 copies to Greece. From the same house, the four Missions of the Board sent out 61,250 copies of religious and educational books, and 61,200 tracts. These sales are larger than the sales of any previous year.

[American Missionary Herald, July.]

The recent remarkable religious movement in France, though it has come suddenly to view, seems to be the result of much previous labor in the distribution of the Word of God. Rev. Dr. Fisch, of Paris, says that four million copies of the Scriptures have been sold in France; that all the young men in the army have been taught to read the Gospel of John, and that 500,000 young men know that Gospel by heart; and that 109,000 soldiers driven into Protestant Switzerland during the late war, have returned to France, each with a New Testament and various religious tracts. Surely God's Word does not return unto him void.

DEEP-SEA SOUNDINGS.

A few years ago it was considered a feat in deep-sea sounding to reach a mile or a mile and a half, and even then, after allowance had been made for the action of currents upon the line, the actual depth attained was a good deal matter of calculation and guess. Breakages also were continu- [illegible] ord in comparison with the weight of the lead. The modern method by which the lead detaches itself at the bottom meets that as well as several other difficulties nearly as important, and the wonder is that it was not thought of sooner. Now there is scarcely any limit to the depth of the sea, which the recent explorations of the Challenger go far to show to be in accordance with the theory that its greatest depth is equivalent to the height of the highest elevations above its level. The deepest sea soundings yet effected by the Challenger were obtained this year in the abysses off New Guinea, depths which have occasioned a sharp line of demarcation between Asia and Australasia. The "lead" weighed 4 cwt., and struck bottom at the tremendous depth of 4,575 fathoms, or 27,450 feet.

GARDENS OF CHINA.

Around Shanghai lie 60,000 square miles, which are called the Garden of China, and which have been tilled for countless generations. This area is as large as New York and Pennsylvania combined; it is all meadow land, raised a few feet above the river—lakes, rivers, canal, a complete network of Water communication; the land is under the highest cultivation; three crops a year are gathered; population so dense that wherever you look you see men and women in blue pants and blouse, so numerous that you fancy some muster or fair coming off, and all hands turned out for a holiday. No one can deny that the Chinese are an industrious people.

At Bombay, only a few days ago, the Parsees dedicated a Tower of Silence—one of those horrible structures upon the top of which they expose their dead to be devoured by vultures. These birds come to regard the tower-tops as their feeding grounds, and sit around, like architectural monsters, waiting for death to send them their meat of human flesh. The dedicatory exercises in this new tower were mercifully held in secret, and a tablet placed on the tower announces that its use is restricted to "those only who profess the Zoroastrian religion." By immemorial usage, the first body exposed to the Indian sun and vultures must be that of a young child. Of all methods of disposing of the dead bodies of our kind, that of feeding them to the vultures on a tower of silence which has been consecrated by the priests of Zoroaster seems the most repulsive and terrible.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Christian household of the nineteenth century.—The chain of investigation leads into a position of no ordinary character. We cannot, however, do justice to our convictions of truth and cover what we believe to be the true standing of the masses of the Christian household. If the churches generally, when compared with the apostolic church, are Orthodox, then let us [illegible] their due and proper honor; but, if, on the contrary, the comparison shows a wide departure in faith and practice, let us not fear to declare it.

The Christian household is composed of many sects, more or less nationalized, as they are found to contain a greater or less number of civil elements. It may be asked, why object to civil elements in the church? We answer: 1. The apostolic churches were free from civil power. 2. Civil powers, in the form of Gentile governments, have always been, and will always be enemies to Christ and his household. This lesson is taught us by the metallic image and the stone; by the four beasts of Daniel, and by the beasts of Revelation. Christ was put to death by officers of the fourth monarchy. 3. The final great struggle is with the nations of the earth. 4. The entire book of Revelations shows a continued struggle between Christ and earth's monarchies. The apostolic church, under the symbol of a sun-clad star-crowned woman, is driven into the wilderness by the Roman Empire, under its symbol of Paganism—the great red dragon. Further on we see the same household persecuted and slain by the fourth monarchy, under the symbol of a scarlet colored wild beast under the control of an apostate Christian church, symbolized by a woman drunken with the blood of saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus. Rev. xvii. 6, 5. And it is thus written, "And I saw the beast (the fourth monarchy) and the kings of the earth, and their armies gathered together to make war against him (Christ) that sat on the horse, and against his army." Rev. xix. 19. 6. All the symbols in the Apocalypse, where the church apostate is a persecutor, it is associated with civil power. The church that IS PERSECUTED is never thus combined. The diadem of the world belongs to Christ and his pure people; the kingdoms of this world belong to Christ by conquest, as well as by right. Rev. xi. 15. The apostolic church had but one husband, —"Christ." 7. We grade the degree of apostacy in the Christian household by the strength of its civil elements, since these elements are now the property of Christ's deadly foe. We deemed this explanation necessary to a proper understanding of the remarks that follow. Let our position be fully understood. Christ's commission, "Go teach all nations," does not authorize the church to exercise any civil authority over its members. The law of love and the teaching of the Bible, in the hands of converted, prudent men, are the governing elements of the family of Christ. Each divine head did not bind his disciples to be under any other institution relative to their future than that furnished in his own inspired volume. The least departure, in this age, from the provisions of teaching, is the first step to apostacy.

Seven churches—their civil standards.—Paul said: "The mystery of iniquity doth already work." From the results that followed the next eighteen centuries we conclude that civil power was the primary feature of the apostacy. It was the rule of Paganism, and was in after time poison unto Christianity. It overthrew the Jewish Theocracy, and caused their final banishment from the land of their nativity. God is a God that claims the dominion of the earth for his beloved Son. Christ's family are to reign with Him as joint-heirs. The Christian era is, therefore, the period designed to gather out and instruct a people for his name. They are to be educated and kept as a peculiar people. Let us view the several churches as they have departed from the primitive simplicity, and allied themselves with great national usurpers.

1. The Latin church.—Christianity assumed control of the Roman Empire under Constantine the Great, A. D. 323. Its supremacy dates a few centuries later. Its power over the western or Latin nations was supreme during a period of 1260 years. That Romanism is the chief apostate power described in the Apocalypse, is the voice of the Protestant world. Its acts are written in and with the blood of millions of the martyrs of Jesus; and though its civil arm is broken, it is still an apostate power. We do not look into this division of the modern household for the "faithful and wise servant." It rights over the loss of the [illegible] to quit constantine [illegible] in the proclamation to [illegible] to seat man, [illegible] on Saturday [illegible] the abundance of her deliverance [illegible] cry, alas, that great city. Enter her proud temples; see her semi-pagan ceremonies, if this is a party of that once quiet and humble family of the meek and lowly Jesus, who suffered under Pontius Pilate?

2. The Greek church.—This may be called the Protestant church of the sixth century. It was a separation from the Latin church. The following circumstance caused the division: "A dispute arose relative to the procession of the Holy Ghost (commenced about the sixth century); one party affirming that it was sent from the Father and the Son; the other, that it came from the Father only. Ignatius was deposed by Photius, from the office of patriarch of Jerusalem, by whom he was succeeded. Pope Nicholas, for that act, deposed Photius. Photius, assembling an ecumenical council, deposed the Pope, and had it subscribed to by twenty-one bishops and others, amounting to one thousand persons. Other causes operating, made the division wide-spread and permanent. They deny the authority of the Pope; practice trine immersion; do not immerse persons under three years of age; deny the existence of purgatory; nor do they pay any religious homage to the eucharist. They rejected many other idolatrous practices of the Latin church; still they were far from the simplicity of the apostolic church, and their practices. The Greek church occupies the most of Greece, Wallachia, Moldavia, (formerly thus called,) Egypt, Abyssinia, Nubia, Libya, Arabia, Mesopotamia, Syria, Cilicia and Palestine; these being under the jurisdiction of the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem. The Russians belong to the Eastern, or Greek church. It is now independent of the patriarch of Constantinople, who is the head of the other Eastern churches. The Russian church, having the emperor as its head, has the controling influence of the Greek church as opposed to the Latin, or Western church.

Under the heads of Greek and Latin churches we reckon all nominal Christians who acknowledge the patriarch of Constantinople, the Emperor of Russia and the Pope as their visible heads. They constitute the mass of Christians, dividing the human family into three classes—Pagan, Mahometan and Christian.

3. Church of England.—This church is a national establishment, having a visible head—the sovereign, and exists by civil enactments. Henry VIII., falling out with the Pope, took the supreme control of church matters, and crowned himself the supreme head of the church. It is episcopal in its form, and has what is called a liturgy. Most of the inhabitants belong to that establishment; "but, perhaps, very few either of her ministers or members strictly adhere to the articles in their true sense."

4. The Calvinistic, or church of France.—This church is not a national establishment, like that of England, since the Pope is its visible head; yet it possesses more or less of the civil element, its revenues are from the state, and, consequently, has a national character.

5. Church of Scotland.—This church is established by law, and is, in form, Presbyterian. We have, at present, nothing to do with its doctrines. The civil element is what now concerns us. We are tracing this foreign element in its various forms through modern Christendom.

6. The church of the German Empire.—The Roman Catholic and the Protestant churches have each been sustained by government funds, and, therefore, more or less, under government restrictions. Humanists, recently have attempted to free themselves from these civil restrictions, but failed. The European ecclesiastical establishments are principally, more dependant upon the civil arm than the purity and simplicity of the gospel would allow; for, in gathering out a people from all nations, they should be free from all national prejudice, so that they could live in harmony as citizens of one government, that from heaven. Phil. iii. 20. Ex pluribus unum, is the motto of every true Christian. Out of many, one. Out of every nation, kindred, tongue and people, one nation under the future reign of the coming Messiah. The commission, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to [illegible] nations; [illegible] in the proclamation to [illegible] the Gentiles, and a people is being called out and prepared for his name.

7. Other Protestant churches.—What relationship do the American Protestant churches sustain to the civil government? Have they any civil element in their church organization. We affirm that they have. The Protestant churches are generally incorporated as denominations and as individual congregations. They have, therefore, a civil life as well as an ecclesiastical existence. They have all the civil rights of other civil bodies, such as counties, towns, cities and states. As a civil body, they can hold property; sue and be sued. The churches are very truly political-ecclesiastical communities, having the right, as churches, to acquire and hold any property. They are thus made members of the great political household. It can guide the civil arm, and, in this sense, it rides on the civil power. This power is similar to that established under Constantine the Great; with this exception, perhaps, that all denominations have the opportunity of acquiring equal civil authority.

What we desire to be specially noticed, is this: This civil power is a foreign element, since no religious body possesses it except it is incorporated. They can, as a religious body, neither buy nor sell; neither can they hold, nor recover, by law, any property of any former purchase. The state does not know such a body. The state must beget, by its own act, before they can be recognized as its children. Incorporation is the civil act of creation and adoption. Incorporated churches are civil bodies — unincorporated churches are not.

Isaiah xxii. 1-6.

My Dear Brother:—I was well pleased with your last article published in THE RESTITUTION some weeks since, and glad of the corrections which you made of the oft-repeated applications of Isaiah lxiii. 1-6.

But now while you have made these corrections, I desire to add one more to the list. It is often said that this Scripture finds its fulfillment in the purported ascension of Jesus and the saints from Sinai to Jerusalem to establish his kingdom: and that the winepress which he has trodden is the destruction of our resurrected unjust, as it is claimed that there is to be a contemporaneous resurrection and judgment of the just and unjust.

To remove this error and to make this misapplication apparent, I will note a few points in chronological order.

CHRONOLOGICAL EVENTS.

1. When Jesus comes there will be a resurrection of the household—those that are his. 1 Cor. xv. 23.

2. The judgment of the household. 2 Cor. v. 10; Rom. xiv. 12.

3. The Lord's advent to Jerusalem with the saints. Jude 5. 14, 15; Zech. xiv. 1, 5.

4. The salvation of the Lord's of Judah and the destruction of his enemies. Zech. xii. 7-14; Ezekiel xxxviii. 19.

5. The sealing of the 144,000 from the twelve tribes of Israel. Rev. vii. 2-8.

6. At the organization of the Kingdom the Lamb with the saints—four beasts and twenty-four elders—upon the throne, and the 144,000 before them with their harps. Rev. xiv. 1-5.

7. The first angel's message to the nations. Rev. xiv. 6, 7.

8. The second angel's message pronouncing the fall of Babylon. Rev. xiv. 8.

9. The third angel's message pronouncing judgment upon the beast. Rev. xiv. 9-11.

10. The visitation of these judgments in which, or during which the winepress is trodden. Rev. xiv. 14-20; xix. 15; Isaiah lxiii. 16.

Now, if in this Scriptural course of events, as here given, number ten can be gathered up and dropped back simultaneous with number two, then this oft-repeated application of Isaiah lxiii. 1-6 will have some plausibility. But, from the proper arrangement of these events, as here given, two points are very plain,—

1. That the treading of the winepress is long subsequent to the judgment of the household and the establishment of the kingdom.

2. That the parties trodden in the winepress are not resurrected, unjust ones, but the nations. How harmonious and beautiful are the expositions which the Bible gives to itself.

Prophecies Concerning Israel, Their Land and King, not yet Fulfilled.

Note:—In this the seventh letter on the above divine theme, I propose to call the reader's attention to certain prophecies wherein Israel's future prowess and triumphs are foretold.

Among the miraculous events which accompanied the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, their forty years sojourn in the wilderness, and their taking possession of the land of promise under Joshua, probably none are more marvelous than some of the victories gained by Israel over their Gentile enemies. The dividing of the Red Sea; its walls of water; the dry roadway between them; the pillar of cloud by day; the pillar of fire by night; the streams out of the smitten rock; the manna, like corn of heaven, the food of angels, (Ps. lxxviii. 24, 25) found during the first six days of every week in the wilderness; the two cubits high of fowls rained down for the distance of a day's journey on this side and that of Israel's camp, Num. xi. 31; the glory of Jehovah, like devouring fire, seen upon Sinai, Exod. xxiv. 17; his glorious voice, heard by all the people out of the midst of the fire, when he declared unto them his covenant, the ten commandments; Deut. iv. 10, 11; the glory of Moses' face when he came down from the divine presence; Exod xxxiv. 29, 34; these and other manifest miracles, were not more really the work of God than the victories achieved by these shepherds and brickmakers, utterly ignorant of the art of war, over the mighty kings and their hosts—giants, some of them—in the days of Moses and Joshua, Gideon and Jonathan. What a Captain had Israel in those days! "The enemy said, I will pursue, I will overtake; I will divide the spoil; my lust shall be satisfied upon them; I will draw the sword, my hand shall destroy them." Israel's Captain stretched out his right hand, the sea covered them! Exod. xv. Anon[illegible] comes out against the Lord's host, Moses' hands are lifted up, and Israel prevails! An overflowing river has to be crossed to reach a part of the promised land, as soon as the soles of the feet of the priests that bear the ark of the Lord are dipped in the brim of the water, the water that comes down the river Jordan and rises up upon an heap, and all the people pass over on dry land! Joshua iii. 16. A walled city has to be taken; the Captain of Joshua v. 14) of the Lord's host gives Joshua his orders, (vi. 2) and as he foretold, after going round the city for six days, without a word being spoken, on the seventh day, having compassed it seven times, the people shout with a great shout, and the wall falls down flat! Chap. vi. 20. Five kings, with their hosts make war against a people with whom Israel had made a league, and Israel's aid is entreated; Joshua with all the people of war go up against them, and they are discomfited, and flying from before Israel, the Lord casts down upon them great stones, by which more die than by the sword of Israel! Then, also, the Lord hearkens unto the voice of Joshua, and the sun stands still in the midst of heaven, and hastes not to go down about a whole day! Joshua x. 13. Again, a vast host, like grasshoppers for multitude, invades Israel, to destroy their land, and the Lord is entreated. An angel appears unto Gideon, and commissions him to save Israel; with three hundred unarmed men, each with a trumpet, and a pitcher, with a lamp in it, Gideon at night surrounds the enemy's camp. Standing every man at his appointed place, the three hundred blow their trumpets and break their pitchers, and cry, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." All the mighty host ran, and cried, and fled, and the Lord sets every man's sword against his fellow throughout all the host, and there are slain an hundred and twenty thousand that drew sword! Judges vii., viii. On another occasion, the Philistines gathered against Israel, with thirty thousand chariots, six thousand horsemen, and people as the sand which is on the sea shore for multitude, and Israel are without arms, save Saul and Jonathan. 1 Sam. xiii.-5. Jonathan says to his armor bearer, "Come, and let us go over unto the garrison of these uncircumcised, it may be that the Lord will work for us, for there is no restraint to the Lord to save by many or by few." The result is most astonishing. The Philistines "fall before Jonathan, and his armor bearer slays after him." "There is trembling in the host, in the field, and among all the people; the garrison and the spoilers, they also tremble, and the earth quakes! And the multitude melts away, and they go on beating down one another. . . . . Every man's sword is against his fellow, and there is a very great discomfiture." 1 Sam. xiv. 1, 20.

And so it will be in the future, as surely as the God of Israel lives, and is not unmindful of what he inspired his holy prophets to predict. Israel's miraculous victories in the past are, and should be regarded as, the earnest of what is to come. The Gentile nations, and their rulers, who know not the Scriptures of the prophets, little think of the role Israel has to act in the future. Little dream that Israelites, such as Moses and Joshua and Gideon led on to victory, will in God's appointed time, prove more than a match for the disciplined millions, that shall be arrayed against them. That, in the day of righteous vengeance upon nations which have hated and persecuted and slain Israel "the remnant of Jacob shall be among the Gentiles as a lion among the beasts of the forest, as a young lion among the flocks of sheep; who, if he go through, both treadeth down, and teareth in pieces, and none can deliver. Thine hand shall be lifted up upon thine adversaries, and all thine enemies shall be cut off. . . . And I will execute vengeance in anger and fury upon the heathen, such as they have not heard." Micah v. 8, 9, 15. Never since Jacob has become a scattered remnant among the nations has he been "like a lion among the beasts," or "like a young lion among the flocks." Nor has all Israel's "enemies been cut off." Neither has the Lord through Israel's instrumentality executed unheard of vengeance (for the blood of Israel) upon the Gentiles. Hence, Micah's prophecy must be fulfilled in the future. But, the Lord says more by Micah, concerning Israel's prowess in the time to come. In chapter vii. 15-17, God says, "According to the days of thy coming out of the land of Egypt will I show unto him (Israel) marvelous things. The nations shall see and be confounded at all their might; they shall lay their hand upon their mouth, their ears shall be deaf. They shall lick the dust like a serpent, they shall move out of their holes, like worms of the earth, they shall be afraid of the Lord our God, and shall fear because of thee." How significant is the first verse above quoted. Let the reader think of the marvelous things shown by God to Israel in the day he brought them out of Egypt, and he may have some conception of the future. Let us remember the days of Moses, Joshua, Gideon and Jonathan, and we may form some idea of that "great day of Jezreel" (see Hosea i. 11) in which the nations—Russia, Germany, Austria, France, Britain, and so forth—shall see Israel's might," and be "confounded" at it! The Lord's hand shall be lifted up on behalf of Israel, as of old, but Pharaoh-like kings and faithless ignorant hosts of Gentiles will not see it. The Lord will gather their armies into his land, as sheaves are gathered into the floor, to be threshed by Zion's sons who shall "beat in pieces many nations," whose "gain shall be consecrated unto the Lord, and their substance unto the Lord of the whole earth," as God by Micah, iv. 12, 13, hath foretold.

In another letter, this subject of Israel's future victories over the nations will be, God willing, continued. —Omega.

SENTENTIOUS PARAGRAPHS.

The more a man knows about any subject the greater will be his charity for and sympathy with views differing from his own.

There is in every human countenance either a history or a prophecy, which must sadden, or at least soften, every reflecting observer.

The seat of knowledge is in the head; of wisdom, in the heart. We are sure to judge wrong if we do not feel right.—Hazlitt.

There is a lesson in each flower,
A story in each stream and bower;
On every hero up which you tread,
Are written words which rightly read,
Will lead you from earth's fragrant sod
To hope, and holiness and God.

Our life is like Alpine countries, where winter is found by the side of summer, and where it is but a step from a garden to a glacier.

Polished steel will not shine in the dark; no more can reason, however refined or cultivated, shine efficaciously, but as it reflects the light of divine truth shed from heaven.—John Foster.

True godliness is true and eternal riches, for it has the "promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." Seek to be truly godly, and you are rich to all intents and purposes.

Measure not life by the hopes and enjoyments of this world, but by the preparation it makes for another; looking to what you shall be, rather than to what you may have been.

A LITTLE LONGER.

Yet a little longer labor,
Toil, for day is not yet done;
For the rest that you are longing,
You must wait till set of sun.

Yet a little longer labor,
Sow the seed in many a field;
Somewhere still a golden harvest
Waits its ripening grain to yield.

A NEW CREATURE.

Creative power is Almighty power. It takes Almighty power to create a man at first, and it requires the same power to create a man anew. To make a bad man into a good man by a sudden and radical change, is something which God alone can do. We may try the arts of persuasion, we may entreat and exhort and invite, but all will be in vain. Nothing but the power of Almighty God will change the Ethiopian's skin, and wash the leopard's spots, and make the vile and rebellious and sinful son of Adam a child of God and an heir of glory.

I dreamt I saw a rosy child
In a garden playing;
Now stopping here, and now afar off straying,
A flower or butterfly his feet beguiled.

'Twas hanged, one day I stepped aside
To let him pass; his face had manhood learning,
And that bright eye of blue was fondly yearning
On a fair maiden whom he called his bride.

Again 'twas evening, and the cheerful fire
I saw a group of youthful forms surrounding;
The room with manifest pleasantry resounding,
And in the midst I marked the smiling sire.

Tears then were clouded, and I heard the tone
Of a slow-moving bell; the white-haired man was gone.

THE RESTITUTION.

R. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JULY 28, 1859.

We again direct the attention of our readers to the advertisement of the American Book Exchange which will be found in another part of our paper. Here is an opportunity presented to obtain works of standard value, and at prices that are exceedingly low. To obtain the Encyclopædia for the small sum for which it is offered during July write without delay.

In presenting our views on the first principles of the Gospel, let us speak and write in the spirit of love. We are all liable to mistakes and misapprehensions however honest and sincere we may be in our study of God's word. It was necessary, even in the Apostolic age, to instruct a very eloquent preacher, who was mighty in the Scriptures, more perfectly into their meaning. It would have been exceedingly impolite to have brauded the inadvertent errors of Apollos as falsehoods.

COMMUNICATIONS.

The Faith of the Gospel.

He that believeth on Him (the Son) is not condemned. He that believeth not the Son hath everlasting life. John iii 18, 36.

Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved. Acts xvi. 31.

We have a class of men that are now "compassing sea and land" to make proselytes, and the above texts constitute the bone and sinew of their preaching. Meet them where you will and they have one question, "are you saved?" and one denunciation or sentence, "you are going to hell." If you tell them "you are saved" they seemed to be disappointed. If you tell them you hope you are saved, they have only to say, "you are going to hell," you are not saved, and then "come down on you with the above texts," telling you, "just believe and you are saved." Yes, saved with an everlasting salvation. You cannot go astray and be lost, for you are saved with a perfect and eternal salvation through faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, who has done everything necessary to secure your salvation, and left nothing for you to do that is to save yourself. 'Tis true, if you believe, and are saved, you will work out of gratitude or love to God, because "God works in you," not to save yourself, but, because you are saved. Strange to tell, after making the most positive assertion that the sinner can do nothing to save himself, perhaps you will hear them cry twenty times in one discourse, "believe, or you will go to hell;" "believe, or you will go to hell." Thus telling them to do something, after teaching they can do nothing. One of them, even a preacher, said to me, "If I have so much to do as to raise my hand above my head to save myself, I may boast." Now, suppose this gentleman could succeed in making all sinners believe what he says, how many converts would he make? I say to a sinner, come, go and hear the preacher; you are an unbeliever, and he wants to make you believe in order that you may be saved. He and his fellows have put up a great tent for some purpose, and, I suppose, it is to save sinners, or, at least, to make them believe "and be saved." But, hold on, he says, Did you not hear him say, "If the sinner did as much as to raise his hand above his head to secure his salvation he could boast?" Now, I shall have to put one foot before the other a great many times to go to that tent, and do a great deal more than simply raise my hand higher than my head. Well, I say, "faith comes by hearing the word of God." Search the Scriptures, then. Ah, says he, that is a great deal more than to raise my hand. No, I will not do the least thing; if God wants me saved, here I am, willing to be saved. Let him save me; I am not going to do anything to obtain faith. "Faith is the gift of God," and, if he has given it to the preacher without doing anything, let him give to me. I know God gives us food and raiment, but we have a hand in that, and, if we did not plow, and sow, and raise sheep, we would go hungry and naked, and we reason that God gives us faith, but that comes by hearing, and, in order to hear, we may have to read, or go some distance to hear. But, the preacher says, we must not do the least thing. Paul was sent to turn men "from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God," "and was made all things to all men, that he might by all means save some," and said to his son Timothy, "Take heed to thyself and the doctrine; for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself and them that hear thee." Acts xxvi. 18; 1 Cor. ix. 22; 1 Tim. iv. 16.

Now, we have no idea that Paul or Timothy had the most distant inclination to boast over God, or even dreamed that they were robbing God or his blessed Son of any glory, because they were "workers together with him" in the great work of salvation. A father finds land and seed to raise bread for his family, and calls on his children to assist in his work for their benefit, which, at the same time, is a very small consideration for what the father gives them in food, clothing and education. Would they have any reason to boast over the father? You might as well say that the servant, who worked with them and received double pay, could boast that he had fed and clothed the family. Yes, the logic of these gentlemen is, "If a man do the least thing he may boast." Yes, if a man be perishing for bread, and no money to buy, and I take him a load of wheat, and he take it to the mill and his wife bake it, he may boast, "you have done nothing; for me," when he must have died without it. "The grace of God that brings salvation" teaches us to do nothing; no, "teaches us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously in this present world." Titus ii. 12. Why, we ask, "don't these men, who teach the sinner can do nothing to save himself, stay at home?" If Christ has done it all and no human agency be demanded, what mean the building of tents, and the many sermons, and the exciting tales, and the many bitter denunciations and abuses they heap upon those who differ with them, and teach something must be done on our part to save men.

The great gospel feast is provided. All things are ready, and the invitation extended, "come to the feast," but look at the host of servants that have been sent out to say, "come, come to the feast." The apostles waded through seas of blood and lost their lives in the struggle, and, how is it that we, the servants of God, are called upon to do so much, and sinners to do nothing to save themselves? These men are, practically, better than their theory, and are a living and practical refutation of what they teach, and, when will they get time to stop and boast over God, because they have done something to save sinners? If God pardon the sinner to-day and did not forgive him yesterday, it is not because there is any change in God or any new provision made, but because there is some change in the sinner. "He has ceased to sin, and has become obedient to the faith." Acts vi. 3. We have "the obedience of faith" and "the righteousness of faith," and what shall we say of a faith without obedience and righteousness? It is not "the faith of the gospel." It is "dead." Faith and the gospel are inseparably connected as cause and effect. When Paul "preached the faith," he preached the gospel. What the gospel requires, faith demands; and what faith teaches, the gospel says. Peter, in the first gospel discourse preached, with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, said to the unsaved, "Save yourselves from this untoward (wicked) generation."

How strange, that sinners can do everything to damn themselves, but nothing to save themselves! How glad would the young man have been to come across one of our modern preachers who would have told him, you can do nothing, positively nothing, to inherit eternal life. But Jesus told him to go and sell all he had and give it to the poor, the words went like daggers to his heart and he went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions. Peter, standing up with the eleven on the day of Pentecost, said, "Repent, and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus the Christ." The commission reads, "He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved." Ananias said to Paul, "Arise, and be baptized, and wash away your sins." Peter commanded the house of Cornelius to be baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, but these modern gents run over all these and tell us Paul and Silas said to the jailor, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and you shall be saved."

This text must undergo two changes to suit their theory,—"believe and you are saved"—and, to make it general in its application, the promise must be cut right in two "and your house" left off. Where is the man or person to whom we can say in the language of the text, "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and you shall be saved, and your house?" Paul could look forward and see that, not only he (the jailor), but his house would believe and obey the gospel. We urge, then, that this text is only applicable to a particular case and cannot be made to any man at the present time, unless we can look forward and see that a man's house or family will believe as well as himself. The text says not, "are saved," but shall be saved. How, and by whom? By Jesus Christ, to be sure, and in his way and no other; and he says, "He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved."

Just here we submit a rule of criticism which must not be lost sight of in explaining, or, more properly, understanding any passage of Scripture. "Whenever a command, promise or threat, by divine authority," is predicated upon two or more conditions, if, in any instance, only one, or a part of them are expressed, the others are always implied or understood. Hence, as we have faith, repentance and baptism placed before salvation or remission, if they are not all expressed, they must be understood. If a man start from the city A to go to the city B, and there be three turns in the road or way, and he inquire the way before he make a start, we would, at once, tell him to make the three turns; but if he pass the first, we tell him to make the two remaining, and if he passed the first two, we tell him to take the last turn only. On the day of Pentecost, when they inquired, "what shall we do?" they had heard and were pricked to the heart, which shows that they believed the apostles, for they would not ask liars what to do. Hence, they were not told to believe, but to "repent and be baptized." Paul, who had seen Jesus and believed on him, and been three days sorely repenting, was not told by Ananias to believe or repent, but to be baptized. Acts xxii. 16. But, when we look at the jailor, we see an ignorant heathen, who was in the act of committing suicide, who had never heard the gospel and knew not "the way of salvation," all trembling with fear, he cries out, "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" and, as he was not prepared to repent, or to be baptized "in the name of the Lord," they submitted the first condition—faith with the promise of salvation—to him and his house. And, as faith comes by hearing the gospel, "They spake the word of the Lord to him and his house, that he might hear and believe." When the apostle "spake the word of the Lord," he must have preached what had been spoken before, for the historian tells us they "spake the word of the Lord." How are we to ascertain what was preached? By learning from other discourses or passages of Scripture what the word or will of God is to the unconverted like the jailor. Bear in mind it was "the word of the Lord." What, then, we ask, has the Lord said? "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved." Mark xvi. 15, 16.

We have only to say, this is "the word of the Lord," and it is true and cannot be broken. All the faith-alone men in the universe cannot break it. First, faith; second, baptism; third, salvation. "He that believeth and is baptized, shall be"—not has been—"saved." "The word of the Lord" was, that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. Luke xxii. 47.

Having now learned what "the word of the Lord" is, we know what Paul and Silas spoke to the keeper of the prison, and what he did in order to be saved. We are told that he was baptized, and, also, that he believed, and have no doubt but he repented, God granted them repentance "unto salvation" and "unto life," by setting life and salvation before them in the gospel. Why, then, do our salvation by-faith-alone-men simply submit one condition, "believe" and stop? Why not speak "the word of the Lord" to the people as Paul and Silas did, and then they would give them faith, repentance and baptism, all in the divine wisdom preceding salvation or remission of sins?

We will now look at another stronghold, as it is considered, by those who teach that faith is the only prerequisite to salvation. John iii. 18. "He that believeth on him, is not condemned," therefore, he is saved, or made free from sin, or pardoned, so they teach; and so we do not believe. While we believe the text, we reject their conclusion as false, sophistical and illegitimate.

1. A man may not be condemned, and still not be pardoned, or saved from his old sins. Cornelius was not saved, for Peter was sent to tell him words whereby he might be saved. Acts xi. 14. But, was he condemned for not believing the gospel before he heard it? No. Were the Jews condemned for not believing the gospel before they heard it? No. Cornelius was a devout, God-fearing man, and his prayers and alms came up before God, and an angel was sent to him, and Peter, after hearing him, said, "I perceive of a truth that God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation, he that feareth him and worketh righteousness, is accepted of him." God then was pleased with him, and yet he was not pardoned in, or through the name of Jesus. If we listen to Jesus who tells us on what ground they were condemned—that is, the Jews,—we shall see when their condemnation commenced, and when it ended; and we shall see the causes of their condemnation, primary and incidental, or remote and proximate. "He that believeth not, is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God."

Now comes the explanation to which we must listen with much attention—"And this is the condemnation that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. Every one that doeth evil hateth the light; but he that doeth truth cometh to the light." Evil deeds, then, were the primary cause of their condemnation, and "doing truth," the primary cause of their faith or coming to the light, which was Christ, who found the two classes,—one doing evil, and the other "doing the truth," or good deeds. We now ask, in view of Christ's explanation, who believed and come to the light, or Christ? His own answer is, they who did the truth. We now state, from the facts before us, that evil deeds kept them away from Christ the light, and good deeds brought them to the light. So the doctrine which this text is quoted to prove, viz., that faith without doing anything, is the only condition of justification, is false, and clearly condemned by the context.

Now, we will quote from the same apostle, and, most clearly show, that believing, on him, on Christ, is not the only condition of pardon; for, while they believed on him, they were not pardoned, but were denounced as the children of the Devil, because they did his works. "Then said Jesus to those Jews which believed on him, if ye continue in my word then are you my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." John viii. 31. They said to him, "We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man; how sayest thou, ye shall be made free." You can see at a glance by consulting the context, that freedom from sin was here alluded to, which they did not enjoy, and could not, unless they obeyed him or continued in his word. Here, then, we have proof positive that a man may "believe on him" and still be a child of the Devil.

We will now give "faith alone" one more text. "Among the chief rulers many believed on him, but because of the Pharisees they did not confess him, for they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God." John xii. 42, 43.

Now, I ask, in all candor, were these rulers approved of God and saved in their idolatry, for they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God, and would not confess Christ; and will [illegible] the holy angels? No.

Having now cleared away their rubbish from two texts, we come to the third—"He that believeth on the Son, hath everlasting life." Of this text it is said, it teaches that every man, as soon as he believes, is in literal possession of eternal life, and, consequently, must be saved and eternally saved, for eternal life cannot be lost, else it would not be eternal.

First, we say, eternal life is promised to us, "And this is the promise that he hath promised us, even eternal life." 1 John ii. 25. Now, if by divine authority, we have several conditions upon which his promise is based, it will not do for us to claim one to the rejection of all others. A might claim one and deny all others. B, another, in the same way, C, another, and the result would be, they would get into contention at once, each holding onto his darling condition.

Let us hear what John says: "These things have I written unto you that believe, on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God." 1 John v. 13. What do you say, John, "these things?" Why, John, there are men who know they have eternal life by their feelings; they don't need your writings to teach them that; and others only want to believe that Jesus is the Son of God, and they can claim eternal life. What have you written that we may believe, and, believing, may have life through his name? What did the Master say eternal life was, or is? "This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." John xvii. 3. Who knew God, John, and, consequently, have eternal life? "He that saith I know him and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him." Adam was not permitted to have access to the tree of life that he might eat and live forever. Will the beloved apostle tell how we are to gain access to it? Is it by faith alone? "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life." Rev. xxii. 14.

How plain it is that Paul preached the gospel that John did, "He that soweth to the spirit shall of the spirit reap life everlasting. And let us not be weary in well doing, for in due (or proper) season we shall reap, if we faint not." O Paul, we are now sowing to the spirit by well doing and shall reap if we faint not. Yes, Christ is our eternal life, "and we are made partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our confidence firm unto the end." Gal. vi. 8, 9; Heb. iii. 14. Why, Paul, were you here with your little if our faith-alone evangelist would send you to hell in a moment, for they declare that every man that is not in literal possession of eternal life, is on his road to hell!

Paul, are we to hope for eternal life and constituted heirs according to that hope? Yes. That being justified freely by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life. And you were made an apostle in hope of eternal life, which God that cannot lie, promised before the world began? Yes. Titus i. 2; iii. 7. Why, Paul, you must think that eternal life is to come! Yes, the Master said to Peter, "he should receive eternal life in the world to come." Mark x. 30. And you, Paul, preached the same thing to your son Timothy? Yes. "Charge them that are rich in this world, that he not high minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, that they be rich in good works, willing to distribute, ready to communicate; laying up for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life," (in the time to come). 1 Tim. vi. 17, 18. Paul, does not the text read, "He that believeth on the Son, hath eternal life," not shall have? Yes, a man may have thousands of dollars laid up in a bank and not have a cent in his pocket, and yet, he says, I have thousands. He has a bill of deposit and it is safe in the bank, so we have eternal life in "Christ, who is our future life, and when he appears, we shall appear with him in glory." Col. iii. 4. "He dwells in our hearts by faith," and he is our eternal life; so by faith we have eternal life. "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day." John vi. 54.

Now, it would appear that almost any one could see that, to resurrect, is to restore to life and being; "has eternal life." Where? In me, not in himself; "and I will raise him up at the last day." Pray, how could he raise him up to eternal life, when he had it already and would never die? So you see we believe we have eternal life in Christ, not in ourselves upon whom we depend for our second or eternal life, just as much as we do upon the first Adam for our first life! [illegible] sion let me say to [illegible] the great reward,—eternal life. O, "lay up a good foundation, that you may lay hold on eternal life."

Yours, in hope of eternal life and an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus the Christ.

Charges Confuted.

J. M. STEPHENSON.

Referring the statements recently published in the World's Crisis, by A. N. Seymour, the following charges appeared in a recent number of the Advent Review, published at Battle Creek, Michigan:

The editor (I suppose) says: "The truth of the matter concerning Stephenson's and Hall's apostasy is simply this. They came east in the interest of a conspiracy to gain control of the Review, and change it into an Age to Come paper. But being circumvented in this they soon broke their connection with this people; and A. N. S. will never be chargeable with the guilt which he so much covets of turning those men away from the truth."

If there was a conspiracy formed James White the then editor was the chief conspirator; for he sent a written request for D. P. Hall and myself to visit Rochester previously to attending the Seventh Day Advent Conferences in New York and Michigan, both of which he cordially invited us to attend. He agreed to be responsible for our expenses there and back. He referred to this invitation and agreement at the Conference in New York. And our expenses and a fair remuneration for our time and labor were paid by the editor or the S. D. A. brethren. We understood that the design, as clearly expressed, was that we might form each others acquaintance and that an agreement might be reached by which we might waive nonessential points of difference and work together harmoniously in one common cause. But I must say if there was a conspiracy it was concocted in Rochester, N. Y., and not in the west. The author of the foregoing charges cannot put his finger upon a shred of evidence that such a conspiracy ever existed as far as D. P. Hall or J. M. Stephenson is concerned. There is not the shadow of truth in the infamous charge. Older churches always persecute and malign the motives of those who secede from them.

In reference to the statements of A. N. Seymour, as far as my memory serves me they are substantially true. His language "is some six weeks," and "about six weeks." Why did the author of the charges against him omit these qualifying words, and endeavor to weaken his testimony, and thus transgress the ninth commandment of their own acknowledged law? I did, as Elder Seymour states, publish a paper in opposition to Ellen White's visions, the sanctuary to be cleansed being in heaven, and advocating the Future Age. In twelve weeks I had four hundred subscribers. Its pages were thrown open for free investigation. I published A. N. Seymour's questions intending to answer them, but having made arrangements for J. B. Bazzo and H. V. Reed to discuss the Sabbath question pro and con, I deferred answering them until this discussion should close. I was soon convinced that Bro. Reed had the truth on the unity of the law. When I could no longer conscientiously advocate the perpetuity of the Seventh Day Sabbath, I proposed to transfer my subscription list to Joseph Marsh on condition that he would send his magazine (Prophetic Expositor I believe) to my subscribers the remainder of the year, and publish my reasons for giving up the Sabbath. Both of which he agreed to do, and which he faithfully fulfilled. Wonder if mine accuser ever heard of such a paper? The place where my magazine was published was Ripon, Fond du Lac county, Wis. Its name was Bible Investigator. It was issued a short time before my debate with J. A. Wagoner, at Crane's Grove.

Be Patient.

You are tender-hearted, and you want to be true and are trying to be—learn these two things; never be discouraged because good things get on so slowly here; and never fail daily to do that good which lies next to your hand. Do not be in a hurry, but be diligent. Enter into the sublime patience of the Lord. Be charitable in view of it. God can afford to wait; why cannot we, since we have him to fall back upon? Let patience have her perfect work, and bring forth her celestial fruits. Trust to God to weave your little thread into a great web, though the patterns show it not yet. [illegible] God's people are able and willing [illegible] ber, that one day with the Lord is as a thousand years, and the thousand years shall show themselves as a perfect and finished day.—McDonald.

The most thrilling and sadly suggestive temperance lecture is the sight of a once noble, talented man, left in ruins by strong drink. A Washington paper tells of a ragged beggar, well known in the streets of that city, who once held an important command in the army, having been promoted for personal bravery, from a cavalry lieutenant to nearly the highest rank in military service. One night recently, when he had been too successful in begging liquor to satisfy his craving, and while lying helplessly drunk in the rear part of a Third Street saloon, some men thought to play a joke on him by stealing his shirt, and proceeded to strip him. Underneath his shirt, and suspended by a string from his neck, was a small canvas bag, which the man opened and found it contained his commission as brevet major-general, two congratulatory letters—one from General Grant and one from President Lincoln; a photograph of a little girl, and a curl of hair—a "chestnut shadow" that doubtless one day crept over the brow of some loved one. When these things were discovered, even the half-drunken men who found them felt a respect for the man's former greatness, and pity for his fallen condition, and quietly returned the bag and contents to where they found them, and placed the sleeper's clothes upon him. When a reporter tried to interview the man, and endeavor to learn something of his life in the past few years, he declined to communicate anything. He cried like a child when told how his right name and former position were ascertained, and with tears trickling down his cheeks, said: "For God's sake, sir, don't publish my degradation, or my name, at least, if you are determined to say something about it. It is enough that I know myself how low I have become. Will you promise that much? It will do no good, but will do my friends a great deal of harm, as, fortunately, they think I died in South America, where I went at the close of the war." Intemperance and the game-table, he said, had wrought his ruin.

POETRY.

Evening Tears and Morning Songs.

Weeping may endure in the evening, but singing cometh in the morning. (Marginal reading of Psa. xxx. 5.)

In the evening there is weeping,
Lengthening shadows, failing sight,
Silent darkness, slowly creeping
Over all things dear and bright.

In the evening there is weeping,
Lasting all the twilight through;
Phantom shadows never sleeping,
Wakening slumbers of the true.

In the morning cometh singing,
Cometh joy, and cometh light,
When the sun ariseth, bringing
Healing on his wings of light.

In the morning cometh singing,
Songs that ne'er in silence end;
Angel minstrels ever bringing
Praises new with thine to blend.

Are the twilight shadows casting
Heavy glooms upon the heart?
Soon in radiance everlasting
Night forever shall depart.

Art thou weeping, sad and lonely,
Through the evening of thy days?
All thy sighing shall be only
Prelude of more perfect praise.

Darkest hour is nearest dawning,
Solemn I extol of the day;
Singing cometh in the morning,
God shall wipe all tears away.

SELECTIONS.

Impending Doom.—No. 2.

At the door of the apostate church of Rome lies the guilt of having given rise to modern continental infidelity, that plague which is ruining in its turn untold millions. Who shall number the socalled Christians in Europe and elsewhere, who scorn all religion as hypocrisy, and sneer at all sacred truth as legends and lies; who worship only self and mammon and pleasure, and live in the unceasing pursuit of vanity? What thousands of such, openly deride and deny Jesus Christ, and even make a mock at God; they refuse to the Creator a place in his own creation, and question his very existence.

And when we turn our eyes to the reformed Protestant churches of Germany, Denmark, Sweden, and England, what do we behold? The power of godliness to a great extent, a purer creed, an open Bible, an educated people, a general respect for the things of God, and some vital godliness, some faith. But even here how much of covert or open infidelity, what rationalism, what scepticism, what "broad church" views, what oppositions of science falsely so called! What worldliness, what national sins, what confusion and strife in the church, what loathsome vice and ungodliness in the world! National churches honeycombed with infidelity, even when not relapsing back to Popery under another name, and non-conformist churches fast admitting the same deadly leaven. Where can we find a Christianity worthy of Christ? Where a church, like a chaste virgin, fit to be his bride?

The Christian church as a witness for God in the world has failed, like the Jewish nation, and become apostate. There is a little flock, there is a true church, but its members are scattered abroad and almost invisible in the great Babylon; they are the seven thousand who have not bowed the knee to Baal, they are the called and chosen and faithful who follow the Lamb, they are those who have turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven; they are those who have not the form only, but the power of godliness, those who keep themselves unspotted from the world, and overcome through faith. They are found in every section of the professing church, and the Lord knoweth those that are his—"They shall be mine saith the Lord of Hosts, in the day when I make up my jewels."

But for the rest,—for the vast professing body which bears the name of Christ, it has not continued in the goodness of God, it has turned his grace into licentiousness, its sentence is gone forth, it must be "cut off." The long-suffering of God has been abundantly manifested, it is right that his holy severity should be again revealed. The professing church has long been unworthy of the sacred name it bears, and of the high and holy responsibility of being God's witness on earth, which belongs to it; it is time it should cease to hold the position it has so fearfully forfeited. Instead of being the instrument of spreading the truth of the Gospel among men, it is the worst hindrance to their attaining that knowledge of God, and of Jesus Christ whom he has sent, in which life eternal lies; like the Pharisees of old it stands as the great obstruction, neither entering itself into the kingdom, nor suffering those who would, to enter in. The name of God is blasphemed among the nations, by reason of the corruption of the professing church; the light that should have been in it, is become darkness, and great is that darkness! The church is confounded with the world, and the true saints are strangers in its society; it is no longer the pillar and ground of the truth, it is the hotbed of heresy, false doctrine, and corruption of every kind. What contrast can be more complete, than that between the church as Christ intended it to be, and the church as it now exists in the world! And end must come to all this! Not only does the Word of God predict it, not only does our own sense of righteousness demand it, but the solemn analogies of history distinctly intimate it. Let the undeniable fact that past apostasies brought down the judgment they deserved, forewarn men what must be the end of the existing apostasy of the professing people of God. Babylon must fall! Great Babylon must come in remembrance before God, who will give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath, for her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities!

The testimony of the Apocalypse is full and fearful as to the doom that is now impending over Christendom. He who destroyed Pagan Rome, is about to destroy Papal Rome and all kindred apostasies; He who punished Jerusalem is about to punish Babylon; heaven waits to rejoice over her fall. The harpers on the crystal sea, the myriad martyrs who overcame her specious seductions, and endured her cruel torments, resisting unto blood her soul-destroying errors and superstitions,—wait to make heaven reverberate with the melodious triumph, over her downfall, and fiery destruction. The same severity of God, illustrated of old in the flood, in the plagues of Egypt and in the fall of Jerusalem, is to be exhibited afresh in the cutting off of the apostate Christian church; and the analogies of chronology teach us, that the great change and termination of the present state of thing is near at hand. When the "seven times" of the patriarchal age of human history were finished, Egypt fell, and the Exodus of Israel took place. When the "seven times" of the Shemitic or Jewish age expired, Messiah appeared; and Israel, having filled up the measure of its iniquity by rejecting Him, was rejected in its turn, and given up by God to judgment. And now the "seven times" of this Gentile age are all but run out; the dispensation of the Christian Church has produced an apostasy worse than any preceding dispensation,—and shall the end be different? Only in this respect, that the judgment predicted is more terrible, as the sin has been more fearful and prolonged! Babylon must fall, and her fall will be great, for "Strong is the Lord God who judgeth her."—H. Grattan Guinness.

A Superhuman Book.

It is impossible that man, [illegible] by superhuman help, should have made the Bible. If the men of two thousand or three thousand years ago could construct, with their unaided faculties, a book which was to lift the race, in these later ages, and these remote regions, to heights of civilization which they themselves never attained, then either the stream does rise higher than its fountain, or our imagined modern progress is a delusion and an idiotic dream.

It is impossible that man should have made the Bible. Let all the universities of the world, after all the culture of the centuries has been accumulating in them, undertake to make another Bible for the world, and the enterprise would be looked upon as ridiculous and insane! But if we accept God's agency in it, all its mysteries are explained, with the origin of those mysteries, I do not expect to comprehend the mind of God. When we can put the stars into our pockets, then we may compass the thoughts of the Most High! Its tone of authority is then legitimate and natural; its familiar handling of the highest themes, without excitement, and without evident effort; its luminous discovery of the way of life, the law of holiness, and the redemption of Christ; the marvels of its structure, its incessant variety, with its constant unity; its perfect simplicity, with its magnificent wealth of argument, illustration, and memorable description—that structure by which it holds the mind of the world to it forevermore with ceaseless attention; the spiritual impulse which comes from it to the human soul in every mood, and the answer which it makes to every need; its inexhaustible energy in lifting peoples; its power of grasping the barbarian tribe, and transforming it into a Christian commonwealth; its inexhaustible supply for all mankind, and its unwasting power in the world;—they are all natural.

If it be the book of God, then I expect a book, not like a palace which human minds have fashioned and human hands have builded—trim, polished, charming, stately, I expect a book like the planet itself; vast and rough in its external appearance, with the treasures of the silver and gold hidden beneath the strata of rock, through which men must dig to find them; with mountain-chains, which we must patiently pierce or cross; with oceans, across which man must find his way, and whose depths he must seek to sound for himself. I expect a book which will call out the largest endeavor of the human mind for centuries, and for all centuries, before it is exhausted of its meaning. I expect the miracles contained in such a book to defy human imitation or conception. I expect prophecy fulfilled to be God's signature to such a book. I expect that it will stand for ages, the Wonder-book of the world; in which hell and heaven confront each other, while the Redeemer stands between, inviting from the one, alluring to the other.

There is no marvel in the book of God which is not legitimate, if it be his work. It will be profound and yet simple—as it is. It will compact its whole substance into an occasional sentence—as it does. At the same time, it will make its majestic and eternal thoughts, articulated in human language, reverberate through mighty passages of prophecy and argument—as it does. It will be incommensurable with other books, as the ocean is with the clouds that are lifted from it, to be tinted by the sun and to disappear. It will be indestructible by any assault, as the planet is indestructible by any explosion of the powder of the mining engineer. It will be as permanent as the race; and it will reach, in its attractive force, to every region of the earth. Everything belonging to it is legitimate at once, if it be the book of God!—R. S. Storrs.

NEWS ITEMS.

CONSTANTINOPLE, July 23.—The Council of Ministers yesterday decided upon a reply to the collective note of the powers respecting the cession of Turkish territory to Greece. The reply asks the powers to agree in principle that Janina, Larissa, and Metzova shall remain in Turkish possession, and proposes that the Porte shall reopen negotiations with Greece on this basis. This is substantially the rejection of the decisions of the Berlin Conference. Larissa is a town of European Turkey, the capital of the province of Thessaly, having an estimated population of 20,000, three-fourths of whom are Turks, and the Council objects to its cession on that ground; the same argument applies to Janina and Zoeo. The Turkish Council also propose the appointment of a commission of inquiry respecting the cession of the Tust district to Montenegro. The Montenegrin Envoy is very indignant at this proposition of the Porte, [illegible] to quit Constantinople on Saturday unless the offensive proposition is stricken out.

VIENNA, July 23.—A dispatch from Cettinje to the Political Correspondence says: "The Montenegrin Envoy has been ordered to leave Constantinople forthwith, in consequence of the Porte's falsely representing to the powers that the Montenegrins were the aggressors in the recent fight with the Albanians.

MADRID, July 23.—An official dispatch dated at Mantilla, July 21, says there was another shock of earthquake at that place which lasted fifty-five seconds. Not a single public edifice was spared. The convent of Guadalupe, which had lasted three centuries, was destroyed. Nobody was killed. The inhabitants are encamped outside the town.

YELLOW FEVER IN HAVANA.

WASHINGTON, July 22.—The National Board of Health have received from Havana, under date of July 17, a report showing that in the week ending July 10 the total number of deaths from all causes was 250, of which 76 were from yellow fever, 10 from small-pox, and 4 from typhoid fever. For the week ending July 17 there were 74 deaths from yellow fever, and at that date there were probably 200 cases of yellow fever in the city and suburbs.

The recent earthquake appears to have been one of the most serious and extensive which has happened in Switzerland for several years. Originating in some point on the eastern slope of the Simplon, it seems to have affected the whole of the Pennine Alps, was felt as far north as Berne, as far east as Geneva, and as far south south as the Matterhorn. The chief seat of the disturbance was in the valley of the Upper Rhone.

Eugenie stopped at St. Helena on her homeward voyage from the Cape, that she might make a pilgrimage to the place which was once the enforced residence of the great Napoleon, and to the tomb which afterward contained his ashes.

Should a naval demonstration be necessary to convince Turkey that the European Powers are in earnest in demanding compliance with the Berlin Conference decisions, it will be carried out under the joint command of the English and French naval authorities.

BREVITIES.

St. John's Church, York, Pa., was built before the Revolution, when there were but four churches in the state. The bell was presented by Queen Caroline, wife of George III., in 1774.

Mrs. Frances Bronson Wyatt, of Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, is supposed to be the oldest Methodist in the United States. She is in her one hundred and ninth year; and has been a member of the church eighty years.

Chief Joseph, of the Oks (Canada) tribe of Indians, is a man of good education—something of a scholar, indeed. He has been ordained as a clergyman, and has translated the four gospels from French into Iroquois. He hopes to conclude the translation of the New Testament before the end of the present year.

The most powerful elevator in the world has been completed in the Washington Monument, Washington. It is constructed to carry ten tons to a height of five hundred feet, and arranged to run twenty feet above the top of the stone work during the progress of the structure of the monument. It will be used to deliver material to the builders until the monument is completed, when it will be turned into a passenger elevator.

Mr. A. E. Outerbridge, Jr., of the Philadelphia Assay office, has recently given an example of the infinite divisibility of matter, by exhibiting before the Franklin Institute some thin films of gold obtained by electric deposition upon copper, and afterward detached. These pieces of gold leaf were transparent, and gave a green color to transmitted light. Mr. Outerbridge has thus produced films of gold so thin that one grain of the metal would cover nearly four square feet. This is only one ten thousandth as thick as ordinary writing paper, and 2,703,000 of such films together would make only one inch in thickness.

In 1876 the Holy Synod of the Greek Church prohibited a long list of books, on the ground that they were injurious, and even pestilent. Among those were the Old and New Testaments published by the British and Foreign Bible Society. Now the minister of education in Greece has issued an order that the highest classes in all the common schools in the kingdom, shall take as a text book, in the study of ancient language, the original Greek Testament. He affirms that in this book "the children will find the divine Savior of Christian teaching, which alone, by means of its heaven-sent truths, is able to enlighten man and bring him to that which is right."

On the slopes of the volcano of San Salvador, in Central America, exists a curious intermittent spring. It is known to the natives of the country as the Rio Huido, or fugitive river. During seven consecutive years sufficient water flows from it to form a veritable river; when, at a fixed time, the water suddenly disappears, and the bed of the river becomes dry and dusty. At the end of another period of seven years, the water again commences to flow from the spring. A period of flow covered the years from 1868 to 1873, and was succeeded by a period of dryness from 1873 to 1880. In January of this year the water promptly re-appeared. The phenomenon is not new, but the length of the period of intermittence and its regularity are remarkable in the present instance.

A BOILING LAKE.

The great boiling lake in the island of Dominica is a curiosity. It is situated 2,300 feet above the sea upon a forest covered mountain behind the town of Roseau, and is two miles in circumference. On a recent visit by a party of explorers, when the wind blew aside the dense clouds of steam and sulphurous vapors which covered the lake, a mound of water was seen fully ten feet higher than the general surface of the water, caused by ebullition. The margin of the lake consists of beds of sulphur. Its overflow found exit by a very high waterfall. Here was seen a vast sheet of boiling water, from which, clouds of white steam were continually arising, presenting a scene at once strange and sublime in the extreme.

A MONUMENT OF CYRUS THE GREAT.

Among the treasures recovered by Mr. Hormuzd Rassam during his recent explorations in Assyria and Babylonia is a cylinder to King Cyrus, which Sir Henry C. Rawlinson describes as one of the most interesting historical records in the cuneiform character that has yet been brought to light. It was written in the Babylonian script, and was discovered among the ruins of Birs Nimroud, which, without doubt, corresponds to the ancient city of Borsippa. The cylinder is nine inches long by three and one-fourth inches in diameter, and covered by forty-five lines of text. The writing is very minute, and it is computed that the inscription would run to about two lines of average length. The monument has been considerably injured, and a few portions wholly lost. "When it does begin to be legible it is found to relate to the very moment of that great historical event, the capture of Babylon by the founder of the Persian universal monarchy. Nabonidus has abandoned his capital, which has fallen into the hands of Cyrus, though he is still struggling against his fatein Babylonia. But the priestly worshipers of the rising sun declare that the gods have rejected him for his impiety, and for his scandalous neglect of his temples. On the other hand, they extol the piety, and the greatness, and glory of Cyrus, whom the heavenly powers have raised up to avenge their cause."

RESTITUTION FUND.

ALBION, Fulton Co., Ind., Nov. 29, 1879.

Elder Hostetler—With your permission I will make an appeal to the brotherhood for help to support Bible Institutions for the year 1880 and Home Evangelistic work.

Now, dear brethren, I call upon one and all who feel the matter also, to donate to the cause of Christ the small amount of $200 between this and the first of January.

Dear brethren, we could do this, with a few exceptions, if we just thought so. I am well aware that some brethren have contributed nobly, but I make this appeal in a special manner to those who have heretofore done nothing as a free-will offering.

Dear brother, do not say, I have too poor! Perhaps you are using that noxious weed, tobacco, in some form. Consider for one moment: are we who claim to be the chosen of God so poverty stricken that we cannot spend a weekly tract.

We do hope that everyone will respond to this appeal. Please let us hear from all those who cannot or will not pay the $200, and will they please give us their reasons. I am also a poor man. My name is Abraham Pontius. I am 62 years old and have a large family to support. I have a small farm of 20 acres. I farm and work at the carpenter's trade to support my family. I use neither tobacco nor intoxicating drink.

And, dear Elder, I will enclose $10.00 to commence on. I need the RESTITUTION, and the Bible, and I hope to meet you all in that coming kingdom. So, farewell.

ABRAHAM PONTIUS.

POETRY.

[Our Rest.]

Advent.

O sleeper, on thy silken couch lying,
With flickering lamp untrimmed and burning low,
Hearest not the cry along the highway flying,—
"Behold the Bridegroom comes—to meet him go"?

When yonder sun in crimson pomp declines,
Ye know his tokens; aye, ye can with ease
Discern the morrow's skies. O, read the signs
In fire inscribed upon days such as these!

See not the towers of prophecy arise
With heaven-lit lights to warn thee of the times?
Hearest not the watchman's voice, proclaiming "Lo!
The morning breaks; 'tis the hour of prime!"

How surely with the prophet's mirror gleam
The pealing scenes harmonious echoes wake,—
Faith nearly dead; reliance puked up and vain,
And striving hard heaven's citadel to take.

Like shuttles fly the ships from beach to beach,
Heaving the nations trade and intercourse;
No parts too far for bridegroom to reach—
No land but feels from every hand a force.

Men lawless grown, authority despise,
And threaten thrones, and those who give them bread;
While Justice silent sits with bandaged eyes,
And vultures throng high places to be fed.

The heavens are opened, and the red horse—war,
Tramps the valley! and the Christian's blood
Crieth for vengeance from the fields afar,
Where gleams the Crescent in Danubia's flood.

There are the shrill cock-crowings that proclaim
The morning near. Lift up your hands on high!
Behold He comes with clouds of saints to reign!
Rejoice! for earth's redemption draweth nigh!

The Bible Versus Trinitarianism.—No. 2.

Yet to us there is but one God, the Father, out of whom are all things, and we for him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, through whom are all things, and we through him. Hospitable Brighton.] 1 Cor. viii. 6.

And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and him whom thou didst send, Jesus Christ. [Methodist Preacher.] John xvii. 3.

Having shown in my first article (I.) what Trinitarianism is, (II.) where it came from, and (III.) why it has been embraced by Protestants, I now proceed to answer proposition

IV. Is it true?

We have already seen that the doctrine is unreasonable, absurd, and contrary to well established facts. This being true, I might here rest the case without further investigation; for the Scriptures do not affirm anything contrary to right reason, or well established facts. Neither will they be found teaching a doctrine in one place and contradicting the same in another.

If the Bible enunciates the truth, as it does, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, we shall not find it also declaring, as alleged, that he is God. For if he is the Son of God, the begotten of God, "the begotten of the Father," and "made of a woman," he is not God. And all the assertions to the contrary, and all the cry of "mystery" as being connected with the Godhead will not and cannot make him such.

But as this unscriptural dogma has been handed down to us through the creeds of the Church, as already shown, and as we have been taught from childhood that we must believe, and receive it, however mysterious and absurd it might appear; and as education has such a strong hold upon our natures and affections, we need something more than a mere denial, and more even than what might, under other circumstances, be called a conclusive argument, to convince us that we have been educated in error.

But when we show the absolute absurdity of Trinitarianism; when we see that, being contrary to stubborn facts, it does not even come within the province of possibility; and then in addition when we show, as I think we can, that the Bible teaches no such doctrine, I think it ought to be sufficient to convince every candid person of its untruthfulness.

The Unity of the Godhead is very clearly enunciated in the Scriptures of truth, and is an important doctrine not only because it is true, but especially so, in so far as it may tend to simplify the Gospel, and thus lessen the mysticism that has been unnecessarily and unwittingly thrown around it by Trinitarians. The more simple the Gospel plan of salvation is made to appear, and the farthest removed from doubt and mystery, the more easily can we challenge the attention of thinking men, and the more surely make lasting impressions on their minds.

Many candid persons are confused and discouraged—holding themselves aloof from the Church of Christ because they cannot subscribe to the creeds of any of the sects, believing, as they do, that it is not a sufficient reason for embracing a doctrine because it is embodied in the creed, nor indeed because it may be considered to have the sanctity of age, and the endorsement of Church Councils; nor because it has been embraced and strenuously advocated by great and good men; and especially so when in reading the Bible for themselves, as every one should, they cannot only not find any proof of certain popular dogmas, but find the Word of God explicitly contradicting them.

The true doctrine of Trinitarians, as we have seen, is "Trinity in Unity and Unity in Trinity," or three Gods in one God, and one God in three Gods!

But there is not a word in the whole Bible that even intimates the existence of a three-one, or triune God. On the contrary it very explicitly teaches that there is but one God.

The Apostle Paul says: (I Cor. viii. 6.) "But to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by Him."

Christ, in his memorable prayer to his Father, says: "And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." John xvii. 3.

Mark, Paul does not say as Trinitarians do,—"There is but one God—the Father, Son and Holy Ghost;" but "one God, the Father."

Neither does Christ say: "That they might know three," the Father, Son and Holy Ghost "the only true God!" but "that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."

God, by the prophet (Isa. xliv. 6,) says: "I am the first, and I am the last; and beside me there is no God."

Who, if he stop to think, can believe that in this language of Jehovah—language of one personality represented by the "I," and "me," there are really and truly three personalities—Father, Son and Holy Ghost—included, and so understood by the Prophet, as there must be if Trinitarianism is true?

Let us see how the following significant language of the apostle (I Tim. i. 17,) will harmonize with this popular doctrine:

"Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, [Father, Son, and Holy Ghost?] the only wise God, be honor and glory for ever and ever."

Again, I Tim. vi. 14-16. "That thou keep this commandment .... until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ, who in his times shall show who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords, [Father, Son and Holy Ghost?] who only hath immortality, [Christ died—poured out his soul unto death] dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen, nor can see; [the Son of God was seen] to whom be honor and power everlasting."

Eph. iv. 6: "One God and Father of all, who is above all."

2 Cor. xi. 31: "The God and Father of [" God the Son?" no, but of] our Lord Jesus Christ."

Jude iv: "Denying the only Lord God, [consisting of Father, Son and Holy Ghost? no; for if so, the apostle would not have added] and our Lord Jesus Christ."

Gal. iii. 20: "Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one."

Paul here affirms that "God is one," but he, nor any other inspired penman, nowhere affirms that God is "three!" Though Church Councils, and church creeds, great men and good men have affirmed it, the Bible never.

It has been supposed, however, that the beloved disciple has taught as much in his first epistle (v. 7, 8,) but there is the clearest testimony that the words I put in brackets are spurious, and were added to our Bible not earlier than the fifteenth, and most probably as late as the sixteenth century. They are not found in any ancient Greek manuscript, and this fact is so patent the translators of the American Bible Union (Baptist) version have discarded them (so that they do not appear in the text) and have appended the following note:

"The words omitted are wanting in all ancient copies." The text in full is as follows: "For there are three that bear record, [in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth] the spirit, the water, and the blood; and these three agree in one."

The evidence, I have examined, that these words are spurious, is so overwhelming, that I will not refrain from giving a good portion of it here. I quote from Forrest's History of the Trinity. He says, (giving good authority) that, "This text is not to be found in any Greek manuscript earlier than the fifteenth century, or as Prof. Porson thinks not earlier than the sixteenth century. The Greek MSS. containing St. John's First Epistle, and omitting this text, amounted to one hundred and twelve when Mr. Porson wrote against Archdeacon Travis. Several other MSS. have since been discovered, all of them agreeing in the same omission. The only Greek MSS. which the advocates for this text have urged in its defence are three; two of which have been proved to be of the fifteenth century, if not rather of the sixteenth, and the third to be of the seventeenth century.

It is not to be found in any Latin MS. earlier than the ninth century, but is omitted in many of the Latin MSS. In those MSS. in which it occurs there are many variations of this verse; there are frequent additions, omissions, and alterations of particular words; in some cases the verse precedes the present eighth verse, and in other cases it follows it; sometimes it is not written in the text, but in the margin; sometimes by the same hand that transcribed the whole manuscript; sometimes by a later hand, sometimes it occurs after an erasure. All this gives rise to the suspicion of forgery. In three MSS. which Bishop Burnet saw, the disputed text, coming after the present eighth, was joined by the phrase 'just as' (sicut), leading us to think that it was at first a marginal commentary and then a textual addition, after the following way: "For there are three that bear witness (in earth), etc. 'just as' there are three that bear record in heaven," etc.

Again, this text did not occur in any of the other ancient versions besides the Latin. It is not found in any of the Syriac versions, nor in the Coptic, Arabic, Ethiopic, Slavonic, Armenian, nor in the Sahidic version. This text was never quoted by any of the Greek Fathers, whether they entertained low or high opinions concerning the Trinity. Various other passages of Scripture were frequently quoted to prove the existence of three persons in one God, but this verse was never once alluded to, although it is the only text in Scripture that is actually to the point in support of the Trinity, and is common place proof of modern Trinitarian systems.

This text was not quoted by any Latin authority before the end of the fifth century, when it was supposed to have been inserted into the margins of a very few Latin MSS. But it was so little known, even in the eighth century, that Bede, who then flourished, and who has commented on the whole of the fifth chapter of John's First Epistle, does not mention the verse, although he was a critic, and must have been acquainted with MSS. Between the time of Bede's death and the ninth century, an impostor, under the shelter of the name of Jerome, wrote a Prologue to Jerome's Latin translation of the Catholic Epistles, in which he declared his reasons for believing the genuineness of the text, maintaining that it had been kept out of the Latin MSS. by translators, but that he thought it to be his duty to restore it to its proper place. On the faith of this Prologue, which was believed in an ignorant age, by the members of the Roman Catholic Church, to have been the work of Jerome, (though it has been proved to be a forgery of the ninth century,) the verse was thought to be genuine. This was the reason why, after the ninth century, the text was added in so many MSS. of the Latin version used by the Roman Church, while it was wanting in the Greek MSS, and in the MSS. of all other versions besides the Latin.

Some of the Latin fathers who did not quote the seventh verse allegorized the eighth verse, in proof of the Trinity. I conclude from this, not only that they were ignorant of the seventh verse, but that this allegorical use of the three (earthly) witnesses in the eighth verse was what gave rise to the introduction of the other three.

In consequence of the preceding evidence against the genuineness of this text, it was omitted in some of the best of the printed editions of the Greek Testament; viz., in the first two editions of Erasmus, in 1516 and 1518-19; in the edition of Aldus, 1518; in the edition of Strasburg, in 1524; in the edition of Colinaus, at Paris, in 1534; of Hagenau, in 1531; of Harwood, of Matthei, and of Griesbach. Wetstein marked it as undoubtedly spurious, but it was his object to publish the received text unaltered. The text was also omitted in Luther's printed translation of the New Testament. Luther translated the Greek Testament into German, and not only omitted the verse in his first edition, but refused to receive it into any subsequent edition. In the old English Bibles of Henry the Eighth and of Edward the Sixth, the text was printed in small types, or included in brackets. The same was the case with Queen Elizabeth's Bible of 1566. It was between the years 1500 and 1530 that the words of the text began to be printed as they now are; but it is unknown on whose authority this change was made."

This spurious passage, so often quoted as a proof text, was, doubtless, deemed necessary, in the absence of sufficient proof, to sustain Trinitarianism; and so notwithstanding the evidence of its spuriousness, it has been retained in our Bible since the sixteenth century, when, as we have seen, it was added by some unscrupulous person or persons unknown.

But we might admit the genuineness of these spurious words, and give them all the force the language will admit of, and then they utterly fail to prove there are three persons in the Godhead. For although it is assumed the "Word" in this passage refers to the Son of God, "the second person in the Trinity," so called, I affirm there is not a particle of evidence to sustain such assumption. I know that John i. 1, is quoted as proof, but it is not only an assumption to claim that the "Word" here refers to Christ, or the Son of God, but is contradicting John, who says, "the Word was God." I shall let the Bible explain what is meant by this "Word" when we come to the first chapter of John.

I have shown from the most explicit language of the apostles that "there is but one God"—that "God is one," not three and one, as alleged—that God is "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" "Father of all, and above all," and by Christ himself that, his Father, alone, "is the only true God."

Then, from such explicit testimony, in connection with the well known facts and arguments presented, does it not logically and absolutely follow that "the only begotten Son of God" is not "the second person in the Trinity?"

If, then, it cannot be shown that he is, it cannot be shown that "the Holy Ghost is the third person in the Trinity." For if the one falls of proof, the other, of necessity, also falls.

But let us look at the evidence in the other case and see what we can find. It is well known that the word sometimes translated Ghost is pneuma—spirit. The words pneumatos hagion should then be rendered Holy Spirit and not Holy Ghost. "God is a Spirit," a holy Spirit, the Holy Spirit; and it is God's (the Holy Spirit's) work to convict, convert, sanctify, direct, comfort and influence. Christ says: (John xv. 26.) "But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, [why from the Father, alone, if the Father, alone, is not the one God?] he shall testify of me." "It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him to you. And when he is come, he will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment. Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth. . . . He shall glorify me; for he shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you. All things that the Father [or Holy Spirit] hath are mine; therefore said I, [verse 14,] that he [the Holy Spirit, but which, in this verse he calls the Father] shall take of mine, and shall show it unto you." John xvi. 7, 8, 13-15. Thus when in verse 14, he says of the Holy Spirit—"he shall receive of mine, and shall show it to you," he, in the next verse quotes this language and applies it to the Father thus—"All things that the Father hath are mine; therefore said I, that he shall take [receive verse 14] of mine, and shall show it unto you." So we here have the positive proof that the Holy Spirit and the Father are one and the same person or Being. Christ again says: "And behold I send the promise of my Father upon you." Here again, instead of saying the promise of the Holy Spirit, he says "the promise of the Father," thus again showing that both are one. "But tarry ye in in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high." "And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place. . . . And they were all filled with the Holy Spirit; and began to speak as the Spirit, [or God] gave them utterance." Here was a most wonderful manifestation of the power of God, not, however, by the presence of a true personality called the third person in the Trinity; but an unction, a power, an influence from God himself. And so Peter understood it when under the inspiration of the Spirit, he said: "But this is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel: And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh," etc.

Christ said to the Church, as well as to the apostles: "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." Not that Christ, in person would be with them; for he said: "I must go away . . . I go to prepare a place for you, and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there may you be also."

It is very evident, then, that on the day of Pentecost, God manifested his power and saving grace in a remarkable manner, by pouring out his Spirit in fulfillment of Joel's prophecy. He did not pour out "the third person in the Trinity;" neither was there a Divine personality present upon that occasion; nor is there at any time when and where God manifests his saving power.

And in harmony with the above we hear Trinitarians praying, that God will pour out his Spirit—that he will manifest his power—that he will "make bare his holy arm" in saving sinners. They do not pray to "the third person in the Trinity," nor do they really (though their system requires it) believe in his actual presence as a personality distinct from the Father.

I know that in the command to baptize in "the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit," the Holy Spirit seems to be distinguished from the Father and even personified. This is done, doubtless, for the reason of the Holy Spirit's peculiar work already noticed.

God says: "My Spirit shall not always strive with man." "Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?" "My soul hateth," etc.

No person concludes from the above expressions that God has a spirit as man has, or that he has a soul; when we know he is a Spirit; and know that when he says "my Spirit," and "my soul," he means himself. And yet it is just as far from truth to believe that the Holy Spirit is a personal being distinct from God, as such, and said to be "the third person in the Trinity," as to believe that God has a spirit and a soul.

But while Paul affirms "there is but one God," who is "the Father," "and one Lord Jesus Christ," who is the Son of the Father; and Christ declares his Father is "the only true God," Trinitarians affirm, notwithstanding, that there are three Gods—"God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost;" and then to cap the climax of absurdity, they claim that these three Gods are only one God! Paul says: (I Tim. ii. 5,) "For there is one God [consisting of Father, Son and Holy Ghost? O, no, for he adds] and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." So Paul does not include "the man Christ Jesus" in the "one God," as Trinitarians do.

But who can tell how these three Gods—three beings—maintaining, as they must, their own proper individuality—can possibly be one God—one being! In every self-evident, mathematical and Bible-truth there is perfect [illegible] between truth and truth. It is a self-evident truth to me that I live; it is a mathematical truth that two and one are three, and that three is not one, nor one three. It is a Bible truth that "God is one," and when Trinitarians say that God is three and one, they not only contradict the Bible, but ignore a well known mathematical truth. If I should tell a school boy that three units were contained in one unit; or that three Gods were only one God, he would think me crazy. And he would think so because I had ignored such a plain mathematical truth.

But could God, by exerting his miraculous power, make of one being three beings, each of whom should have his own individuality, as he must in order to be a be-a being, and at the same time these three beings be the original one being of which the three were made? Or could three uncreated beings thus exist, as we are taught by Trinitarians, the first being the Father, the second the Son of the first, and the third —— what? Another God?

Does any one say, "away with your mathematical reasoning—here is where faith is needed?" Stop sir, my brother! You cannot ignore a mathematical truth, not even to sustain what may be deemed a Bible-truth; for you may be mistaken in your conceptions of what is a Bible-truth, but you cannot be mistaken as to a mathematical truth. God does not require us to forsake reason, common sense, or any kind of truth to give place to a blind faith.

And again we are told that we must believe this transcendant absurdity—that we must not reject it on account of the great mystery connected with it—for "great is the mystery of godliness—God manifested in the flesh." It is true that "is the mystery," etc. But I apprehend the "mystery" does not consist in the supposition that there are three persons in the Godhead, and that these three persons are one God. The great mystery, I think, is that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life." Angels looked with wonder and admiration, doubtless, upon God's mercy and love, as exhibited in the plan of salvation. It was evidently a mystery to them, as it is to us, that God should stoop so low to save rebellious man by begetting a Son in his own image, and after his own likeness, the likeness of men, and that that Son was willing to suffer and die in ignominy on the cross for the sinful race. It is not necessary to resort to an absurdity in order to find the great mystery in Godliness. There is more mystery in the self-existence of God, the existence of the universe, the existence of ourselves than we poor finite mortals can comprehend. There are mysteries connected with the most common things around us—mystery in the tiny leaf, the budding blossom, the luscious fruit—in fact all nature teems with wonderful mysteries. Then let us be content with these, if we are fond of mysteries, and not impose upon men such theological absurdities as will drive them from truth and from God.

LETTER DRAWER.

Editor Restitution:—I will tell why I have not written before; I wanted to see if there was any other paper believing in the second advent of Christ that was not afraid to investigate all points of the Bible. I am satisfied that THE RESTITUTION comes the nearest to the one gospel; but what has seemed the strangest thing is, that people believing the one gospel, of this that people out of all denominations will be saved. If half of the gospel has power to save one man, why not save all that believe half? If the faith of our half brethren—the Advents—has power to save, why not unite with them and say nothing about the Christ and his coming kingdom? Is Christ to choose a bride out of churches that differ so wide in faith that they will not allow them to preach in their church and brand them as heretics? Is Christ's bride to be united before the wedding, or after? Is it necessary to believe the gospel before being baptized, or after? Has Christ promised to save by being baptized, or not? Christ said to John, "Suffer it to be so now; for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness." If Christ had to be baptized in order to fulfill his righteousness to gain a resurrection, can we gain one short of believing in Christ and being baptized in his name? Dear brethren and sisters, let us settle these questions by the Bible, not by the preacher. Did I believe there was power in the Baptist faith to save one man I never would have left them after holding the position I did with them for twenty years.

Your brother in Christ, not out of Christ,

Editor Restitution:—Upon my return home on the last day of December, I concluded to spend most of my time at my own quiet home during the month of January, February and March, in study and writing—a privilege which I have never enjoyed for more than forty years. Only away from home two Sundays, but during this time I had a number of pupils who frequently called upon me and spent hours in order to gain a knowledge of the plan of human redemption—the kingdom of God and the things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ, and the work to be accomplished under his reign. Since April the first I have spent a number of Sundays at Sanburo, nine miles from this; had a good time in preaching the word. Have visited Thorold, Ponthill, and Gainsborough, Norwich and Sweaburg, Ont. In all these places I had a good turnout and good meetings, and good visits with all the loved ones. Have visited the brethren in Clark and gave two discourses. Had a joyful time with them all. Spent six days with the loved ones in Darlington; visited them all at their own homes, conversing upon the One Faith, the one hope, etc. On Sunday their chapel was well filled with attentive hearers, some of them coming a distance of twelve miles, who feasted upon two discourses predicated upon Matt. xvi. 38; xxv. 46. I had the honor of immersing four into the saving name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins. Two of them were the daughters of Brother S. Hogarth and their husbands. They were united by myself in marriage last autumn. Twenty-one years have rolled away since I first commenced to labor with this people, and I record this visit among the best, also my visit in Clark.

None but the merest handful of heartless sceptics can imagine it possible to preserve the world and its inhabitants from utter ruin without a controlling and overruling God. Even where little or nothing of what we understand by Christian belief exists, men feel that atheism "will not do." The human race cannot afford to lose God!

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, APRIL 4, 1880.

THE English missionary, Dr. Parsons, and his two servants, have been murdered at Ismidt, Turkey.

GOD has blessed our land with an abundant harvest. As an offering of first fruits remember his cause. Bear in mind that it requires money to disseminate the truth. Now that times are financially good, remember THE RESTITUTION.

The Religious Orders in France.

In a late number of the London Times we find an article giving a detailed account of the scenes connected with the expulsion of the Jesuits from their chief establishment situated in the city of Paris by the Rue des Postes, where also is the chapel containing the tomb of marble memorials of the Jesuits martyred during the Commune. The extracts we make from the number of the Times will give our readers some idea of the strange spectacle connected with the expulsion as well as with the opinions of the editor of that wealthy journal:

PARIS, June 30.—The Jesuit establishments throughout France with the exception of their colleges for lay pupils which have yet next month's grace, were closed to-day. Shortly after 6 o'clock a. m., M. Clement, a judicial functionary, and M. Dulac, police commissary, presented themselves at the gate of the establishment in the Rue des Postes, each of which a large number of Gendarmes, Gardes de Paris and Municipal Guards collected. On being admitted in the name of the law, they passed into the court and knocked at an inner door, when the superior, Father Pilot, answered the summons. MM. Chesnelong and de Ravignan, senators, being behind him. M. Clement read the decree of the Prefect of Police closing the establishment. M. de Ravignan, as a director of the lay society now owning the premises, protested against the violation of domicile, adding that all men of all right had to be expelled at that early hour. Father Pilot claimed the right of domicile and cohabitation enjoyed by all Frenchmen, and both declared they would yield only to force. M. Clement asked to see the title-deeds, and M. de Ravignan named the notary with whom they were deposited. Father Pilot and M. de Ravignan were then asked whether they would open the door. They shook their heads, and on the repetition of the question were silent. M. Clement then went back into the court, where he was greeted with cries of "Vivent les Jesuites! Vivent les proscrits!" He sent for a policeman for a locksmith. A locksmith soon arrived and forced the inner door. M. de Ravignan renewed his protest against the violation of domicile, and warned the officers of the responsibility they incurred. M. Clement said he was only performing his duty, and asked where he could find the Jesuits whom he had to expel. After a fresh protest, M. de Ravignan said that, as the violation of domicile had been consummated, it was useless to make them lose time; he would guide them. M. Dulac was then conducted up stairs, entered the first cell, and found Father Matin reading at a table. "Monsieur, I am ordered to turn you out." "By what right?" "By a mandate which I have read to your Superior." "The mandate is illegal, and I refuse to obey it." "In that case, I must resort to force." "Do so." Two policemen put their hands on the Jesuit's shoulder, and he said, "Very good; I yield to force." M. de Carayon Latour pushed forward and claimed the honor of escorting him. The second cell was locked, and the commissary went on to Father Pilot's door. The Father urged that he had a proprietary right, which even the decree of expulsion recognized, and M. Chesnelong, after some parleying, obtained leave by the Superior to remain for the present. Each of the other inmates had the escort of some Deputy or Senator. M. Chesnelong accompanying Father Matignon to the Foreign Mission House, amid cries of "Vivent les Jesuites!"—and many of the spectators kneeling for the blessing of the expelled. When all but the second cell had been cleared, and there was no response to the knocks, M. Chesnelong said the Father was an infirm man of 68, who surely would be left undisturbed. The locksmith, however, forced the door. The Father, who was seated in an armchair, refused to leave, and two policemen led him out. Meeting the Superior in the corridor, he knelt for his blessing. Father Millerlot, aged 81, quietly took up his umbrella and walked to his confessional in the Church of St. Sulpice. Father Lefebvre, on being summoned to leave, said even the Communs left him undisturbed, and asked whether a regular Government would go beyond the Commune. He was allowed to remain, as also Father Sauter, aged 81, blind and paralytic, three inmates thus being left in the house.

From a somewhat lengthy editorial our space admits of only some brief extracts.

Englishmen at large have no love for Popery, and still less for Jesuitism; but Jesuits and all other orders are perfectly free in this country, not because we have any sympathy with their methods and aims, but because we have little fear that they can do us any serious harm, and because we have learnt by experience that suppression is a less effective weapon than toleration and indifference. It is impossible not to wish that similar views had prevailed with the leaders of the Republic in France.

It must be admitted, nevertheless, that the French Government and people are most qualified to judge for themselves of their own real interests in the matter. If we have learnt in England to tolerate creeds and societies with which we have no sympathy whatever, yet it is not easier to reflect that we finally parted company with Popery some two centuries ago, and that our struggle with its moral and influence was a long and bitter one. What Popery was to the Englishmen of 1688 that is clericalism to Frenchmen of the present day. "Je change de lutte comme cette femme-là," said M. Gambetta, and we may be sure that a statesman of his profound knowledge of France and its sentiments would not have uttered the words unless he had been convinced that they represented a strong and decided current of opinion among his countrymen. The clericalism which Frenchmen fear as a foe is not so much the rural priesthood as the educational propaganda controlled by the great religious orders. Every Catholic country which aims at progress and freedom must needs come sooner or later into collision with Rome. There is little doubt that the Government of France will prevail in the end in the contest on which it has now definitely entered; it will meet with determined resistance, and it will incur no little obloquy, not only from the friends of clericalism, but from many of the most disinterested friends of freedom. But it is supported by a force which no prudent government can decline to take account of—the force of French Democracy, whose hostility to priestly influence is deep-seated and ineradicable. The final issue is not doubtful, but the first stage of the contest is manifestly one in which little credit will be gained by the victors and much sympathy will be awarded to the vanquished.

"The Whole Creation"—The Foundation of Faith in God's Loving Will Revealed.

The angel [Rev. xiv. 6] had the everlasting gospel to proclaim to those that dwelt on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people. Those that dwell on the earth, and the children of men [Dan. ii. 38], and the nations, are the ones to whom that gospel was to be preached, and to whom the hour of God's judgment was to be declared. Those who should in some sense receive the everlasting gospel, and in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as he has declared to his servants the prophets. Rev. x. 6-7.

The gospel pre-preached to Abraham. Gen. xxii. 17, 18; Gal. iii. 8, pervades "the prophets" of both Testaments, Acts xv. 15, 16; so that our text teaches that "the mystery" of evil—of sin and death and redemption is to be finished, ended up, or reach its outcome, as set forth in "the gospel"—the good speech, or promise of good, through all the prophets. The plan is one, through the great week of God, seven thousand years.

This range of revelation presents the material universe in the foreground, to set forth the might and the majesty of the unseen Creator, and so impress us with the reality, the stability and glory of his purpose in restoring what his sinful creatures have marred.

The heavens, the earth, and the sea, with all their furniture, (Isa. xxxiii. 6; Job xxvi. 13,) yet continue "according to God's ordinances" and furnish the firmest and most sublime foundation for proclaiming "time (to the anti-Christian powers) no longer;" or no more delay as to the sounding of "the seventh angel—the resurrection of the just—and the kingdom of Christ." The text teaches all this and refers us to the prophets for particulars.

This apocalyptic angel is enrobed with the rainbow—the symbol of mercy to man and the earth. Gen. ix. Thus, the judgment on the Gentile powers—on "the beast, Babylon and false prophets"—is in mercy to the world. It is for the purpose of ridding earth of its oppressors and of fulfilling his oath-confirmed promise of blessing through Abraham and his seed—Christ—and all standing in his name. It is to be done, according to the gospel,—the good news,—proclaimed by all the prophets. Thus, our text teaches the assured "deliverance, salvation and restitution of all things spoken by all the prophets." Acts iii. 21; Rom. xi. 26-29; xv. 8-13; Heb. ix. 28.

This doctrine embraces all that pertains to the royal priesthood of Christ as "King of Salem, Prince of peace (so ignored by Jews and Christians) on the throne of David, to order it and establish it forever for the age." He will conquer a peace to last through a thousand years—the great Sabbath and day of God. Heb. iv. 9; 2 Pet. iii. 8; 1 Cor. xv. 24-27. And this will ultimate in "the age of ages"—everlasting. Eph. ii. 7; iii. 21; Dan. vii. 18.

This rainbow angel is but the counterpart and confirmation of the glorious grace and truth, disclosed in the rainbow throne, chap. iv.; Ezek. i.; Isa. vi., and all in accord with "the pattern shewn in the mount," and unfolded and realized in "the tabernacle," and organized into the four-sided camp of Israel, with its four ensigns, "the lion, the ox and the eagle," Ezek. i. 10; Num. ii. Nay, further, this "pattern" given to Moses, was amplified to David as to the temple and the throne of the Lord. Solomon sat upon the throne of the Lord in the place of David his father. 1 Chron. xxix. 23.

All this went to constitute "the shadow of good things to come." Heb. viii. 5; x. 1. "His throne shall be established in mercy." Isa. xvi. 5; Psa. lxxxix., where the "greater than Moses," the real "King in Jerusalem," the "greater than Solomon," the world-wide "prince of peace," will reign and triumph before his ancients gloriously. Isa. xxiv. 23; Luke i. 33; ii. 32; xxii. 29, 30. "In his days Judah shall be saved and Israel dwell safely. This is his name, the Lord our righteousness." Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. "Then all the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord; and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship, for the kingdom is the Lord's, and he the governor among the nations." Psa. xxii. 27, 28; lxxii. 1-20; xcvii. 1-10, cii. 13-22; Isa. xxv. 6-9; Matt. xix. 28; Rom. xv. 8-13; Rev. xv. 4.

The symbols and heraldry of heaven pertain to redemption. They embrace creation as its sphere. The rainbow, modified with the rays of the sun, the showers and atmosphere combines the elements of hope and life, and peace; and the precious fruits of earth for all flesh. It arches the earth, the token of God, the smile of God.

This symbol encircles, and mercy inhabits, the throne of promise. Psa. lxxxix. 14, 15. "Blessed are the people that know the joyful sound." The Holy One of Israel is our King. Isa. lxxiii. 1-20.

Nay more, the angel is announcing the grand crisis of the kingdom to which the rainbow throne belongs, is clothed with a cloud and a rainbow about his head: in confirmation of God's covenant with man and earth, his very investiture heralds the purpose of God, to fulfill all the bright and glowing visions "declared (evangelized) by the prophets."

1. The view must be superficial and puerile that "will not come to the light" of divine good will, so set forth in this heraldry of "heavenly things." John iii. 19; Heb. ix. 26-28. Please don't deny the rainbow symbol!

2. The official honor of the saints, as kings and priests, and their sevenfold glories in the message to the seven churches—from "the tree of life in the paradise of God," to a new home, white raiment, and so on to a share in "the throne of the heavenly Kingdom" in good news to them. Chap. i. 2-3.

3. The sealing of the twelve times twelve thousand—144 thousands of Israel. Chap. vii. This is good news to humanity as it is an advent of primal import to the world. Isa. lxi. 7-11.

4. The grand and crowning scenes of judgment appear in the song of Moses and the Lamb. It finds its reason thus: "For all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest." This "good news" transcends all present church extension as God's ways transcends ours. Isa. lv. 9.

5. The doom of "the beast, Babylon and false prophets" leads to the binding of Satan, "that he should deceive the nations no more till the thousand years are fulfilled." Chap. xx. 3. This is "good news," most glorious; and all these points of the gospel accord with the teachings of the prophets, and confound all the theories of men, which begin and end with our passing age.

6. This Bible view is reached by accepting the word of God on all these aspects of the coming kingdom. Who does well to object?

7. On all these themes I might expatiate and fill many pages, but faith delights in divine testimony rather than man's, and God's truth, like his lightning bolt, may do its work at a stroke. Amen.

"In the love of the spirit" I exhort all to believe and confess Christ in his words, and in those of his prophets.

J. B. COOK.

SELECTIONS.

[New Era.]

Prophecies Concerning Israel. Their Land and King, not yet Fulfilled.

Sir:—In my last letter a number of Scriptures were quoted, or referred to, wherein Israel's triumphs in the past are recorded; also, a few portions wherein the future prowess of that miraculously preserved people is clearly foretold, (Micah iv. 13; v. 8, 9; vii. 16,) and in a general way, the discomfiture of all their adversaries. In this letter, according to promise, the subject of "Israel's future victories over the nations," will be continued.

In the 38th and 39th chapters of Ezekiel is recorded a most wonderful prophecy, illustrative of what God said by Micah, vii. 15. "According to the days of thy coming out of the land of Egypt will I show unto him marvellous things;" for "marvellous" indeed will be the things which Israel shall see in that day in which those two chapters will be fulfilled. The prophecy is concerning a confederacy of nations, whose armies invade the land of Israel in "the latter days," to spoil that portion of Israel who shall have returned unto Palestine, and shall be there dwelling in "unwalled villages," rich in silver and gold, cattle and goods. "As a cloud" the mighty host comes "out of the north parts," against God's people and land, under the leadership of one who is the subject of other prophecies, (see chap. xxxviii. 17) and is here designated, according to the Septuagint, (the greek version of the Old Testament) archonta Rhs Mosoch, kai Thobel, which signifies in English, Prince of Ros, Meshech and Tubal, who can hardly be any other than a Czar of Russia. The predicted result is the miraculous deliverance of Israel by the destruction of five-sixths of their invaders. In somewhat the same manner as in the days of Joshua, Gideon and Jonathan; the earth trembles, every man's sword is against his brother, and the Lord rains upon them great hailstones, fire and brimstone! And thus in the future, as of old, in the eyes of Pharoah and the Egyptians, will the God of Israel be "magnified and known" in the eyes of the many nations, represented in the hosts of Israel's latter-day spoiler. "From that day and forward," too, all all the house of Israel know the Lord their God. Then shall their full and final restoration and conversion be accomplished: and the way prepared for the fulfillment of the nine chapters of wonders, in connection with Israel and their land, with which Ezekiel's prophecies conclude.

Believing that many persons may read a prophecy, if placed before them, in the New Era, who would not turn to it in the Bible, I shall quote, in full, the two chapters, above referred to, adding an occasional remark:

"And the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Son of Man, set thy face against Gog, the land of Magog, the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal, and prophesy against him, and say, Thus saith the Lord God: behold, I am against thee, O! Gog, the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal; and I will turn thee back, and put hooks into thy jaws, and I will bring thee forth, and all thine army, horses and horsemen, all of them clothed with all sorts of armor, even a great company with bucklers and shields, all of them handling swords; Persia, Ethiopia and Libya with them; all of them with shield and helmet; Gomer and all his bands; the house of Togarmah, of the north quarters, and all his bands, and many people with thee. Be thou prepared, and prepare for thyself, thou and all thy company that are assembled unto thee; and be thou a guard unto them. After many days thou shalt be visited; in the latter years thou shalt come into the land that is brought back from the sword, and is gathered out of many people, against the mountains of Israel, which have been always waste; but it is brought forth out of the nations, and they shall dwell safely—all of them.' This implies that Israel will have been but a short time in their land when the invasion takes place.

"Thou shalt ascend and come like a storm, thou shalt be like a cloud to cover the land, thou, and all thy bands, and many people with thee. Thus saith the Lord: It shall also come to pass, that at the same time shall things come into thy mind, and thou shalt think an evil thought; and thou shalt say, I will go up to the land of unwalled villages; I will go up to them that are at rest, that dwell safely, all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates; to take a spoil, and to take a prey, to turn thine hand upon the desolate places that are now inhabited, and upon the people that are gathered out of the nations, which have gotten cattle and goods, that dwell in the midst of the land." The Hebrew word here rendered "midst" signifies navel, see marginal reading, and as the same word is used in Judges ix. 37, to denote a certain part of the land of Israel, we may conclude that it is the locality in which Israel will be when invaded.

"Sheba and Dedan, and the merchants of Tarshish, with all the young lions thereof," (friends, seemingly, of Israel, probably the British, who now possess India, thought to be the Tarshish of 1 Kings x. 22,) "shall say unto thee, Art thou come to take a spoil? hast thou gathered thy company to take a prey? to carry away silver and gold, to take a great spoil? Therefore, Son of Man, prophesy and say unto Gog, Thus saith the Lord God: In that day when my people of Israel dwelleth safely, shalt thou that know it? And thou shalt come from thy place out of the north parts, thou, and many people with thee, all of them riding upon horses, a great company and a mighty army; and thou shalt come up against my people of Israel, as a cloud to cover the land; it shall be in the latter days," "the latter days are often mentioned in the Scriptures as the time in which many prophecies are to be fulfilled; see Deut. iv. 30; xxxi. 29; Isa. ii. 2; Jer. xxiii. 20; Dan. x. 14; Hosea iii. 5; Micah iv. 1,) "and I will bring thee against my land," (there is only one land which God speaks of as his: see Lev. xxv. 23; Deut. xxxii. 43; xxxiii. 13; Psa. x. 16; Isa. xix. 25; Joel ii. 18, iii. 2; in every instance, the Lord's land, the land of Israel,) "that the heathen may know me, when I shall be sanctified in thee, O Gog, before their eyes." To understand the meaning of God being sanctified in Gog, we have only to know how God got himself honor upon Pharoah and his host, namely, by overthrowing them: see Exod. xiv. 17, 18.

"Thus saith the Lord God, Art thou he of whom I have spoken in old time, by my servants the prophets of Israel, which prophesied in those days many years, that I would bring thee against them?"

This shows not only what a mere piece on the Divine chess-board of the future Gog is, but also that other prophets have prophesied of him; not as "Gog," but under other designations, notably, as "the Assyrian," see Isa. xxx. 31, with the context, 25-28 verses, noting such expressions as "the day of the great slaughter, when the towers fall," and compare them with Ezek. xxxviii. 20. See also Micah v. 6, for an Assyrian invader of Israel's land, out of whose hand the Bethlehem-born King of Israel, Jesus, of course, delivers Israel. What Micah says, in verse 6, implies that "the land of Assyria," and "the land of Nimrod," must become, are the fulfillment of these prophecies, the seat of the latter day Assyrian Empire; for when Christ delivers Israel from the Assyrian invader, he lays waste those lands. Hence, believing that the Russian power is the latter day Assyrian, I look for Russia to possess and develop those ancient seats of Empire. The present anxiety of the two great rivals—Britain and Russia, for dominion from India to the Mediterranean, will increase year by year, and tend to rapidly develop the Euphratean countries, as well as Moab, Ammon, Palestine, etc., and so prepare the way for the fulfillment of the prophecies. Nebuchadnezzar and his great city, Babylon, will have worthy representatives on the Euphrates when the Prince of Ros, Meshech and Tubal, and his Asiatic Metropolis shall be there.

"And it shall come to pass at the same time, when Gog shall come against the land of Israel, saith the Lord God, that my fury shall come up in my face. For in my jealousy, and in the fire of my wrath, have I spoken, Surely in that day there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel, so that the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the heaven, and the beasts of the field, and all creeping things that creep upon the land, (Heb.) and all the men that are upon the face of the land, (Heb.) shake at my presence, and the mountains shall be thrown down, and the steep places shall fall, and every wall shall fall to the ground." Compare Zech. xiv. 4, 5.

"And I call for a sword against him throughout all my mountains, saith the Lord God; every man's sword shall be against his brother. And I will plead against him with pestilence (compare Zech. xiv. 12) and with blood; and I will rain upon him, and upon his bands and upon the many people that are with him, an overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire and brimstone. Thus will I magnify myself and sanctify myself; and I will be known in the eyes of many nations, and they shall know that I am the Lord."

This brings us to the close of Ezekiel's 38th chapter; the remainder of the prophecy, in the 39th chapter, with comments, will be given in another letter.—Omega.

NEWS ITEMS.

The destruction of a brigade of the British army in Afghanistan is causing intense excitement in India and in Great Britain, and news of further disaster is looked for. English sentiment, of course, demands vigorous measures for the vindication of the British arms in Asia.

This overwhelming disaster to the British forces near Candahar, in southern Afghanistan, occured at a time when the Anglo-Indian army was making ready to withdraw from Cabul, three hundred miles to the north-east and nearer the outposts of Russia. The establishment at Cabul of Abdurrahman Khan, the new Ameer, promised a postponement, though probably not a final and satisfactory solution, of some of the questions by which Mr. Gladstone's government is perplexed.

The sudden destruction of Gen Burrows' brigade by Ayoob Khan's brilliant movement across the river Helmund is an event of much more than military importance. It puts off indefinitely the withdrawal of the British forces from Afghanistan. It renders still more insecure the tenure of Abdurrahman, who is suspected and despised by the national Afghan party, and it forces Mr. Gladstone's government to prosecute with vigor a war which for two years Mr. Gladstone has been denouncing as unjust and unholy.

TROOPS FOR AFGHANISTAN.

LONDON, July 30.—It is stated that arrangements have been made for the dispatch of 4,000 or 5,000 troops to Afghanistan from England within a few days, and that the military authorities are prepared to supply from England within the next fortnight 12,000 troops of all arms. The Admiralty has signified to the war department its readiness to provide transportation for 20,000 men within three weeks.

LONDON, July 29.—The Porte's reply to the collective note of the powers is deferential in tone, but affords no ground for hope that Turkey will accept the decision of the Berlin conference.

The prospect is that there is about to be a bloody conflict between the Albanians and the Montenegrins, the former resisting the occupation of a portion of their territory, in accordance with the treaty of Berlin. In the meantime, Turkey continues her war preparations to resist the annexation of a portion of her territory to Greece, as decided by the Great Powers.

CONSTANTINOPLE, July 31.—A Scutari dispatch says four battalions of Montenegrins attacked the Albanians on Wednesday, and were repulsed.

BUCHAREST, July 30.—Roumania is contracting for 20,000,000 cartridges for 100,000 men, which she can put in line in case of war.

LONDON, July 30.—Various special dispatches state that Servia has ordered the mobilization of her army.

THE EARTHQUAKE.

SMYRNA, July 30.—The earthquake which occurred here yesterday demolished four or five houses and damaged many others. Two persons were killed; five or six injured. Much damage done in the adjacent country. At Burnabad eleven houses, several cafes and two minarets were demolished; two persons were killed and ten injured. Slight tremblings continue.

The figurehead of the British naval training ship Atalanta, which has been missing for several months, having on board 300 boys, has been picked up in the Atlantic and brought to St. Johns, N. F. This finally decides the sad fate of the ship, which was probably sunk by icebergs.

BERLIN, July 30.—It is believed in official circles that the Porte will come to a direct understanding with Montenegro, and cede the Dulcigno and Hojana districts. The Greek question will be reopened on the ground that Turkey was not heard at the Berlin conference. The naval demonstration will be postponed.

Mr. Gladstone, the British Premier, is prostrated with fever. He is in his 71st year, and much anxiety is felt as to his recovery. The latest Bulletin, of Aug. 2, at 5 p. m. says: "Gladstone is doing as well as could be expected, but his fever continues." Sir Wm. Jenner, physician to the Queen, was in attendance.

Mother and Child.

A brave woman disguised beyond recognition, followed her husband for a week in order to recover her child. Finally she discovered that the little one had been left in a Catholic convent at Atchison, Kan. She drove at once to the retreat. Not knowing who she was or what she came for, the sisters opened the door at her bidding, and allowed her to enter the house. She stated that she wanted to see the little girl. She was very restless and uneasy, refusing a seat and walking the floor continually until the child appeared. Disguised as the woman was, the child recognized her at once and ran into her outstretched arms, crying "Oh, my mamma." The woman hugged the child to her breast with one arm and with the other tried to open the door. Failing in this, she called to the driver outside to kick the door in. A scene of excitement ensued, and for a few moments there was a desperate struggle between the sisters and the determined woman, the sisters endeavoring to retain their charge, and the mother struggling to rescue it. The driver without finally succeeded in forcing the door open, and the woman with the child in her arms was free. She placed the child in the carriage, entered herself, drew a pistol and pointing it at the terrified sisters, said "Come and take my child," and the hackman drove off.

A single bad habit will mar an otherwise faultless character, as an ink-drop soileth the pure white page.

POETRY.

"Till He Come."

SELECTED BY H. E. STEVENS.

Only a few more hurdles must we carry,
In heat and toil, beneath the scorching sun;
Only a little longer must we tarry
Only a little longer "till He come."

Only a little more of life's long journey
Through the world's desert till the day is done;
Only a few more days of scenes of conflict—
Only a few more Marahs "till He come."

Only a little longer, thirsting gladly
Of the spirit-gift the bride's cup runs;
Only a little longer, waiting sadly,
In the fast falling twilight, "till He come."

Only a few more billows, wildly tossing,
Flinging us backward from the longed-for shore;
Only a few more chances our pilgrim crossing
Then all the trials of the way are o'er.

So let our eyes be ever fixed
Nothing to serve Him in the days of grace,
While the thought cheers us in our constant toilings,
Soon He will come and meet us face to face.

Report of Quarterly Assembly.

The quarterly assembly of the Church of God met according to announcement at Forest school house, at three o'clock p. m., on Saturday before the third Sunday in July, 1880. The faith of Abraham or faith once delivered to the saints, was well represented from different locations, both in Maryland, and Virginia. The usual custom was observed by the writer. Reading a portion of the first epistle of Paul the apostle to the Church of God at Corinth, and it was made plain that while the letter was written by the inspired Penman over eighteen hundred years ago, as it was recorded that the word of God abideth forever, that it was just as new now as when it was first addressed to the sanctified ones in the Apostle's day, and in that sense the few faithful witnesses composing that assembly with all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, both theirs and ours could consider the epistle addressed direct to them for their edification and instruction. Preached Saturday night to a respectable and attentive congregation. The necessary preparation being made, the day on Sunday was spent on the ground, and in the house. A reasonable portion of time was spent in the forenoon to show that one of the important objects of the meeting was, that as a goodly number of that community, had some twenty years past entered into a covenant to acknowledge no master but Christ, and to take no creed but the Bible, and that the brethren from a distance had visited them, to encourage them, to renew that covenant, and while some of the old fathers and mothers were in their dusty beds, waiting in the language of the old man of Uz, or Patriarch Job, until their change come, and that we by so doing would distinguish ourselves and let our light shine before their children and all who had a ear to hear that they be constrained to glorify our Father in heaven, by believing the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, and being baptized in his name for the remission of sins, and right here we showed that a son or daughter of Adam, may assent to the whole truth as set forth in the holy Scriptures, and be baptized in the all-saving name, and yet not be a Christian, that by their fruit shall ye know them. Make the tree good and the fruit will be good. We showed that for men to profess the truth, and to still go on when it will suit their purpose to lie, steal, slander, get drunk and be slothful in business so as not to provide for themselves and their own household, and pay their honest debts, were mere assenters to the truth, that it was evidence that the fallow ground of the heart had never been dug with the mattock of the gospel, that the conscience has never been purged from dead works to serve the living and true God, that baptism was not the washing away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God, and that the conscience must become good by an intelligent belief of the truth and a reformation before it can be answered that there was a tasting of the good word of God and the powers of the world to come before baptism can put them into Christ.

Hence we showed that the tree thus being made good by the power of God, the gospel being that power, the fruit will be good also, which was called the fruit of the spirit, which is love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance, against such there is no law. Then Elder Kipe delivered a discourse on the evil of intemperance, in which he showed by many plain proofs, that the governments of the day were put to an enormous expense, by intemperate use of ardent spirits; he showed that wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging, and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise. Then we continued to read the epistle, and in the light of truth put a difference between the clean and the unclean, by referring to the fruit of the two classes, the mere assenters to the truth, and the good and honest hearts, who receive with meekness the ingrafted word in the love of it, which is able to save and purify the soul by obeying the truth.

We showed that there are false teachers now as well as in the days of the Prophet Ezekiel, who said of such, that they put no difference between the clean and the unclean for dishonest gain; and having read to the fifteenth chapter, we dwelt upon the glorious doctrine of the resurrection, as the only means in the economy of God, by which the low fallen believer will ever attain to the high destiny to which we are invited in the gospel.

The assembly was then continued until three o'clock P. M., which time was spent, after enjoying the hospitality of the dear ones, who had prepared a rich repast for the occasion, in social conversation with regard to the promotion of the glorious cause, which we believe is soon to usher in the great day of the Lord, so long prayed and hoped for, by his waiting bride.

It is due here to the much esteemed families near the place of meeting, while it was, as can be seen, not necessary that we accept their invitations, to dine with them at their houses, to express our heartfelt gratitude for the kindness and sympathy which they so freely manifested towards us while calling them back to walk in the path the fathers trod, and to establish pure Christianity in their midst.

At the suggestion of Brother McKey, the people and brethren having assembled, as he was to preach at 8 o'clock, that I would continue the unbroken chain of reasoning out of the Book of books, until his hour. I did so, when he addressed the assembly, and the congregation in attendance, on the great theme of the "Kingdom of God to be set up on the earth." As he went back, and scanned the covenants and promises made of God unto the fathers relative to that kingdom, he showed, conclusively, that the faith and hope of the children of God, from the beginning, yea, from the time That the Most High swore by himself—because he could swear by no greater to confirm the promise made to the fathers,—that, in him and his seed, all nations shall be blessed, has, and does now, center in the establishing of a divine government in the earth, whose executors will be all righteous. The assembly was much edified at the earnestness and zeal manifested by the aged brother, while making an humble proclamation of the faith once delivered to the saints. The day being far spent, we condensed the form of sound words, which we are commanded to hold fast unto, that, by so doing, we not only save ourselves but them that hear us. In order to give expression in behalf of the assembly of their faith in the things concerning the kingdom of God and name of Jesus Christ, it being that faith without which it is impossible to please God, and seeing depicted upon the very countenance of the dear brethren and sisters assembled, to bear testimony to the whole truth, that they were tasting of the good word of God and the powers of the world to come.

In conclusion, we read the cheering words of the apostle as found in the last verse of the fifteenth chapter of the Epistle, as that was as far as we read on the occasion, "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord," thus being confident that all were in the faith, while praising God, from whom all blessings flow, by singing,—

How sweet, how heavenly is the sight,
When those that love the Lord,
In one another's peace delight,
And thus fulfill his word.

When each can feel his brother's sigh,
And with him bear a part;
When sorrow flows from eye to eye,
And joy from heart to heart.

When love in one delightful stream
Through every bosom flows,
And union sweet, and dear esteem,
In every action glows.

The right hand of fellowship was given in the glorious hope of composing a part of the general assembly and church of the first-born written in heaven, when it assembles in that magnificent temple or new Jerusalem, the city of the great King; a city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God, compared with which, as we had plainly shown in the run of our discourse, that the moon will be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts reigns in Mount Zion and before his ancients gloriously, thus distinguishing ourselves before a gazing multitude (who seemed to look on with intense interest, as if taking knowledge that we had been with Jesus), as a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people, to show forth the praise of him who hath called us out of darkness into his marvelous light.

On Monday a company of ten from Virginia who attended the meeting stopped at Brownsville, where we all met with a hearty reception by the friends of that place; preached the word at night to an attentive and orderly congregation. We hope that it may be seed sown in good ground and bring forth fruit to the glory of God. Parted with the dear ones there Tuesday morning for our homes, with our hearts overflowing with gratitude for their kindness towards us while with them. May they all get on the bridal robe so as to be welcome guests as they welcomed us at the great feast which will be in the economy of God made to all people. The assembly closed with the understanding that our annual assembly be held at the house of the brethren in Winchester, Va., to commence on Friday night before the first Sunday in September next.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Editor Restitution:—A prominent and unexpected fact is before the world—that is, if days of persecution have begun, the beginning is against the Romish church. No wonder the Times has a telling editorial on what is actually being done in France:—expelling the Jesuits. We have none of us a good opinion of Jesuits. But what would be thought of the British or American Governments driving away any men who were peaceable, and submissive to law? Did the Russian Czar so unceremoniously banish any of his subjects, what a cry of "despotism" would be heard! But here is an act of "Republican" France!

I mail you the Times. Its Paris correspondents tell the story. In the letter of June 30, we find these words:—"At Laval several English Jesuits called the crowd to witness that their rights as English citizens were being violated, and declared they would appeal to the English Ambassador." If these men do appeal, Mr. Gladstone may have an ugly business to deal with; an unwelcome addition to what he has already. The Times tells an ominous truth when it says:—"* * * "French Democracy, whose hostility to priestly influence is deep-seated and ineradicable." The Guardian of this morning also tells its readers a striking fact; which is that the Belgium Minister to the Vatican has quitted Rome, and the rupture between the Papacy and the government of King Leopold is now complete.

The French Senate by a large majority has passed a bill abolishing Army Chaplaincies.

The portents of the times since the "Liberals" came into power are truly impressive. Asiatic affairs are more and more disturbing. And instead of the Eastern question being "settled" by the Berlin Conference renewed war appears imminent.

It is evident that the Church of Rome is verging a point that will determine either her strength or weakness. That she has fulfilled the description of Anti-christ I do not believe. An uneasy time for both Romish and Protestant clergy seems at hand.

LETTER DRAWER.

Editor Restitution:—As I see John Foore's name in the July 7th, No. 26, of your paper, and as I am well acquainted with him, Foore, and wish to correspond with him, please give his address, as when I moved from the east of this state to where I am now living, I lost correspondence with most all of my brethren. As I am living in an isolated country, sixty miles from a railroad or any city of importance, and none of the One Faith near me to keep posted as to the whereabouts of THE RESTITUTION, and was a long time without it, but, by some means got to find it again, or where it was published. As some of the readers of the paper might want to hear what I am doing, I will say—doing what Jacob used to do—keep herds of cattle. This is the stockman's country. We want no feed for winter as stock do well on the range winters as well as summers without feed, but this is no farming country as it is too dry. The best of all is, this is a very healthy country; no sickness either in man or beast. But we lack society; would like to have some of the preaching brethren come this way, as we have a large field here for laborers. Would like to hear from Brother J. M. Stephenson if he is in Kansas. If he will come to Medicine Lodge and give us a few lectures we will pay his expenses from Hutchinson down and back, as that is the nearest point by railroad to Medicine Lodge. He can come by stage from that place, Hutchinson, to Medicine Lodge. If he or any other of the brethren wish to come, please let us know, so that we can meet them at Medicine Lodge. Will some one give an explanation of Acts viii. 7? Did the unclean spirits cry aloud, or was it those possessed with them,—that is the spirits?

Yours, hoping for the soon return of our Lord and Master,

A. C. BENDER.

Editor Restitution:—I write to say that the 10th of May, I went eighteen miles to hear J. M. Stephenson preach the first sermon that I ever heard preached of the one faith doctrine and the more that I investigate the more I am convinced that it is the only true faith. Some of my neighbors think I am bordering on infidelity because I do not still cling to the old Orthodox faith, but tell them that after the manner they call heresy so worship I the God of my Father, believing all things that is written both in the law and prophets, having hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and of the unjust. Acts xxiv. 14.

Fraternally yours,

W. H. LOWE.

Milford, Ills.

Editor Restitution:—I cannot do without my paper so long as I am able to get it. It is about all the preaching I hear. It is full of good reading. I am very much interested in the Coming Age, by J. P. Weethee, how I would like to hear some good preaching once more. There never was a time the people needed the truth preached to them more than now. May God bless you in your work of sending out the truth, and grant that it may do good wherever it goes. Yours in hope,

MARY A. SCUDLEY.

BREVITIES.

—Mr. Nelson, an astronomer who is author of an excellent work on the moon, has obtained a new parallax of the sun from observations on the parallactic inequality of the moon's motion. It amounts to 8,813 seconds, agreeing within five-thousandths of a second with the parallax, 8,848 seconds, obtained by Prof. Newcomb in 1877, and corresponds with an actual distance of the earth from the sun of 92,680,000 miles.

A MOUNTAIN SWALLOWED UP.

In Rev. vi. 14, we read that among the appalling physical phenomena which are to accompany the breaking of the sixth seal, "every mountain" is to be moved out of its place." What that scene will be, may be imagined from a phenomenon recently witnessed in South America. On June 7th, the inhabitants of San Luis Potosi were startled by a tremendous sound, resembling a thunderclap of unprecedented loudness. Shortly afterward, intelligence reached the town that a small mountain situate near the outskirts of San Luis, had sunk into the bowels of the earth leaving a vast gulf, some six hundred feet in breadth. For some hours after the sudden disappearance of the mountain the surface of the ground immediately adjacent to this huge cleft continued to be agitated by volcanic action.

A short time ago the people of Quarten, in the canton of St. Gall, Switzerland, noticed signs of uneasiness about the Schnebelberg. The summit of the mountain appeared to be in a very precarious position, and it was feared that it might slip down and overwhelm the Schnebelwald, an extensive wood in the valley below. In anticipation of a possible catastrophe, great efforts were made to cut down and carry away as many trees as possible, though the men engaged in the work wrought at the peril of their lives. On a recent Sunday, when fortunately there was nobody in the wood, a deafening report, like the firing of a heavy artillery, resounded through the valley, and the mountain was hidden from view by a thick cloud of dust. When it dispersed, the Schnebelberg was seen to be shorter by a few metres, and the beautiful wood in the Murgthal had disappeared beneath a huge avalanche of stones and earth. This catastrophe is supposed to have been the result of the recent earthquake shocks.

A VOLCANIC LAKE.

M. de Lesseps is credited with describing on his return to Europe a singular geological phenomenon. In the Republic of San Salvador there is a lake called Ilopango, and in January of this year, after a few premonitory shocks of earthquake three craters suddenly opened in the middle of the lake, and belched forth immense volumes of steam, dust, and fiery cinders. By-and-by the three vents merged into one, and an islet of "tuff" and lave upose above the surface of the waters. Attempts were made to approach this young volcanic island, but the feat was found impossible, owing to the boiling of the water and the showers of dust and clouds of vapor enveloping it. According to latest accounts, the new volcano continues to vomit forth great quantities of steam and virulent gases. All the fishes of the lake are perished, amid the bodies of innumerable dead shell fish and aquatic animals. It is a significant fact that the outburst was preceded by an exceptional rise in the level of the lake, owing to the rains. This appears to be the first instance on record of a volcano bursting up through the waters of an inland lake, but submarine volcanoes breaking out in the ocean bed are no very rare phenomena.

A BLASPHEMER DESTROYED.

A few days after the ordination of several persons, a wicked young man took a sheep to the same place in the stream, and, with fearful oaths, swore he could baptize as well as the minister. The shore of the stream was of very gradual slope, so that there was no apprehension of danger from deep water. Three of his companies stood on the shore to witness his blasphemous performance. Taking the sheep by its fore feet, he pronounced the formula of baptism, and as it leaned over to immerse the sheep, the animal struck him with his hind feet, knocking him into the water, and he was drowned while his comrades stood looking on. When asked why they did not help, and try to save him, they said they were perfectly paralyzed, and could not stir.

Rabbi Bettleheim, of San Francisco, grew eloquent in speaking of the Declaration of Independence and would have the Fourth of July inscribed in the Jewish calendar of holidays. He said: "For us Israelites this very declaration became of the highest importance. We found an asylum again, where we can live undisturbed and worship the God of our fathers according to the dictates of our hearts. Religious liberty as its foundation and public instruction as its upper structure made America the land of the people. Israel found here a home, a free home on America's hospitable shores. Now, my friends, if it was right and proper for our forefathers to celebrate and to register days of victories as of national importance in olden time, and to give these days a religious imprint, is it not far more our duty to rejoice in our modern time on a day when not only Israel, but also a large nation, and with her our down-trodden people, have gained the fullest and most secure liberty we ever dreamed of? Open, therefore, the old scroll, again, and record with golden letters the Fourth of July as an additional holy day."

Some Curious Calculations.

Allowing a space of two square feet for each person, small and great, one square mile would contain 13,930,200 people, and eighty-seven square miles would contain 1,212,710,400, which is about the estimated population of the whole earth. Allowing 100 generations, from Adam till the present time, and an average of 999,999,000 to each generation, the whole number of Adam's posterity would be sixty thousand millions of souls. Allowing, as above, two square feet for each, a space of about 4,304½ square miles, or a square of about sixty-five and a half miles on a side, would afford ample standing room for every soul of Adam's race. Are we not "as grasshoppers" in the eyes of One who can see the whole great earth in which we dwell? Isaiah xl. 22.

The land promised to Abraham according to a survey made some years ago, by order of the British government, contains an area of 300,000 square miles. Allowing that one-third of it was divided into lots of an acre each, and that each acre was occupied by six persons, its population would be 384,000,000.

In view of what is foretold concerning the fertility of the land of Israel, that even its wilderness shall be like Eden, and its desert like the Garden of the Lord, Isaiah li. 3; Ezek. xxxvi. 35, compared with Gen. xiii. 10; Joel ii. 3; compare also, Gen. ii. 9, 10 with Isaiah xxxv. 1, 2; xli. 18, 20; may we not conclude that we should look to its future rather than to its past, for the fulfillment of what God said of Abraham, that he should "become a great and mighty nation." Gen. xviii. 18.

Again, when we read that in the future all nations are to go up to Jerusalem, from year to year, to keep the feast of Tabernacles, as only Israel, that is the males, Ex. xxiii. 17 used to do, Lev. xxiii. 34, 40; Gen. xiv. 16, do not the above calculations show that the prophecy can be literally accomplished? It is surprising within what a small space hundreds of millions could be congregated, and dwell for seven days in booths. Bibliotheca.

POETRY.

"Wait on the Lord."

W. L. CROCKETT.

The way may look dark to the way:
I know not, but my Lord to see;
Then let us cross path, the shadows fear
I soon shall see an endless day.

I have been weak, O dient Lord;
My faithless heart forget Thy pain;
Yet when I see Thy face again,
Thou with forgive and peace afford.

Thou art so good to me: I know
I never can be worthy Thee,
For Thou didst give Thy life for me,
And oh I love to Thee I owe.

My Savior and my only stay;
The world is bitter out of thee:
The world's bedeck—and its faith
Is all that Thou dost ask of Thine.

Proof No. 28: Luke xvi.—Christ relates the conversation as it took place in his presence between two living beings. Their bodies were dead. There are millions of such cases in heaven and hell. It is as true a picture as ever Christ drew. It is the looking-glass for us to look into the spirit state, while the body is in the grave, and no person of sense can avoid its truths.

The foregoing is a specimen of "the philosophy and vain deceit" by which men have been beguiled from the truth, and turned unto fables. Even to those enlightened by the divine testimony, there comes a time, (and now is) when men will not endure sound doctrine, but will heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; it seems in many instances a matter of profound astonishment

"What a reasonless machine,
Superstition can make the reasoner man."

This "Rev." clergyman's proof of an immortal soul in mortal man, if a fair sample of Orthodoxy's strength, requires not the force of a Samson to pull it to pieces, but, like a bubble, will melt away if but the finger of truth touches it.

Proof No. 1: God is spirit. John iv. 24.

Indeed? Surely, the gentleman is presuming on the patience of those whom he desires to teach in telling them something they have always believed in and desire not to combat. But this is introduced as proof of the "immortality of the soul."

Wonderful argument! The gentleman's use of the passage is as appropriate to his capticus—"Man has an immortal soul," as was the boys expression, who, when called upon to write a composition on "The Seasons," concluded with, "Give me Liberty, or Give me Death." Proof No. 1 contains nothing certainly that we desire to controvert, except the gentleman's application, so we will even erase it from his paper, as truth is decided, out of place in an article where Mr. Smith is the caption.

Proof No. 2: God is immortal. 1 Tim. vi. 16.

True, God is immortal, and of him the same apostle has affirmed that he alone possesses immortality. Who but one who has inherited "lies, vanity, and things wherein there is no profit," would use this as support of that night-mare of theology, "immortal soulism."

Proof No. 3: Man is spirit, soul and body. 1 Thess. v. 23.

To this we agree, but object, most positively, to the conclusion that, because of this three-fold nature, that the soul, as an abstract, or of man, is immortal. There is absolutely nothing in the text to justify such conclusion. "Man is mortal." Man is spirit, soul and body. Where stands the theory, that claims that part of man is immortal? For which attribute of man is immortality claimed? For the spirit? Certainly not, for Solomon declares that the beasts possess spirits. Eccl. iii. For the body? No. For the soul? Yes, answers this clerical argumentator. If such be your position, my Orthodox friend, what are we to do with your "Proof No. 4," "All animal matter that breathes, has animal spirit," and proof No. 5, "soul is rational, intelligent spirit?" Why place the word "animal" before spirit? Are you not striving to make an unwarranted distinction between spirit and what you term "rational, intelligent spirit?" You agree that this spirit goes out with the breath in death; you agree that all animal matter that breathes, possesses this spirit; is not man animal matter? The spirit, then, possessed by man in common with all the brute creation, is one that goes out with the breath. Query: Does man possess two spirits, one animal, the other "rational and intelligent?" You recognize the three-fold nature, why attempt to make it four-fold? Paul, to the Thessalonians, evidently makes a distinction between spirit and soul, but you say in your proof No. 5, that "soul is rational, intelligent spirit." This is truly edifying. Spirit is possessed by all animals and "soul is spirit." Your qualifying it by the words "rational and intelligent" does not relieve your "proof" from absurdity. But, following out your argument that "soul is rational and intelligent spirit," let us ask, what is the meaning of the word spirit? It has four significations: 1. "It represents, primarily, the air we breathe." 2. "It denotes a being as angels." 3. "It represents an influence from a being." 4 "It indicates a state of feeling."—Dieglott. "Rational intelligent" air, or "rational intelligent" state of feeling is not exactly what you claim, for your "soul" is it. You hardly agree with your own "Union Bible Dictionary" that thinks soul is the property of beast as well as man, and that spirit is the immortal part. Your proof (?) is quite to the contrary.

Proof No. 6: "God reasons. Isa. i. 18. Soul reasons."

The first part of this argument (?) for the "immortality of the soul" the gentleman has substantiated by a citation of Scripture. The second part is entirely too vague to require lengthy notice. I suppose he means by "soul reasons" that "immortal soul reasons." This I deny, and as he has not cited us to a single passage of the "law and testimony" in support of it, I will simply balance his affirmative by an equally weighty negative.

Proof No. 7: "God thinks. Isa. lv. 8. Soul thinks."

No one denies, worthy sir, that God thinks. But why did you not quote the passage cited, entire? "For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord." If, as you claim, the soul is a part of God himself, why would not its thoughts be as his thoughts? Mentally digest and answer.

Proof No. 8: God has spiritual sight. Soul sees also.

If, from this, we are to infer that soul sees as Jehovah throughout all time, and discern the thoughts and intents of man's heart, why is it that we are mere creatures of the present, so soon forgetting the past, and unable to penetrate the future? If there dwells within us a "spark of divinity," why is it so completely fettered by the body? But what does the gentleman mean by "spiritual?" He must mean the sight possessed by God as a spirit. Does he dare affirm that soul (which the Bible expressly declares is a part of all the animate creation, is equal to God?

Proof No. 9: "Man's body is organized clay."

By what authority is the word "body" introduced into this phrase? The word of God affirms that "man is organized clay." "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground." To this "dust man" he gave the "breath of life" and he became a "living" but not an "immortal soul." When this organized dust transgressed the law was pronounced "dust thou art" and "unto dust shalt thou return." 'Tis a poor dodge theology attempts in striving to make the soul escape that divine sentence, "dust thou (Adam) art."

Proof No. 10: "God made man in his image, holiness, and after his likeness, spirituality, immortality, reasoning and thinking."

That God made man in his image and after his likeness the Bible declares, but his being made in God's "holiness, spirituality, immortality, reasoning and thinking" exhibits the most shameful ignorance, or rather perversion that I have ever heard from even a "Doctor of Divinity." Man, made in God's holiness? Man, who by transgression

"Brought death into the world
And all our woe"

immortal?

Perish the thought with the mysticism of heathen philosophy.

Proof No. 11: "Matter cannot think or reason."

Had the gentleman put himself to the trouble to investigate fully before he so rashly affirmed, he would never have advanced the above as proof. Is he so far behind the advancement of the age that he has never heard of brain thinking and reasoning? Is not brain matter? Thought is a function of brain, certainly, for "no brain, no thought" is a truism that has been demonstrated over and again. Matter, in its crude state, cannot think, but matter organized, refined, and endowed with life does exercise thought and reason, the "Rev." clergyman's "proof" to the contrary, notwithstanding. It would seem that he has relied more upon the thinking and reasoning of his so-called "immortal soul" than he has upon brain, which is matter. Poor, "senseless," "annihilationists" prefer to use brain for the fabrication of thought.

Proof No. 12: "But Jesus said suffer the children and forbid them not, to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Matt. xix. 14.

If any one who is unbiased, can see "immortal soulism" taught in this passage of Scripture then might I well believe that God's word is altogether and totally incomprehensible. Those who accept the Father's teaching as children receive that of an earthly parent,—to such, indeed, who manifest this unquestioning faith and obedience—will belong the "kingdom of the heavens" thasileia ton ouranon). But they will not possess it by soaring "beyond the skies," for the kingdom promised them will be the kingdom restored to Israel, and under the whole heavens. Dan. vii. 27. Neither will they be "voiceless immaterialities," but will be glorious and incorruptible bodies, being fashioned like unto his glorious body. Phil. iii.

Proof No. 13: "For what is a man profited if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul." Matt. xvi. 26.

Nothing. No doubt the "immortal soulist" would prefer "immortal soul" to Matthew's words,—

"But what the truth doth make it,
So we believe and take it."

Suppose we quote the preceding verse. "For whosoever will save his life (psuchen) shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it." "For what is a man profited if he gain the whole world and lose his life? (psuchen). This would read as follows, when translated into Orthodoxy: "Whosoever will save his immortal soul shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his immortal soul for my sake shall find it."

Proof No. 14: "I give unto them eternal life and they shall never perish." John x. 28.

This is all we contend for; that unless Christ the Life-Giver bestow upon us eternal life by a resurrection from the dead, we will perish. The dogma of "inherent immortality" robs Christ of this great honor and makes "eternal life" the possession of all. Can an "immortal soul" perish? Alas, for mankind, that they have such blind guides, for none are so blind as those who will not see. To "perish" means with them perpetual torment. To "die," to keep alive in death; and so of every word that conflicts with their "tradition." Ah, what a humiliating scene will that be when they shall come, no longer in the strength of their pride,—no longer wrapt in the sanctity of "Rev's" and "D. D's," but bowing in abjectness before the everlasting throne of the great King and saying, "Surely, our fathers have inherited lies, vanities, and things wherein there is no profit."

Proof No. 15: "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life." John iii. 36.

This is similar to proof No. 14, and shows, most conclusively, that only those who believe on the Son pass from under sentence of death into life. Those who deny the Son shall not see life, but shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the "presence of the Lord and the glory of his power." Those who use such passages as this to prove that "mortal man" is not altogether mortal, must, in the language of Tertullian, have their "divinity" greatly "diluted."

Proof No. 16: "He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life." John v. 24.

This is merely a repetition of the preceding "proof" and needs no comment.

Proof No. 17. "And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul." Matt. x.

The Greek word translated "soul" in this passage is (psuchen) which is in many instances rendered life. Jesus makes use of the word in his reply to those who sought to accuse him of breaking the law. "Is it lawful to do good on the Sabbath day, or to do evil? To save life, (psuchen) or to kill?" This is evidently the correct rendering for it harmonizes the entire teaching of God's word relative to the nature of man. Man may kill the body, but the life "which is hid with Christ in God" they have no power to destroy. Christ, in the 39th verse of the same chapter we are considering, made use of the following words, which we will render Scripturally, and then as the Orthodox would have them rendered: "He who preserves his life, (psuchen) shall lose it; but he who loses his life, (psuchen) on my account shall preserve it." This is perfectly intelligible, but, what of this? He who preserves his "immortal soul" shall lose it; but he who loses his "immortal soul" on my account shall preserve it. This is a dilemma that even the possessors of God's "holiness, spirituality, immortality and reasoning powers" cannot well rid themselves of.

Let them not jump to conclusions, nor conceitedly imagine they are the proud owners of "divinity"—let them expunge the D. D. from their names—and with humbleness let them come to the word of truth, and, by "continuance in well doing, seek for glory, honor and incorruptibility." Then, although they may have no part in the "wisdom of the world" yet will the honor of sharing in the glories and emoluments of Christ's kingdom a thousand-fold compensate for the empty bribules of human vanity.

Proof No. 18: "Be thou faithful till death, and I will give to thee the crown of life." Rev. ii. 10.—Diaglott.

The words of the spirit to the church at Smyrna, I suppose the "Rev." gentleman would have us believe that death and the "crown of life" are synchronal. I prefer Paul's statement that the crown to be awarded all believers who are faithful will be given "in that day"—the day of his appearing. 2 Tim. iv. We, who are enlightened by the truth, can understand, "Be thou faithful till death." The words of the Great Teacher admonish us that, "there comes a night (death) in which no man can work." All the knowledge, all the virtue, all the faithfulness we could exercise for him must be done now; for there is "no knowledge nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest." "The dead know not anything." Let it be shown from positive Bible statements that at death we will be rewarded—to the "law and testimony," if they speak not according to this, there is no light in them.

To those who are disposed to endeavor to prove death the "gate of Paradise," I will give this advice—read the 15th of Corinthians where the truth of God shines forth with the splendor of the noonday sun.

Faith is Shown by Works that Correspond. Unbelief by the Absence of Those Works.

When the Gospel of Jesus Christ is preached to the impenitent sinner, as soon as it takes effect he at once understands that he has something to do in order to obtain the promised reward. For example, on the day of Pentecost the gospel, or good news of the kingdom, was proclaimed to a goodly number of impenitent sinners, Acts ii. 37, and as quick as the good seed fell in good ground the germ began to grow immediately. Anxiety was aroused at once. They that received the gospel message, or the good ground that the seed lodged in, begin to cry out, what shall we do? realizing that they had a work to perform and that without delay. We read in Acts ii. that on the same day they received the word of truth, there were some three thousand immersed into the Christ. Here we can discover that their faith is shown by works that correspond. What a blessed hope is the gospel hope. Dear brethren and sisters let us never falter in the good work, but always be found fighting for the gospel of the kingdom; realizing that we have a work to perform before we can enter into the kingdom of God. When I come to sit down to write for THE RESTITUTION, I feel somewhat like Paul expresses himself, "I was the least of the household of faith but that I have a work to do and I must try and perform it the best I can." I for one want to be counted among the innumerable multitude of God's immortal saints that have overcome the world and the lusts thereof. Oh, brethren true loyalty is a bright gem in the Christian's life of trouble and vexation of spirit. But let us by the assisting grace of God show to the world that faith is shown by works that correspond. Heb. iii. Paul admonishes the brethren to take heed lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God. But exhort one another daily while it is called to-day, lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, for we are made partakers of Christ if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end. While it is said to-day if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts, as in the provocation. For some when they had heard did provoke, howbeit not all that came out of Egypt by Moses. But with whom was he grieved forty years, was it not with them that had sinned, whose carcasses fell in the wilderness? And to whom sware he that they should not enter into his rest, but to them that believe not? so we see they could not enter in because of unbelief. We understand by the following that unbelief is the cause of the absence of good works.

Brethren let us come boldly to the throne of grace that we may find help in time of need. As regards our Savior, Though he were a son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered. And being made perfect he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him. Brethren right here I wish to mention an idea which is visible to all believers of the truth, but it does not appear to me that it is appreciated by the household of faith like it should be, and that is this, Paul says to the Hebrews, that there is a certain class that will obtain eternal salvation and that class are those that obey him (Christ). I notice that Brother Crosier wrote an article of late in THE RESTITUTION, putting more stress upon the word faith than anything else in the article, and then I notice in the next number of the paper, No. 23, that Bro. Myers responds to Bro. Crosier in a Christian spirit, that he is taking the wrong standpoint, and I must say that I will have to side in with Bro. Myers, and also with Bro. Stephenson in regard to faith and obedience for a reason or two which I will give in brief.

1. We can not get into the Christ family by only one mode and that is by a gospel faith and baptism.

2. Because Paul states most emphatically as the infallible word of God, on this wise. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ; and Christ's words to Nicodemus, are very appropriate right here. Except a man be born of water and of the spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. Brethren, I for one am a strong believer in a gospel faith, and gospel baptism for remission of sins, no baptism no remission according to the gospel dispensation. I will close by admonishing all in the faith to watch, always be found ready, for in such an hour or time as ye think not, behold he cometh. I long for the time. Amen.

SELECTIONS.

A Judge's Views of Liquor Traffic.

In sentencing a murderer to death, Judge Johnson, of California, made use of the following language:

"Nor shall the place be forgotten in which occurred this shedding of blood. It was in one of the thousand antechambers of hell, which mar, like plague spots, the fair face of our state. You need not be told that I mean a tippling shop—the meeting place of Satan's minions, and the foul cesspool which, by spontaneous generation, breeds and matures all that is loathsome and disgusting in profanity, and babbling and vulgarity, and Sabbath breaking. I would not be the owner of a gorgery for the price of this globe converted into precious ore. For the pitiful sum of a dime he furnished the poison which made the deceased a fool, and this trembling culprit a demon. How paltry a sum for two human lives! This traffic is tolerated by law, and, therefore the vendor has committed an offense not cognizable by earthly tribunals; but, in the sight of Him who is unerring wisdom, he who deliberately furnishes the intoxicating draught which inflames men into anger and violence and bloodshed, is particeps criminis in the mortal turpitude of the deed. Is it not high time that these sinks of vice and crime should be held rigidly accountable to the laws of the land, and placed under the ban of an enlightened and virtuous public opinion?"

Home—Its Journal.

Home.

How sacredly tender are the associations of home! How fragrant are its memories! How strong are its binding cords of love! How its affections enter into and control the life forces of nature! Somewhere in the confiding love of home's endearments lies the strength of the weak, the comfort of the sad, the solace of the aged, the development of childhood's tender years, the binding up of the bruised heart, and the moral purity of social life. And the true home is, indeed, well deserving the praise of men and the gracious benediction of him who "setteth the solitary in families."

We wonder not that the lion-hearted Spartans, returning from victorious battle covered with gore and glory, faint with hunger, and weary with fatigue, wept like children when, from their native hill-tops, they looked down upon the tiled houses and pleasant vineyards and ever endeared and familiar scenes of home.

How tenderly entwined in our heart-memories is the home of our childhood. There we first saw the light of the sun. There we first trod upon the soft, green carpet of the fields. There was the old orchard, making the air fragrant with the blossoms of June, or bending the stalwart boughs of its trees beneath the golden fruit of autumn. And just beyond, hidden from our windows by the rolling plain, was the quiet, unpretending lake that glittered between the densely wooded hills, like a jewel in the coronet of a king.

But it was not these outward surroundings—treasured as they are in our memories—that made home home, and its associations sacred forevermore. Loved forms gathered within that humble dwelling that we shall see no more in time. The hands that taught our infant feet to walk are still. The tongue that soothed our child sorrows, or chided our faults, is palsied in death. The dear old forms we loved have passed away. We shall see them no more till we greet them in the home beyond.

Mt. Moriah was once the home of Jehovah's tribal family. There rested its gorgeous temple, built according to the divine plan, and illuminated by the divine splendor. There Israel's seers and kings heard the distinct utterances of the divine voice, as he gave them law, or marshaled their mighty men for conquest and war. Thither came up all the families of Israel, once a year, for sacrifice, atonement and praise. There rolled the grand anthem psalms of song from the vast, worshiping multitude, like the noise of the sea. There sin was pardoned. There the prophet uttered his fiery denunciations against the rebellious. There flashed from the fire-touched lips of the inspired seer the burning story, as he foretold the humility of the earth-born Christ, or the eternal splendor of Messiah's kingly rule.

How changed to-day is all this! How passed away is the once sacred temple and its worshiping multitudes! The mosque of Omar desecrates the ground where the voice of Jehovah was heard and revered.

But home dearer than earth has ever known lies hidden, to the Christian heart, in the sweet unfoldings of the just beyond. There earth's parted ones will be gathered to part no more. There broken ties will be readjusted in inseparable affinity. There "our Father" will call home his great, scattered family. Weeping shall cease. Tears shall be wiped away. Oh, what greetings will be then! What songs shall roll their glad numbers of praise along Jerusalem's streets of gold and palisades of glory! How the strains will echo and re-echo far out over the valleys of Eden and hills of God! And angels with seraph choir will answer back the glad hymning of the "harvest home."

Hallelujah! Home is nearing. Listen! I can almost hear the music of the heavenly choir. Break the death jaws of the grave, and bring its exiled captives home, oh, thou Prince of the kings of earth! We wait the invitation of thy voice! We mourn thine absence! Give deliverance! Give rest! Give triumph eternal! Give the harp! Give the song! Give the crown! Give the deathless, tearless, sinless, endless ages of home, sweet home!

All errors spring up in the neighborhood of some truth; they grow round about it, and for the most part derive their strength from such contiguity.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel, the literal resurrection of the dead, the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a purity belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Coming Age.—Its Proximity.—Christian Household, Previous to Christ's Return.—Foreign Element.—Civil Element as Connected with the Social Feature.—Social Element.—Defined.—Its Rise.—How Far Justified.—&c. Modern Aspect.—No. 20.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Foreign Elements, What?—We have often spoken of foreign elements in the church. Perhaps our meaning should be more fully defined. No. 20 will be devoted to that subject, and to the investigation of the social element.

An element is a first principle of any thing or doctrine. The first principles of Christianity are its essential elements; those, in theory and practice, without which it could not exist. Those that are introduced into the system, from human sources, and have an injurious effect upon the workings of the system, we call foreign elements. Faith, repentance, baptism, the Lord's Supper, hope of the Gospel, love, courage, temperance, and every species of moral purity, are elements; essential to the existence and perpetuity of the Christian system; while many opinions in regard to the various doctrines, and various modern practices have been introduced by its officiary, for various reasons, and at distant times, and are, therefore, foreign. The Roman hierarchy, assuming (which is foreign) that the church has power over the faith and practice of its membership, have changed every article of faith and manners. They have formed and proclaimed another,—a foreign Gospel.

Protestant churches have framed their own articles and have formed their own creeds, containing many foreign elements, since no two systems are alike.

We call the political element foreign, since it is not an element in the system of Primitive Christianity.

Social Element, What?—It is a foreign element, as will appear when its nature is fully understood.

It is the off-shoot of the civil element, since it partakes, in its nature, of the characteristics, and feelings of this world. We are formed for society. It is not good for man to be alone. Mind develops mind, and body brings out the various attributes of body. Man must have his associates if they are beasts or fowls. Companionship is, therefore, in one sense, a primary element. How, then, is it foreign? It is made such by perverting its intended use.

Man was formed for association; and, had he not developed good and evil by the fall, association would always have been beneficial. Classes, good and evil, were the results of the fall. Man's fallen nature causes his associations to draw him downwards. The society intended for man was pure, and linked him to the Divine nature, but his dejection from his original purity causes him to seek a lower standard. Physical and moral corruption was a legitimate result. He is not satisfied with angel's food. He must gratify his carnality.

Christ, the pure and the holy, was incarnated, and became the great teacher of morals and Divine law. He said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all (men) unto me." John xii. 32. Unto him the people were to be gathered. When he began to teach, many gathered to him for instruction; others to be healed and fed; others, however, saw no beauty in his person nor any attraction in his instructions.

As a root out of dry ground. Isa. liii. Christ said, "They hated me without a cause." Some few. In the humble walks of life, made him their Companion. A few disciples constituted his school. Not the greatest teachers, are surrounded by the greatest number of pupils. His assemblies were day scholars, attracted by some selfishness.

His instructions were unpopular, since they were so far in advance of their times. Had it not been for his miracles, he would have passed his time in solitude. He was not what we call a revival preacher, his truths were not sugar-coated. They were too hot, angular and rough. They were sent with such force as to drive away. They would say, This is a hard saying, and run away for life.

True, some would exclaim, "Never man spake like this man." Curiosity would sometimes call out a night. Nicodemus, saying, "Thou art a teacher come from God; for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him." John iii. 2.

But, what success had this great teacher like unto Moses in disciple making? They crowded about John the Baptist, begging him to cover them up in Jordan; but Christ, the Lord and Master of John, then drew but little attention. Christ had to raise the dead to draw attention. John had to point out and recommend him to the people, before he drew the crowd.

Three years and a half, teaching night and day; and how many converts had he on his church-book [illegible] rolled? How did he compare with Moody? How would he have ranked with the boy-preacher of New York? (Dr. Talmage's church) receiving 240 converts in one week, and 636 in a nine weeks' meeting. Such was the work of Christ, the world's Evangelist, in the first century; and such the success of Mr. Harrison, "the boy-evangelist" of the nineteenth century.

Before leaving the earth, he (Christ) made his inimitable prayer, in which he expressed to his Father his love for his family, and his desire for their protection.

Listen with profound attention, to the address of Jesus to his Father:—"The hour is come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee. As thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him. And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent. I have glorified thee, on the earth; I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do.

And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was. I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world; thine they were, and thou gavest them me; and they have kept thy word. Now that they have known that all things whatsoever thou hast given me are of thee. For I have given unto them the words which thou gavest me; and they have received (them), and known surely that I came out from thee, and they have believed that thou hast sent me.

I pray not for the world, I pray for them which thou hast given me; for they are thine. And all mine are thine, and thine are mine; and I am glorified in them.

And now I am no more in the world, but these are in the world, and I am come to thee. Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou has given me, that they may be one, as we (are). While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name; those that thou gavest me I have kept; and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition; that the Scripture might be fulfilled.

And now come I to thee; and these things I speak in the world, that they might have my joy fulfilled in themselves. I have given them thy word; and the world hath hated them, because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world.

I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil. They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth.

As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world. And for their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also might be sanctified through the truth.

Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also who shall believe on me through their word; that they all may be one; as thou, Father, (art) in me, and I in thee; that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me. And the glory which thou gavest me I have given them; that they may be one, even as we are one; I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one; and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them as thou hast loved me. Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me; for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world.

O righteous Father, the world hath not known thee; but I have known thee; and these have known that thou hast sent me. And I have declared unto them thy name, and will declare (it), that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them." John xvii. 1-26.

Such is the prayer of Jesus for himself and for his dear family. We had purposed to take from this prayer one short extract; but such is its unity of Divine breathing that we were unwilling to sever any of its thoughts. What a prayer! what boundless love! what tender solicitude! Espoused to his followers as the Bridegroom to a chaste virgin. About to leave her, to go into a far country, he gathers them around him; he has given them his parting advice; he now, in their presence, dedicates them to his Father, in the prayer you have just read. He leaves them in the world—in the world of unbelieving Jews, to be hunted by them as animals designed only for slaughter. In a world of Gentiles from whom they were to gather a people to share in the future glory; and by whom they were to suffer centuries of martyrdom. In a world of apostasy, where their most deadly foes would be those of their own household. With a chart of the entire period from his departure to his triumphant return in glory, with a full knowledge of all their enemies and tribulations, he commends them to the protection of his Father, and fervently asks for them necessary blessings.

What are they? Riches? Honors of the world? Worldly associates? To retire, at an advanced age to enjoy, in quietude, the evening of their days? To have their children, and their children's children comfortably settled around them? None of these things; nor anything that parents, in these days, so ardently desire for their families; and which they toil through many sorrows to obtain.

What, then, did he solicit? Holy Father, keep through thine own name, those whom thou hast given me, that they may be ONE, as we. Verse 11. An associated unity. Unity of love, purpose, and labor. Mind the same things.

How was this unity to be accomplished, and perpetuated? By being sanctified. Sanctified by what? By thy truth—thy word, (verse 17,) not by councils, nor by Assemblies, but by thy word, the sword of the Spirit. I do not ask you to take them out of the world, but, keep them from its evil. Verse 15.

The Bible Versus Trinitarianism.—No. 2.

God is one. Gal. iii. 20.

Before proceeding in our investigation under the fourth head—Is Trinitarianism true? I wish to say that, in all I have written, or may write, I have realized, and shall continue to realize my responsibility to God. And with the greatest reverence for him and his precious word; with the greatest love and reverence for his matchless Son, the adorable Redeemer of the world—my Savior, through whose atoning blood I have a glorious hope of immortality; whose life-giving words I dearly love, and whose truth I embrace, and against which I would not say a word for a thousand worlds—I proceed, and call the candid attention of the reader to the following question: Is Christ the true God?

If Christ is "the true God," he is the supreme God; and if he is the supreme God, he is the Creator of the universe. If this be true, then he could not suffer and die; for who can believe that the Creator of all things can suffer and die! But Christ suffered and died according to the Scriptures, and God raised him from the dead. See Acts ii. 24, 32; iii. 15; Rom. viii. 11; 1 Cor. vi. 14.

Again, If Christ is the supreme God, as alleged, he is both the Father and the Son—as a Son, he is his own Father, as a Father, he is his own Son! But, further, the Son must have existed co-eternally with his Father;—then pray tell me how, as a Son, could he exist co-eternally with his Father, seeing that a Son must be begotten by the Father, and that the Father must exist before the Son in order to beget a Son?

Once more, 1. If three persons are required to constitute the "one God" of the universe, viz.: "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," then it logically follows that neither of these personalities, alone, would be God. How, then, can Trinitarians claim that Christ is God, when, on this hypothesis, he is only a fractional part (I speak reverently) of God? And for the same reason, how can the Father, alone, be "the only true God," as Christ says he is?

2. But if Christ is truly God, the Creator of all things, as alleged, so is the Father, and the Holy Ghost also, if their position be true; and thus we have not only three distinct personalities as claimed, but three distinct Gods—"God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost"—and each one the creator of the universe!

Thus, we here have a dilemma with two horns. Which will Trinitarians take? Will they contend for "Trinity in unity," i.e., "Three in God and One in Three," and give up, as they must, the consequential fact that neither, alone, is God; or will they claim that each one is God, when the Bible declares that "there is but one God?"—that "God is one"—that "there is none other God but one"—that the Father, alone, is "the only true God?"

Such are a few of the absolute, self-evident, logically deduced absurdities connected with this popular dogma which—with other popular errors, such as the immortality of the soul, and a hell, where, as alleged, the souls of men are now being tormented before the judgment—has been embraced by Protestants without proper investigation, and that, because it was found in the creeds made by the church councils in a corrupt age.

I affirm that the word of God never contradicts reason, never contradicts true science, never contradicts mathematical demonstration, and never contradicts itself. But here is a doctrine held by the great majority of Christians, called Orthodox (?), that is in conflict with all these, is in conflict with the Bible, and not only so, but, as I have shown, is in conflict with itself.

Mysterious truth? I say the doctrine of the Trinity, as held, is a mysterious absurdity—mysterious that any one should ever have thought of such a thing; and more mysterious still, that Protestants should ever have received it as the teachings of the sacred Scriptures. The idea of a father and son being coeval—the existence of both commencing at the same time! Such an idea is contrary to our own knowledge of fact. Is it any wonder that the minds of thinking men are confused, and that they are driven from the cross and from the Lamb, and, therefore, from truth and righteousness, when such glaring errors and absolute absurdities are proclaimed to be the true doctrines of the Bible, and are presented to them as matters of faith? O that God would arouse the Christian church to see what pernicious effects all such theological errors are producing upon the hearts of men; what ingenious forms of skepticism in opposition to the Bible, which these men have judged, not by its own intrinsic merits and harmonious teachings, but by the inconsistent and contradictory interpretations of it by theologians; what flood gates of excess in the multiplication of infernal inventions as substitutes for the true religion of Jesus Christ—Universalism, restorationism, spiritualism, degenerated Unitarianism and "liberal religion"—white-washed infidelity.

This is a dark picture for theologians (our teachers) to look upon, and then to think they are, in a great measure, responsible for the existence of all these isms, as being the legitimate fruits of the erroneous doctrines of the Christian church. Few men of intelligence now believe in that exploded doctrine of endless torment that has been thundered so long and so loud in the ears of men—a doctrine so unscriptural, unreasonable, and so unmerciful that, being rejected as such, has ceased to be a motive to repentance. Not only this, but it has led those, who, supposing it to be the true teaching of the Bible as proclaimed by its friends, to reject the Scriptures altogether, as a revelation from the just God of heaven.

In returning to the subject, let us notice some of the passages relied upon to prove that Christ is "the true God."

Heb. i. 8: "But unto the Son he (God) saith, thy throne, O God, is forever and ever." Let us look at this noted text in the light of its contexts and of other Scriptures. It occurs to me that, in this quotation of the apostle, God is not addressing himself, but his Son. "Unto the Son, he saith," and in verse 9, he further says to him, "Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity; therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." It would seem this very pointed language ought to satisfy every candid person that Christ is not God, inasmuch as he has a God who "is greater" than he is, and from whom he receives "all power and authority because he is the Son of Man," and not God. Christ says, (John xiv. 28): "If ye loved me, ye would rejoice, because I said, I go unto my Father: for my Father is greater than I." "My sheep hear my voice, and they follow me; and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand." If Christ is "the true God," would he have added the following language to show the perfect safety of his sheep? "My Father who gave them to me is greater than all; and no one is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand." John x. 27-29. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, the Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do." John v. 19. "To sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give; (why not, if he is the supreme God?) but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father." "But of that day, and that hour knoweth no man, no not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father."

Thus we see that Christ shows his own inferiority to the Father, as to power, knowledge, etc., and declares, in many places, that these are given to him by the Father; because he "hath appointed him heir of all things."

In order to avoid an absurdity that this Trinitarian error imposes upon them, viz.: that God suffered and died, (!) Trinitarians are forced to assume that the above passages and all like them, refer to the human body, and not to the "Godhead" of Christ. But this plunges them deeper in difficulty than they were before, because it does away entirely, and utterly overthrows the atonement that can only be made, as they also teach, by a divine sacrifice. For if it be true, as they claim, that only the human body of Christ died, then it certainly follows (they being the judges) that there has been no atonement made for the sins of the world! In fact, I question whether Trinitarians believe that Christ really died; for, as we have seen, their system requires them to believe that the God part was only separated from the human part of Christ, that the God part, as they say, might raise from the dead the human part!

This untenable position thus forces them to ring the changes on the personal nouns and pronouns. They use them as sometimes referring only to the divinity, and sometimes, as suits them, to the humanity of Christ; and then, as they always should, to Christ as a divine and human personage combined.

But it seems that educated theologians (Trinitarians) are yet to learn that a personal noun or pronoun includes all that it takes to constitute a proper person or being; and that they cannot, in the light of science, or in the light of the Bible, properly apply them to fractional parts of persons or beings.

With this only proper view of the use of the personal nouns and pronouns, let us look at a few passages and see if the above quoted Scriptures refer only to the humanity of Christ, as alleged. "Jesus said unto them, verily, verily I say unto you, before Abraham was I am." John viii. 58. "Who is the image of the invisible God; the first-born of every creature; for by him were all things created." Col. i. 15. "Who being the brightness of his (the Father's) glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power," etc. Heb. i. 3. "He is Lord of all." Acts x. 36. "He knew what was in man." John ii. 25. "Jesus knew from the beginning who should betray him." John vi. 64. "We have a great High Priest, that has passed into the heavens, Jesus, the Son of God." Heb. iv. 14. "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son [not only Mary's son, but God's Son] cleanseth us from all sin." "Christ died for the ungodly"—"died for our sins"—"tasted death for every man"—"we are buried with him"—"ye do show the Lord's death till he come." And last, but not least, Christ, in his glorified state, exclaims in glowing, unmistaken language: "I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive forevermore." Rev. i. 18. As several of these quotations are claimed by Trinitarians as proving that Christ is "the true God," they, of course, include the Divinity, but do not exclude the humanity of Christ. For Jesus Christ was human and divine. So all the Scriptures that speak of him as dependant upon the Father, as inferior to him, as being the recipient of all power in heaven and in earth, as being the "appointed heir of all things;" as wanting in knowledge until revealed by the Father, (Rev. i. 1,)—in a word—all the Scriptures that speak of his sufferings and death—his being "subject" to the Father "that God might be all in all," also include his Divinity. Because Jesus Christ, as the Son of God, is divine, and as the son of Mary is human. So as it takes both these natures to constitute the proper person of our Lord Jesus Christ, it is always to him, as such, and not to a part of him, that the Scriptures of truth refer when referring to him.

But, why, it may be asked, does God the Father, in the text under consideration, call his Son "God" if he is not truly such? And, I might ask, why is it, if he is God, that Christ never claimed as much for himself, but always called himself the Son of God, and the Son of man? But, do not our sons take the name of their fathers? And is it strange that the Son of God should receive his Father's own name? Let us see if he has. "His name shall be called Emmanuel, which, being interpreted is, God with us." Matt. i. 23. "Behold a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel." Isa. vii. 14. Not that Immanuel, the Son, is truly God because his name signifies "God with us;" frequently names are very significant, and it is so in this case; for this Son becomes the true representative of God in heaven to man on earth, as he is to do his Father's will and work. Christ says: "I came to do the will of him that sent me;" "My Father worketh hitherto and I work."

Fuego, a volcano of Guatemala, which in times past has been active and destructive, has again burst into eruptive energy. Suddenly one night and without the usual premonitory rumblings, it shot a huge pillar of flame several hundred feet into the air. Vesuvius, not long ago, began one of its frequent exhibitions of molten lava. Observers of natural phenomena may be inclined to couple these eruptions with the recent earthquakes in the Philippine Islands, by which upward of 300 lives were lost.

An old man and woman have been identified in Nebraska as Mr. and Mrs. Bender, the Kansas murderers. They are in custody, and the officers are on the track of the rest of the murderous family. It will be remembered that the Bender family kept a tavern in Kansas, and robbed, killed and buried their guests as a regular business.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, AUG. 11, 1880.

DR. LEASK, editor of the Rainbow, admits articles almost diametrically opposite to his own views, without review, or harsh criticism, and yet no one of his readers supposes that the Rainbow is drifting away from its firm position as an advocate of important truths. His opinions and faith are definitely expressed in his own independent contributions. In imitation of his fairness, we have admitted some articles into THE RESTITUTION on faith, the destiny of the ungodly, and the relations of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, that are out of harmony with our own views. While we refuse to criticise, review, or to speak harshly and contemptuously of the articles from which we may differ toto cœlo, we are fully persuaded of the imperative importance of baptism into Christ, as an ordinance positively enjoined by both Christ and his inspired Apostles. We also believe that there will be a general resurrection of vast numbers who are not embraced in that elect company that make up the mystical body of Christ, of which he is the glorified head. And while we firmly believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, we do not explain away passages because they are difficult to understand. It is much better, and far more instructive, to present truth in its own light and relations, than to try to show that A, B, and C, are in error, and have not come to a knowledge of the truth. So far as faith is concerned may all yield the obedience of faith in baptism, then live the life of faith, and die in faith, if not translated before death.

Editor Restitution: Enclosed find $2.00, for which send THE RESTITUTION to the following.—I believe these make up four new subscribers that I have added to your list in the last year; and I hope to find a few more at least. I think if every brother or sister would earnestly strive they could, at least, send one new name for your paper, and in so doing lift the indebtedness off the paper. THE RESTITUTION is all the gospel preaching we have in this place. Yours in hope of the kingdom.

[The writer above has suggested a plan which, if practically carried into effect, would place our paper in a perfectly unembarrassed condition. Our subscription list, though slowly gaining, does not as yet contain names enough to render the paper self-sustaining. The benevolent brethren and sisters have rendered the extra aid to make up the deficiency. With all this we have been so embarrassed as to be only able to give 48 numbers a year. Let us all make an effort to remedy this state of things.]

NEWS ITEMS.

LONDON, Aug. 5.—Gladstone passed an excellent night and is making satisfactory though slow progress.

VIENNA, Aug. 7.—The floods in Silesia have subsided. The damage to public and private property is immense, and there is great distress.

Owing to heavy rains the last three days in the Carpathian mountains the river Oder overflowed its banks at Ratibora and Rosel, inundating twenty-five places and partially flooding fifteen. Great damage was done to property, and railway traffic is interrupted. The waters are falling.

THE WAR IN AFGHANISTAN.

LONDON, Aug. 6.—The Times has the following from Candahar, under date of August 3: "All well. There are no signs of the enemy. We have demolished all the buildings around the city. All Afghans have been expelled. We have 3,600 infantry, 1,000 cavalry and fifteen guns. The heat is very great. The majority of the officers of the Sixty-sixth Regiment were killed defending the colors, which were lost."

The inhabitants of the country between Candahar and Chaman Choki have risen in arms. There has been severe skirmishing around Chaman Choki.

Abdurrahman Khan has sent 700 ponies for the transport service. He has also sent a number of prominent men to arrange for supplies on the Candahar route.

Both from England and from India reinforcements are being energetically dispatched. Without counting the recent addition, the total number of troops occupied by the Afghan war is 80,000, of which number 40,000 are within the frontier of Afghanistan.

LONDON, Aug. 6.—Both from England and India reinforcements are being energetically dispatched, and besides six battalions of infantry and three battalions of artillery will soon be passing through the Suez canal. Without counting recent additions, the total number of troops occupied by the Afghan war is sixty thousand, of which number forty thousand are within the frontier of Afghanistan.

AYOOB'S POSITION.

Sanghar, where Ayoob Khan was reported on the 1st inst., is midway between Kushk Nakhud and Hyderabad, thirty miles apart. The recent battle between Gen. Burrows and Ayoob Khan's forces was fought a few miles north of Kushki Nakhud. The Afghans, therefore, instead of advancing, must fall back a short distance.

THE EVACUATION OF CABUL.

LONDON, Aug. 6.—A correspondent of the Standard at Bombay, discussing the evacuation of Cabul, says the heat in the passes is terrible, and the loss of life from this cause will probably be great. The condemnation of this hurried retreat is universal.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

LONDON, Aug. 6.—In the house of commons to-day Sir Charles Dilke, under secretary of state for foreign affairs, made an important statement regarding eastern affairs. He said that the collective note, and the Porte's reply thereto would soon be laid before parliament, and that her majesty's government would take the house into its confidence as to all that had been done and all that remains to be done in the premises. The six powers, England, Russia, Austria, Germany, Italy and France, were still in communication with each other upon the subject. Another collective note from the six powers will be presented this week regarding Montenegro. This note will present to the Porte two alternative schemes, and will invite him to accept one of them.

THE PORTE'S CONFESSION.

BERLIN, Aug. 6.—Various special dispatches indicate the porte will probably conform to the demands of the powers on the Montenegrin question, and that the threatened naval demonstration will not take place.

MOBILIZATION OF THE GREEK ARMY.

ATHENS, Aug. 6.—The decree to be issued on the 9th inst. will authorize mobilization of the army in such proportions as circumstances may demand. The Greek chambers will be convoked for the 18th of September.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Aug. 7.—Dr. Parsons, the American missionary, who, with his servant, was murdered near Ismid, was making a tour in the mountains and encamped on the roadside in the vicinity of some Zuruk, a semi-nomadic tribe. Two Zuruk shepherds confessed that they shot two travellers as they slept, and robbed them of their money, amounting to less than five dollars. As Parsons did not reach his destination at the expected time, and, as his horses were found wandering about the hills, his friends instituted search, and the bodies were discovered under some bushes. The authorities, hearing a dispatch on the subject had been sent to the British Embassy, showed more than usual zeal, and by threatening wholesale arrests induced the Zuruk to surrender the criminals, who are now imprisoned.

SELECTIONS.

(Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.)

The Approaching Translation of Christians.

I see no reason why we who are now living should not ourselves be in the number of those who shall be alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, when the first resurrection shall take place according to 1 Thessalonians iv. 16: "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

Predicted events are rushing by with giant strides. It is wonderful to those who watch the signs of the times and compare them with the oracles of God, to see how much more the present state of affairs in our world resembles that which is to precede the second advent of Christ than it did a few years ago. This is the case both as respects what is evil and what is good. All things appear to be falling into that form and order which they must assume to satisfy the requirements of prophecy before the coming of the Son of Man.

Soon, like the dew drops on the grass, God's saints will be found rising from every spot, from the well-remembered tomb and the broad ocean, all in an instant glorious. And not less sudden will be the change which will then pass over those saints who are now alive. "We shall be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye,"—not by slow degrees, but suddenly, will that transition take place."

From the very midst of the employment in which each is occupied, some aroused from sleep, some hard at work, in all those various stations in which God's people are engaged, then and there, at the sound of the Archangel's trump, each will be summoned to meet the Lord in the air. It will take place while all is going on much the same as usual, while as yet no overwhelming signs of change have appeared—except the midnight cry, disregarded by the world at large.

Then it shall be that "one" shall be taken and the other left. For it is of this translation of living Christians that our Lord says, "I tell you, on that night there shall be two in one bed, the one shall be taken and the other left. Two women shall be grinding together, the one shall be taken, the other left. Two shall be in the field, the one shall be taken and the other left." Luke xvii. 34. The circumstances of day and night are here mentioned to show its universality as to all places, and whatever happens at the same time on both sides of our globe, must necessarily happen both in the day and in the night. Thus there will be a sudden separation between the prepared and the unprepared. Those will be caught up to meet the Lord in the heavens who are ready to be caught up and willing to be caught up, and none besides. Dropping their earthly nature, they will be transfigured, and gain a life which is heavenly and eternal.

How complete will be the change! We cannot enter into the Lord's presence without being made meet for it; and when that day arrives, "we shall be made like him, for we shall see him as he is." Our body, so full of sin, infirmity, helplessness, and corruption, will be changed into the likeness of the Son of Man. This is a thought which may cheer the heart of many a patient sufferer. Your weak body may be a burden and constant hindrance to you now, but then it shall be made like his glorious body, according to the mighty working whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself (Philippians iii. 21; 1 John iii. 2).

As particles of steel fly toward a loadstone, so will those Christians who are ready when Christ comes ascend upward to meet him in the air. All their suffering, temptation and sorrow will be over, and they will be taken while others are left. Then how all-important to have the heart so touched by the Holy Ghost as to be attracted to Christ. To all his faithful people Christ is the supreme object of attraction, the Rose of Sharon and Lily of the Valley, the [illegible] and Morning Star, the chief among ten thousand, and altogether lovely.

Our resurrection bodies (in which expression I include the bodies of the translated as well as raised saints) will, like our Lord's glorified body and Enoch's and Elijah's, be capable of ascension. "By faith, Enoch was translated that he should not see death: and was not found because God had translated him; for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God." "He walked with God, and was not, for God took him." Elijah also ascended to heaven in a fiery chariot without dying. Our Lord himself rose in the air without any such assistance. It appears that his glorified saints will do the same. We need not ask how; it only requires one word from God to affect its accomplishment. Their hold on earth will be loosened; their feet will tread the air; till caught up into the presence of their heavenly King; amid the wondering gaze of those who are left behind, they are lost in the clouds of glory which surround his throne. Genesis v. 24; Hebrews xi. 5; 2 Kings ii. 11; Act i. 9.

One shall be taken and another left. It is indicated that matters on earth will, for a while, remain the same as before; and the glorified saints will be taken out of sight within the pearly gates and diamond walls of the heavenly Jerusalem, which, although it will one day be seen from earth, will not be visible at that early period. The translated and raised saints taken up to glory will no doubt remain for a time beyond the sight of mortal men, while apostate Christendom runs to its last excess of riot.

If as saints we are then found of Christ in peace, and not ashamed before him at his coming, our eternal happiness will commence; we shall find ourselves in the most illustrious society imaginable; we shall see all who have ever loved Christ and glorified God; we shall talk familiarly with apostles and prophets, and saints and martyrs; with Isaiah and David, and Paul and John. "I count upon seeing these men," said a dying Christian the other day. If caught up to meet our Lord, we shall see them, and those also whom we have known and loved here below. What a joyous day will that be, to stand on the glassy pavement, and to know for certain we are there. How blessed our condition.

"One shall be taken." How earnestly should each inquire, "Shall I be one of those who are taken?" Would it be to-day? If, while reading these pages, you heard the trumpet sound, would you be willing and ready to be taken? Has Jesus a supreme attraction for you? Could you bear his eyes, which are as a flame of fire? Are you washed in his blood, clothed in his righteousness, accepted through his merits? Are you his, and is he yours?

Watch. It is the command of Jesus himself. So much emphasis does he lay upon it, that it seems as if before he came it would be the distinction of his people.

Watch. For though the particular day of his coming is unknown, there are sure signs thickening around us, assuring us that it is not far off; and, as it comes, we shall need all vigilance to keep our garments and maintain our constancy. Perilous times are at hand. Hours of darkness are approaching. But the expectation of Christ's glorious advent will be to his watching people like a bright and shining star.

[New Era.]

Prophecies Concerning Israel, Their Land and King, not yet Fulfilled.

Sir:—Why did the Jews not believe Jesus to be the Christ, the promised King of Israel? Paul's answer, in Acts xiii. 27, is: "Because they knew him not, nor yet the voices of the prophets which are read every Sabbath day."

First, they "knew him not:" they saw a man—a carpenter, and as they supposed the son of a carpenter, born, as they thought, in Galilee, and concluded that he was a deceiver, and his miracles the work of Beelzebub. Had they known that he was born in Bethlehem, of a virgin, who had conceived him in her womb, by "the power of the Highest overshadowing" her, they would have known in truth whence and who he was, namely, the Son of God and the seed of David to whom was promised the throne of David and the dominion of the world. "Unto us," they would have said, "a child is born, unto us a Son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace; of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even for ever." Isa. ix. 6, 7. Yes, had they known him, many would have said with Zacharias, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he hath visited and redeemed his people, and hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David; as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began." See Gen. xlix. 8: 2 Sam. vii. 12, 13, 16; Psa. lxxxix. 3, 4; Jer. xxiii. 5, 6; xxx. 8, 9; xxxiii. 15-17. "That we should be saved from our enemies and from the hand of all that hate us, (the texts noted shew that Christ will so save Israel,) to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant the oath which he sware unto Abraham, that he would grant unto us, that we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of our life." How Israel shall serve the Lord and where is shown in such prophecies as Ezek. xx. 40, 41; Psa. xcviii. But, alas, Israel "knew him not," and despised and wondered and perished; so fulfilling what God said by Hosea, "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge."

But, secondly, Israel's lack of knowledge which proved so disastrous was largely, if not chiefly, lack of knowledge of the prophecies concerning Christ; "they know not the voices of the prophets which they read every Sabbath day." Is it not to be feared that the same is true of many Bible readers at the present day? They read but did not understand such portions as the following: "He shall grow up before him as a tender plant, and as a root out of a dry ground; he hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him. He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, and we hid, as it were, our faces from him; he was despised and we esteemed him not." Isa. liii. 2, 3. They could not see how those words could apply to their Messiah, prophesied of as "the branch of Jehovah, beautiful and glorious;" (Isa. iv. 2;) "the king in his beauty;" "the glorious Lord;" (xxxiii. 17-21,) of whom they will yet say, "How great is his beauty!" Zech. ix. 17. Who should be "fairer than the children of men;" (Psa. xlv. 2;) on whom God would lay "honor and majesty;" (Psa. xxi. 5;) who would be "the glory in the midst" of his people, (Zech. ii. 5,) and their "everlasting light." Isa. ix. 19, 20. Neither when they read the 22nd Psalm did they understand that "the Governor among the nations," whom all the kindreds of the nations are to worship, is one with him who was first to cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? ... All that see me, laugh me to scorn; they shoot out the lip, they shake the head, saying, He trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him, let him deliver him if he delight in him.... They pierced my hands and my feet. I may tell all my bones; they look and stare upon me. They part my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture."

When they read in Isa. l. 6, "I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off my hair. I hid not my face from shame and spitting;" and in liii. 7, "He was oppressed and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth; he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth.... for the transgression of my people was he smitten;" they little thought that they were reading of the sufferings of their Messiah; and when these Scriptures were fulfilling before their eyes, "seeing they did not perceive." And so, to this day, the blinded Jew reads every Sabbath day, in the Psalms and in the Prophets, of things which were accomplished in Jesus; but he does not understand. He is still slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken about Messiah's first appearing among Israel.

In like manner many Gentiles in this day read, or hear read, the Scriptures of the Prophets, which foretell the Messiah's second appearing and his Kingdom; which, as plainly as words can speak, testify of his coming to deliver Israel out of the hands of their enemies, such as Gog; convert, restore, bless, and reign over them gloriously, executing vengeance, in part by their instrumentality, upon their and his enemies; and they no more know "the voices of the Prophets," concerning these future things, than do the Jews concerning what has been fulfilled in Jesus. And my conviction is that Christ will not be believed on at his second appearing, by those who are ignorant of the prophecies then to be fulfilled; and because of unbelief they will be "cut off," as Paul (in Rom. xi. 20, 22) forewarns. Hence, in the revelation of Jesus Christ we see the "Kings of the earth and their armies gathered together to make war against him that sat on the horse and against his army." Rev. xix. 19. We see ten kings giving their power and strength unto a blasphemous "beast," and making "war with the Lamb:" xvii. 12, 14. Why this rejection of and vain opposition to Christ at his appearing? Because the rejectors and opposers do not believe, and nothing will persuade them that he with whom they are making war is Jehovah's Anointed, and that the time has come for him to claim and take of et armis, his promised inheritance, and fulfill Psa. ii. 9: Rev. ii. 26, 27.

Hence the importance of giving heed to the sure word of prophecy and of understanding it. Hence these letters on the future of Israel, their land and King, which are intended to call up attention to Scriptures, the fulfillment of which may be near at hand.—Omega.

BREVITIES.

The oldest yew tree in England, which is situated in Cowhurst churchyard, was mentioned by Aubry, in the reign of Charles I., as then measuring ten yards in circumference at a height of five feet from the ground. It is said on the authority of De Candolle, to be 1,450 years old. Its present growth is about thirty-three feet. In 1820 this old tree was hollowed out, and a canon ball was found in the centre. In 1826 a severe storm deprived it of its upright branches. A door has been made to the inside of the tree, where seats are to be had for twelve persons comfortably.

Jerusalem seems to be growing in favor as a place of residence for foreigners who find their native countries uncomfortable. The foreign Jewish population has, according to Consul Moore, increased considerably of late years. That community is now estimated at 15,000, including native Jews, against 10,000 in 1873. The desire to avoid compulsory military service now enforced in most European countries, and the right of holding real property in Turkey, probably account for the increased immigration. The German colony at Jerusalem now numbers nearly 400 persons, that at Jaffa about 300. There is a third German settlement at Haifa of about equal number with the last mentioned. The settlers are mechanics, artificers, carriers, and agriculturists, and are fairly prosperous.

Batoum is greatly changed for the better since its annexation by Russia. Under Turkish rule it consisted of wretched ruins, three or four novels round the port, a barracks, and fortifications. Now the town is divided into quarters and proprietors have begun the work of building. Here and there fine stone houses may already be seen. Bricks and tiles are brought all the way from Marseilles. As to the draining of the marshes, a channel has already been made for the flow of their water into the sea. The drained lands, not to mention the improvement of the climate, which in general is not very salubrious at Batoum, have enriched the town with a considerable quantity of arable soil. Moreover, a large quantity of clay has thus been exposed, suitable for the manufacture of bricks and tiles.

EGYPT'S SCATTERED OBELISKS.

Thirty obelisks transported from Egypt from time to time are now standing in various parts of Europe. Of these there are in Rome eleven, of which four are higher than the New York obelisk. The highest of these, and the highest in Europe, being 106 feet without the base, stands before the church of St. John Lateran. The obelisk in the piazza of St. Peter's is eighty-two feet nine inches high. Both of these were mounted on high pedestals. The pedestal of the St. John Lateran obelisk is forty-four feet high, making the entire height of obelisk and pedestal 150 feet. The pedestal of the St. Peter's obelisk is a trifle less than fifty feet high, making the whole height of the monument 132 feet two inches. If Commander Gorringe has brought with him the entire pedestal on which the New York Obelisk stood at Alexandria, about the same proportions will be observed as those of the St. John Lutheran obelisk, the pedestal of the former being twenty-seven feet one inch, and its obelisk sixty-eight feet eleven inches, making the whole height of our obelisk ninety-six feet.

A BURIED TEMPLE AND PALACE.

The second Assyrian expedition, which was conducted by Mr. Hormuzd Rassam, brought to light some interesting things. Commencing operations on the mounds of Nineveh, Mr. Rassam succeeded in exploring a site which was regarded as forbidden ground. This was the mound of Nebby Yunus, the supposed tomb of the prophet Jonah. In this mound he discovered remains of places erected by Esarhaddon and Sennacherib. His labors on the mounds of Nineveh have resulted in the recovery of a large number of inscriptions, many of extreme interest. Passing southward, he visited Nimroud, where he continued his labors in the Temple of Venus. This building, which he discovered in his former expedition, was now thoroughly examined, and found to be a large, open temple, containing shrines of several deities. There was also found a number of seats arranged in parallel rows, forming a centre aisle from the chief altar. The plan now recovered seems to favor the idea of its having been a species of forum where religious and other councils were held. The explorations in Assyria have discovered many valuable monuments. Mr. Rassam extended his operations into fields untouched since the time of Sir A. H. Layard's expedition, and he was able to carry out a series of explorations on the mounds of ancient Babylon. Here his discoveries have been most brilliant. In a mound hitherto untouched he discovered a palace of Nebuchadnezzar's, with rich, enamelled columns, beams of Indian wood, and every indication of having been a most splendid edifice. His excavations in the mound of the Birs Nimroud, the site of the supposed Tower of Babel, has proved that the destruction of this great edifice was due, not to lightning or hostile attack, but to a volcanic eruption, which had torn and shattered the edifice.—*Am. RELIGION AND FAITH.

To be religious is to feel that God is the Ever Near. It is to go through life with this thought coming instinctively and unbidden, "Thou, God, seest me!" A life of religion is a life of faith; and faith is that strange faculty by which man feels the presence of the invisible; exactly as some animals have the the power of seeing in the dark. This is the difference between the Christian and the world.—F. W. Robertson.

ONLY WAITING.

Only wait till the dawning
Is a little brighter grown,
Only waiting till the shadows
Of the world's dark night are flown
Till the shadows all shall vanish,
In the blessed, blessed day,
For the morn, at last, is breaking
Through the twilight, soft and gray.

Evils in the journey of life are like the hills which alarm travellers upon their road; they both appear great at a distance, but when we approach them we we find that they are far less insurmountable than we had conceived.

All is hollow where the heart bears not a part, and all is in peril where principle is not its guide.

COMMUNICATIONS.

LITTLE THINGS.

"From the Unwritten Word."

The ancient sage was safe in saying that—"that there be four things that are little upon the earth, yet exceeding wise." If he had lived in our time, he might multiplied the same by thousands. The world has made great progress in three thousand years. And still the wisest of men have much to learn from the little things of the earth.

The research of modern times has discovered millions of living creatures so small that the unassisted eye of man has never seen them. The sagacious minds of the ancients never suspected their existence. And the more we know of their nature and habits, the more we wonder at the wisdom and power which God has conferred upon the little things of the earth. If we compare ourselves with creatures that are counted a pest and crushed without a thought, we shall find that in many respects they have greatly the advantage of us. The sum of faculties bestowed upon man is indeed immensely greater; and yet in some one particular he may be surpassed by the least and lowest of the brute creation. He has intellectual powers which if properly used will fit him to be crowned with glory and honor in the age to come, and to have all things put under his feet—the beast of the field, the fowls of the air and the fish of the sea. And yet we may see much to excite our wonder and admiration in the dust and the insect of the day. If we could move through the air with as great relative speed as the common house fly, we could cross the Atlantic ocean and return in the time that we spend at our breakfast table every morning. Look out of a railway car when it is in the most rapid motion on a summer's day, and you will see winged creatures sporting in the air, moving up and down, backward and forward keeping abreast of you all the while, just as if the car were standing still. The speed of sixty miles an hour counts nothing with the little creature that plays at the window, apparently without making an extra stroke of the wing to keep up with the flying train. If we could walk on the earth at as rapid a relative gait, or change our position with as great agility, as insects that we hate and crush whenever we find them, we could spring to the top of the tallest steeple at a single bound—we could make the fable of the giant taking a fifth of a mile at a step more a reality than a fiction. If we could build ships that would carry us at as great a comparative speed as the beautifly skims the surface of the water, we could leave our homes at noon, pass around the whole circumference of the earth, and return with the meridian sun directly above us all the way.

Our progress would keep pace with the movement of the day, and we should only need to keep going to experience a literal fulfillment of the promise "Thy sun shall no more go down." If our houses of worship were as large and strong in proportion to the size of the builders as the structures reared by the termites in Africa, we should be covered by domes rising 5,000 feet above our heads, we should pass in and out through doors and arches four times higher than the highest church spire ever built, and our roofs would be strong enough to support the weight of a million of men. If we grew as fast from birth as the silk worm, we should equal the size of an elephant in a month, and we should devour food enough to support an army of 3,000 men. If our organs of vision were only as numerous and complex as those of the butterfly, we should have sixty thousand perfect eyes set in our brows to catch every line and form of the view before us, and an extra pair to serve as watch towers on the top of the head.

If our vocal organs were as strong proportionally as those of the canary bird, we could make ourselves heard farther than the cannonade of Gettysburg or Waterloo, without straining our voices. If our bodies were as well protected against violence as those of some creatures no bigger than a pin's head, we could stand all the cannon-shot in the world, and mind it as little as we now mind the smallest particle of dust that is blown in our faces by the wind.

These comparative estimates simply go to show that the infinite God has not gone to the extent of his power in making us the creatures that we are.

We have only to examine the little things of earth to learn that he has bestowed on them some one form of intelligence or power vastly superior to the corresponding faculty bestowed upon us. The sum of God's gifts to man in his moral and intellectual nature is infinitely far greater than all bestowed upon the brute. But he has endowed the smallest creatures with some one faculty in a greater measure, to show us how easily he could increase our capacities for action and enjoyment a thousand fold, and not do any thing more difficult for him or wonderful to us, than he is doing around us every day.

The vulture scents his food, the eagle sees its prey, the bee builds its cell, the spider spins its web, the swallow seeks its home, with an accuracy which would be nothing less than miraculous in man. God has bestowed, in separate gifts, upon the smallest creatures a degree of power, and intelligence, and activity, which, if combined in one and given to man, would enable him to haul the mountains into the sea and shake the foundations of the earth. The present limitations of our faculties are evidently designed to guard against abuse. If our present faculties were suddenly enlarged, and our command over the elements of nature were proportionally increased, we should be like children playing with fire without knowing its quick and terrible power. Our Father is too wise and kind to give us faculties which we should only use in destroying ourselves. When we are made partakers of the Divine nature by putting on immortality at the resurrection, it will be safe and easy for the Giver of all gifts to enlarge our capacities a thousand fold.

We may then be made like the Cherubims, full of eyes to survey the universe with an all-pervading vision. We may move with the speed of lightning, in any direction and to any distance we please and nothing have power to oppose our progress. We may be able to work without weariness and without rest, and always find pleasant and profitable work to do, and may be so perfectly guarded against accident and injury that neither fire nor flood nor force of any kind can hurt. Knowledge may come to us as easily as it came to Adam in Paradise—as easily as instinct comes to the bird and the bee. All this wondrous enlargement of faculty may God bestow upon his saints in the future age. And the extraordinary gifts which he has already bestowed upon the little things of the earth lead us to expect that he will give more and greater to his redeemed and immortal children. He who gives a small insect power to fly over a thousand miles of ocean without resting, can surely give the Resurrected Saint power to pass from world to world with the speed of light and a wing that never tires. He who forms fifty thousand perfect eyes for the use of a creature that lives and dies in a day, may surely give more than five senses to that spiritual body which shall never die.

The powers of that age to for which we look may be far greater than our anticipations. The Bible says, "Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, heart hath not conceived the greatness and the glory of those things which God hath prepared for those who wait for him." Being gifted with angelic power, may we not have the eye to see and the mind to measure the immensities of creation, to a far greater extent than we now have any conception? When we look up to the starry heavens, when we wander among the solitudes of snow-clad mountains, when we survey the vast and surging ocean, we feel ourselves to be standing in the presence of the Infinite. We are awed and elevated by sensible contact with the mighty workmanship of the eternal mind. But we have no such preparation of mind for the contemplation of the Infinite when we seek it in the little things of the earth.

We are startled and confounded when we see what unconquerable energy, what mysterious intelligence, what resistless power, what invulnerable life, God has conferred upon things so small that it has taken the keenest science and the mightiest instruments to discover their existence. And some of these little things are described in the prophetic word with every expression of power and sublimity.

When they are sent forth in great numbers as a scourge upon the earth, they become more resistless and terrible to man than the earthquake, the pestilence or the storm. "The locusts," says the wise man, "have no king, yet go they forth all of them by bands." They form in compact ranks, like the battalions of a disciplined army, and they march at the command of a Divine and mysterious will. One Spirit rules through the mighty host and they come in numbers without number, countless as the snowflakes and dark as the clouds. It is impossible to imagine the greatness of the multitude. The advancing column has been known to be 500 miles in length. In one instance a traveller directed his course across their line of motion, and he rode forty miles before he reached the edge of the living line.

When they travel on the earth they cover everything as completely as the deep river fills its bed. When they fly in the air they darken the sun, and the sound of their wings is as the sound of many waters. No green thing is left in the path of their march, and the earth behind them is scorched and burt as if it had been swept by devouring fire. At morn the peasant looks forth from his cottage door upon cultivated fields and laden orchards and blooming gardens. At noon the army of locusts has passed, and there is not a flower, or a green leaf, or a blade of grass to be seen in the whole landscape. The desolation produced by armies is nothing compared to the ravages of locusts. Famine and pestilence follow their march.

The hearts of men are hardened with hunger. The dead lie unburied in their homes, and the living devour each other in their madness and misery. The Arabs of ancient and modern times ascribe to those little creatures, the terror and power of the strongest beasts of the earth. They say they have the face of a horse, the eyes of an elephant, the neck of a bull, the horns of a deer, the chest of a lion, the belly of a scorpion, the wings of an eagle, the thighs of a camel, the feet of an ostrich, and the tail of a serpent. The Prophet Joel says "they have the teeth of lions, the appearance of horsemen and of strong people set in battle array. They run like mighty men, and their march is like the noise of chariots upon the mountains. The earth quakes before them, the heavens tremble, the sun and moon are darkened and the stars withdraw their shining." When they appear advancing millions by millions it seems as if the dust of the earth had been made all alive. There is no escape from the moving column. It is terrific, irresistable, universal, overwhelming, penetrating everywhere, overspreading all things, excluded by nothing. The Emperor Alexander of Russia, once sent out an army of 30 000 men in the vain effort to stop their progress. They sweep across the plain and flow up the mountain side and descend the steep like a cataract.

They roll over rocks and walls, houses and hedges, filling up the trenches that have been dug and putting out the fires that have been kindled to stop them. They enter windows, and doors and chimneys, covering beds, and tables And furniture, filling all wells and springs and fountains of water. They descend the deepest valleys. They flow over mountains fourteen thousand feet high. They defy alike sword and spear and cannon. They pass right through the ranks of armies. They plunder the camp of the conqueror as easily as the garden of the peasant. They pass over city walls, they penetrate fortress and palace as easily as they traverse the open plain. They are omnipresent like the pestilence, they are resistless, like the tornado, they are mysterious like the judgment of God.

And these little things of the earth show us how minute and resistless and pervasive is the power which governs the world. When God would send the most terrible scourge upon disobedient nations, he does not need to shake the heavens with mighty thunders or to call forth fountains and cataracts of fire from the bosom of the earth. He does not need to cast the mountains into the sea or cause the deep to overwhelm the land. He need only breath upon the small dust of the ground, and the air shall be darkened and the earth shall be desolated by millions of millions of living creatures, whose march no force or skill of man can stop, whose appetite no fruit of the garden, or field, or vineyard can satisfy. The smallest and most contemptible creatures become terrible and resistless in the hands of him who can call them in countless myriads, and command them to carry destruction and desolation wherever they go. The man of science cannot tell how or where the mighty armies are raised. The man of power cannot prevent their coming. The man of faith can only submit and say, "This is the finger of God," Ex. viii. 19.

And there are little things of the earth which are even more mysterious and not less mighty. Within our memory a strange blight came upon a single plant in Ireland, and the wail of starving millions was sent around the world, and yet the cause of that terrible calamity was one of the little things which God uses in his great works. The rust, the mildew, and the weevil are among the least of living things on the earth. The wisest of men know little of their nature; and yet God needs no mightier ministers of vengeance to destroy the food of nations and make millions mourn.

A living dust forms on the bearded grain, and broad fields of wheat yield nothing but straw and stubble in the time of harvest. A little fly comes out of the earth and stings the forming fruit, and the husbandman cuts down his orchard in despair. A little brown creature, whose body is no more than a quarter of an inch long, goes out to sport in the pine forest of the South; and thousands of acres of trees, as goodly as the cedars of Lebanon, are changed to a wilderness of lifeless trunks and leafless branches. The ocean is sometimes red and green and yellow over many miles of its surface. Sometimes it rises and swells in waves of silvery light, as if the whole surface were moulded and medallioned in fire. Sometimes the snow in Arctic regions is crimsoned with the hue of blood, as if it had been made the battlefield of nations. And the color and the light in all these cases comes from the presence of countless living creatures, so small that five millions could march abreast in a compact line along a street of moderate breath. And it is by the toil of these small creatures that God is over changing and rebuilding the earth. The bottom of the sea is their burial-ground, piled so high with their bodies that in some places they come to the surface and make islands for trees to grow and living men to gather in cities and kingdoms. They have built up a break-water more than a thousand miles long to keep the sea from devouring the shore of Australia.

No skill or toil of man could have raised so strong and enduring a barrier against the ceaseless onset of the waves. Whole ranges of mountains are made of the skeletons of creatures so small that we need the highest powers of the microscope to see any sign of organization in the handful of dust which is nothing but millions of their bodies. The fine powder of polishing slate is nothing but the unbroken and perfectly formed shells of once living creatures, so small that forty thousand millions are contained in a cubic inch of stone. The city of Richmond is built upon a bed of flinty marl, the whole mass of which, twenty-five feet deep, was once alive with creatures a thousandth part of an inch in length.

The flint that strikes fire on the face of steel is made of the minute skeletons of creatures that once lived as we live and move to-day. The sand of the great Sahara in Africa is an ocean of fossil shells that were once inhabited by living beings. One class of these living creatures, fully endowed with all the organs and faculties of perfect animal life, is so small that eight millions could live in the hollow shell of a grain of mustard seed. And God has put forth the most wondrous power and wisdom in the creation of these infinitesmal living things with which the air, the earth, and the waters are filled. He has displayed infinite skill in making creatures so small that we cannot see them with the unassisted eye; so numerous that we cannot conceive their number; so mighty that they have done more to change the face of the earth than all the works of man in all time.

It is equally impossible to find out God's work to perfection in beings so small that millions sport in the drop of water, or in worlds so vast that they fill the universe with light And, in this minute attention to things that are least, the Divine Architect teaches us the great secret of all successful work.

The longest journey is a succession of steps, and the swiftest traveler can take only one at a time. The strongest chain is made up of separate links. The beautiful structure of a strong, well-balanced, symmetrical character is built out of individual acts of duty. No one can estimate the innumerable thoughts that make up the unwritten history of a single mind for a single day, and yet every one of these thoughts has something to do in making the man.

The slightest stain left upon the surface of glass by the evaporation of a drop of torpid water is found to contain minute shells, perfectly formed and once inhabited by living creatures. The casual thought that disappears from the mind leaves an impress of itself. If it was pure and good, the man is better for having cherished it only for an instant. The pulse of spiritual power which it gave will do something to make the man whole, just as every grain of sand is needed to build the shore and every drop of rain to fill the ocean. "He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful in much." It is a small thing to give a cup of cold water in the name of Christ. But whoever is faithful in things so small will be first to meet the demands of duty when the trial is great. The man who is first to speak a kind word to a friendless child, or to carry a look of sunshine into an afflicted and desolate home, will be first to make the great sacrifices of duty when the Master calls. It is minute and conscientious attention to little things, or to what the world calls little things, that makes the great beauty and success of life. Little deeds of charity, little words of kindness, little acts of self-denial, little moments of diligence, a careful watch of little sins, a grateful use of little blessings, a wise improvement of little opportunities, a diligent cultivation of little talents, patient continuance in well-doing under little encouragement,—these things make men great in the sight of God. If these things be in you and abound, they will bring the knowledge and enjoyment of everything else. God's great work is perfect as a whole, because it is perfect in every part. He makes a leaf or a blade of grass with as much care as he makes a world. He polishes the scaly coat of the smallest insect as perfectly as he feathers the wing of the cloud-cleaving eagle. "If you would be perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect, let all your work be done as unto him and in his sight. Be faithful in the least as well as in the greatest. Consider that anything worth doing at all is worth doing well. Learn to speak the little words of truth—to do the little deeds of kindness—to scatter the little gifts of love along the lowly pathways of life. And so, when your toil is done, your life-work shall be found precious before God and be rewarded with a crown of eternal life and glory in the age to come.

Literary Notices,

From Bro. Wilson, connected with the publishing office of Our Hope, we have received a book entitled "The Prophetic Numbers of Daniel and the Revelation, together with an Intelligent Exposition of the Great Periods of Scripture, and the Approaching Restitution," by John Cumming. It is well printed, and neatly bound in cloth, being a 12mo. sheet, of 424 pages. Price $1.50. Address J. Jones, 30 Monroe St., Cincinnati. We have had only time to cursorily examine this book. While its interpretations of the prophecies of the Apocalypse are quite novel, it, at the same time, adopts the most remarkable to the history of the world. Like other English writers on prophecy the author brings the end of this dispensation very near. Of this opinion legitimately remark the book as well as of the work on the Egyptian Pyramids, we hope to speak more in detail hereafter as our cares crowd us at the present time.

The three numbers of Our Hope for June, July and August, came to hand last week. The July number contains an outline map of Palestine, showing the proposed direction of the contemplated railroad and its branches from the point where it enters the Holy Land to the point where it leaves Damascus to join the Euphrates Valley Line. It contains interesting articles on chronology, as well as on events connected with the fulfillment of prophecy. The January and August numbers, by which God's chronological articles, continue to unfold the grandest lessons built with such wonderful art into the Great Pyramid. Interesting articles on the Regeneration of Palestine are to be found in all these numbers

Appointments Withdrawn.

The wife appointments of Thomas A Knight, "must pass—but God still goes on," found another all sufficient in the hospitality of the oldest saint in Ohio! Arrangements of great interest to Cleveland and Cleveland, Ohio. Having reached Henderson, Kentucky, pursuant to appointment, I was unable, owing to severe and sudden illness, to participate, after the first day, in the services of the large fraternal gathering which had been assembled with many others, to hear the word of the Lord. The very painful and humiliating manner which confined me to my bed was aggravated exceedingly by my disappointment in not being able to bear my part with my dear brethren in their noble endeavors for the faith once delivered to the saints. Thanks to him "whose mercy endureth forever," I am, however, raised up to co-operate once and have reached my home in Virginia in safety, but am as yet too feeble to attempt to redeem my promise to be at Cumberland, Cleveland and Salem, Ohio, to which latter point I was invited also. Please, therefore, insert this note by way of withdrawal of those appointments. I have already informed some of the brethren. The meetings in Cumberland county were in progress when I left, the brethren and the large crowds in attendance rejoicing the public ministry of the word, chiefly through Brethren Jones and Cox Vest. The additions to the household of faith had been so far some eight or ten—in the only Bible way, i. e. by baptism into Christ.

DIED.

MILEY—On July 29, 1878, at Grand Rapids, Mich., Ada May, the beloved daughter of H. M. and E. M. Miley, aged four years, eight months and one day. Her loss is deeply mourned by all.

Her tasks she is ended,
Her sweet spirit fled,
And now she is sleeping
In peace with the dead.

Too fair was the blossom
For earth's chilly blast,
And early in the fated
Eternal home it was past.

RESTITUTION FUND.

ALBION, Fulton Co., Ind., Nov. 29, 1877.

Elder Restitution—With your permission I will now make an appeal to the brethren's heart for help to support THE RESTITUTION for the year 1878 and hence its weekly visits.

Now, dear brethren, I will open one and all who feel themselves able, to donate to the cause of Christ the small amount of $300 between this and the first of January.

Dear brethren, we could do this, with a few exceptions, if we just thought so. I am well aware that some brethren have contributed nobly, but I mean little ones. It's a special manner to those who have heretofore done nothing as a free will offering.

Dear brother, do not say, I am too poor! Perhaps you are aware that nothing need, hinder, in some form. Consider for one moment are we who claim to be the chosen of God so poverty stricken that we cannot support a weekly paper.

We do hope that everyone will respond to this appeal. Please let us hear from all those who cannot or will not pay the $300, and will they please give us their reasons. I remain a poor man. My name is Abraham Pontious. I am 70 years old and have a large family to support. I have a small farm of 60 acres. I farm and work at the carpenter's trade to support my family. I am neither related nor interested in drinks.

And, dear Elder, I will enclose $10 to commence on. I read THE RESTITUTION, and the Bible, and I hope to meet you all in that coming kingdom. So, farewell.

ABRAHAM PONTIOUS.

POETRY.

[Presbyterian.]

Babylon.

I climbed the cliff: I crossed the rock;
I trod the desert sand;
I parted the wild Arabian's tent,
The syrian Shepherd's fold.
Behind me far were haunts of men,
Stretched into distant gray;
While spread before, lone and wide,
The plain of Shinar lay—

The boundless plain of far Elajar,
Where long, long ages back,
Ah Isaiah read the silent stars,
And wrote their mystic track—
Where art thou, gem of the clean earth,
City of far renown,
The glory of the proud Chaldee,
The green easter's ancient crown?

Where lie the lake that, glittering wide,
Gave back thy hundred towers?
Where are thy gardens of delight,
Thy cedar-shaded bowers?
And where, O! where, tell rapidly
Thine ever-flowing river,
Past marble gates and columned towers,
Glancing thy waters forever?

There is no voice of gladness here,
No breath of song floats by,
I hearken, but the morning breeze
In all that makes reply.
Solemn and lone the silent march
Spreads endlessly around,
And shapeless are the ruined steps
That skrew the broken ground.

Sadly those huge outline rise
High the lone willow bough,
The last, last voice of Babylon,
Its only music now.
Sea of Mandane, by whose hand
The aloe-as city fell,
The swift feet of whose soldiery
Climbed tower and citadel;

Thou foundest revelry and mirth,
Thou foundest dance and song,
Thou foundest many a banquet hall,
And many a hymn throng;
Like the death-angel seemed thou,
When men were care-bereft;
And in this hour, waste wilderness
The total thou hast left!

O! glorious were her palaces,
And shrines of fretted gold;
There rose the fane of Merodach,
The house of Belus old;
And busy life was in her streets,
Where commerce nations throned;
Light footsteps glided through her homes,
And mirth to her belonged.

But prophet voices murmured,
E'en in her festal halls,
And angel fingers wrote her doom,
Upon the palace walls,
At midnight came the Persian,
Slaughter and fire the crowd;
He treaded not the beautiful,
He stayed not for the proud.

Euphrates was her fated river,
Heedless her gods of stone;
He entered at her open gates:
He passed—and she was gone.
Her place on earth shall it not,
Memorial she hath none:
Darkness and ruin thou hast'st fled,
But never Babylon.

COMMUNICATIONS.

A Clergyman's Argument for the Immortality of the Soul Dissected.—No. 2.

"Does all that speech, by utterable, Look right?"

Proof No. 19: The rich man and Lazarus. Luke xvi.

This was, without doubt, a parable, spoken to the Pharisees, whom Jesus never addressed save by parable. In Matt. xiii. it is recorded that, without a parable spake he not unto them. A parable should never be taken in a literal manner; nor can this parable be literalized, without evident absurdity to those unspoiled by the traditions of the apostacy. Instead of teaching the disembodied existence of souls and spirits, we have simply a statement that the "rich man" died, was buried, and in hades (not gehenna) lifted up his eyes, being tormented. Eyes are certainly a part of this material body and not of the soul which theology calls "immaterial." Further, what did the "rich man" desire? "Father Abraham have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water and cool my tongue."

Surely, fingers and tongues are not the property of souls that possess no substance!

If you claim, "Rev." sir, that the "rich man" and Lazarus were literal personages, then can we claim that Lazarus reposed in Abraham's literal bosom. Who can limit the extent of literalizing figurative expressions when such liberties are taken with the parabolic utterances of the Christ? No one can possibly do so, but, by following such rules, the Bible will soon be involved in a jargon of mysticism. In the interpretation of parables restraint must be put upon the imagination. One parable must not be made to conflict with the lessons taught in others, —and the direct teaching of Christ is the standard by which all our interpretations are to be measured. Now, where, in all the direct teaching of Christ, do we find explicit testimony that the soul is immortal, and that it suffers torment in hadean flames? No where. Then sur an interpretation of this parable is sadly wrong.

What, then, does it teach? 'Tis simply a representation of the lopping off of the natural "olive branches" (the Jews) and the ingrafting of the "wild olive" (the Gentiles). The "rich man" who fared sumptuously,—who was exalted by his riches—represents the former class, while Lazarus, uncared for, poor, covered with sores, waiting with the dogs for the crumbs—that fell from the table of the rich—represents the latter class. In the death of the "rich man" we have the extinction of the Jewish nation. In the hadean torment their punishment while in a political grave. That punishment is now going on, and has been since A. D. 70. In Lazarus we have the personified condition of the Gentiles during their abasement, when they were "without hope, without God in the world, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers to the covenants of promise;" and, also, when they were exalted into "Abraham's bosom" by being blessed with him through faith in the promises of God to be fulfilled in Abraham's heir —the Christ. The gulf, now impassible, will be bridged by the coming of that heir, who will ingraff the Jews that they may partake once more of the root and fatness of the olive tree. This is the solution of the much abused parable of the "rich man and Lazarus."

Proof No. 20: "Thief on the cross." Luke xxiii. 42.

The petition of the thief on the cross, is cited so often, that one is almost persuaded that Orthodoxy is willing to substitute one passage for the whole of God's word, and build upon it as a Gibraltar. But the light of heaven can penetrate even into the fastnesses of their Gibraltar, because it comes from above and is untrammeled by the devices of men. What did the thief ask? Lord, remember me when thou comest in (en) thy kingdom. Quite a singular request from one who we are told wished to be remembered by Christ, when he ascended into heaven. I would much rather the thief be his own interpreter than to infer that because he said "remember me when thou comest in thy kingdom," he meant when thou goest into heaven.

What was the superscription over the Savior's head? This is the King of the Jews. What significance had those words to the dying malefactor? Much more than many are aware of. Christ preached the "glad tidings" of the kingdom to the Jews, and witnessed before Pilate, that he was their King. This kingdom, which will be glorious and incorruptible, is to be the kingdom of Israel restored to earth. For the truth of this statement we find the apostles, just before the ascension of the Lord, inquiring of him, "Wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" Now, mark, Christ did not reprove this hope. He did not, as modern "theologians" do, rain the anxiously waiting ones "carnal" and tell them of "kingdoms beyond the skies," but he simply added that, "'Tis not for you to know the times and seasons which the Father hast reserved in his own power."

The petition of the thief had reference to this kingdom and none other. This is shown by the expression "when thou comest." Christ, the "nobleman," had to go into a far country to procure for himself royalty, but he will come again and receive the faithful unto himself, and in that day the thief will be remembered. Jesus' answer was in accordance with the prayer. "Verily I say unto thee to-day, thou shalt be with me in Paradise." There can be no Paradise until Christ restores it in Eden when he returns to establish his kingdom. The thief could not have been with Christ in heaven on the day in which they hung upon the cross, for Christ did not ascend into heaven for forty days thereafter.

The Greek text was originally written without punctuation, which was introduced by Manutius, a printer of Venice. The adverb "to-day" ("semeron,") qualifies the following verb fifty-one times, and the preceding verb 170 times. A direct answer to the thief's petition demands that the passages should read: "Verily I say unto thee to-day, thou shalt be with me in Paradise." As it is written in Deut. viii. 19; "I testify against you this day, that ye shall perish."

Proof No. 21: "He is not a God of the dead, but of the living." Matt. xxii.

By reading the 23d verse of the chapter cited, we find that the Sadducees, "which say that there is no resurrection," asked him concerning the resurrection. The conversation, then, between them and Christ had reference to this subject and none other. Jesus in reply to their question, refers them to that spoken unto them by God: "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. God is not the God of the dead, but of the living." Now, this silenced the Sadducees, and why? Because they saw that, unless Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were resurrected—caused to stand up again—God's testimony would be false, which they were not prepared to believe. The idea that this passage of Scripture teaches "immortal soulism," is absurd. On the contrary, it teaches, beyond doubt, that resurrection is the only way laid down in the word of God by which they, who are dead, may obtain a future life.

But, says Orthodoxy, Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob are alive; they are now enjoying bliss in heaven. Where is the testimony? Jesus, like the rest of his Jewish (as it was forth-coming. The Divine Teacher has said: "No man hath ascended up to heaven;" and, as for Immortal ghosts flying thither—twill do for those who desire to embrace delusion, but, alas! the truth will ere long expose the "traditions" to which they have clung and leave them outcasts and aliens, "without hope and without God in the world."

Proof No. 22: Stephen's prayer. Acts vii.

The Greek pneuma, is the word translated spirit in the passage under consideration; and it has been shown to mean also life, mind and disposition. What, then, did Stephen pray for? Lord Jesus receive my life or I entrust thee with my life. Stephen believed in the resurrection and he was fully persuaded that, if his life was hid with Christ in God, that when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory. But, for the terrible practice of attaching immortality to words that have no connection with it, no one would have difficulty in understanding at once Stephen's prayer.

Proof No. 23: Absent from the body. 2 Cor. v. 6-8.

Paul, in the preceding chapter, speaks of things seen and things not seen. The first corresponding to "things temporal," the latter to "things eternal." Then continuing the subject, he compares the weakness of the "earthly tabernacle"—this temporary existence —with the glorious and eternal dwelling, not as yet seen, for we walk by faith, not by sight. From temporal things the apostle was anxious to be absent, that he might realize those things eternal. But he was very desirous that this realization should take place by a "clothing upon" with our house which is from heaven. Not that he would be "unclothed," but the rather clothed upon that mortality might be swallowed up of life. In a former epistle to the Corinthians, Paul shows that the heavenly or eternal state of things is ushered in by the proclamation, "Death is swallowed up in victory." As long as we are in the mortal body we are absent from the Lord, for "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom [of God, neither does corruption inherit incorruption."

The theory current among professed followers of Christ, yet who are, in reality, followers of a myth, requires that the body should be taken off the soul in order that it may soar up to heaven. Such was not Paul's desire. His was an appreciation of the misery, the groaning, belonging to mortality and an earnest desire for the fulfillment of that which is the hope and assured expectations of all true Christians, viz.: The coming of him who shall give us an entrance into that house which is promised—glorious and incorruptible.

Proof No. 24: Desire to depart. Phil. i. 23.

Paul's desire to depart and be with Christ, as the common Version renders it, is conceded, by immortal soulists, to be strong proof on their side. But, again, we will apply the touchstone, truth. Paul, according to the original, had an earnest desire for the "analusai," unloosing or returning of Christ, which was much to be preferred to his then present condition. "Analusai" is rendered return in Luke xii. 36,—"Be you like men waiting for their Master when he shall return (analusai) from the nuptial feasts."

Paul taught the coming of Christ and the resurrection of the dead as the only Christian hope. He was looking for the Savior from heaven to change his vile body and fashion it like unto his glorious body. Paul was by no means a believer in inherent immortality, for he taught the contrary on many occasions. If Christ be not raised (he said) then they who have fallen asleep in Christ have perished. This declaration shows, conclusively, that all the faithful who had died before Christ, could not have been conscious nor enjoying the pleasures of heaven—"For they, without us, shall not be made perfect."

Proof No. 25: 1 Thess. iv. 14.

The verse we are cited to in proof of this "diluted divinity" claimed to be possessed by man, reads as follows: "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."

The apostle says they are "asleep." "Clergymen" say they are awake in heaven. Whom are we to believe? Furthermore, when are the dead waked? When the trump shall sound and the Lord shall descend. God leads them forth, not at death, for in death they sleep a sleep wholly unconscious; but at the resurrection, if we believe that Jesus rose, so shall those who fall asleep in him come forth to life eternal.

Proof No. 26: souls under the altar. Rev. vi. 9.

It is truly astonishing to what extremes men go to support a preconceived idea. Ask "immortal soulists" where are the souls of the righteous, and they at once answer. "In heaven, praising God and enjoying perfect happiness," and in the next moment they will cite you to a passage like the above. That the souls seen under the altar have not realized peace and happiness is apparent. They had been killed, according to verse 11, and were evidently waiting until they should be revenged upon those who had deprived them of life. Knowing that vengeance is the Lord's he is appealed to, and, in reply, answers them that they are justified in his sight by the white robes given them, representing perfect acquittal. The true teaching shines through it all in the eleventh verse, for not until their brethren would receive reward, could they enjoy it. The whole is a highly wrought picture representing those who had been cruelly slain and whose blood, like Abel's, "cried from the ground," speaking to the Lord and asking how long they must patiently wait before they should be freed and see their enemies prostrate at their feet.

Proof No. 27: "At death the soul of the believer receives a crown of life." Rev. xi. 10.

The words of the Revelator are preferable to even a "clergyman's." His words are—"Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life."

A promise is one thing, the realization of that promise is another. The promise has been made, the realization is future. Faithfulness ends with death, for "there is no knowledge, nor device, nor wisdom, in the grave whither thou goest." The crown will be given at the awakening when the chief shepherd shall appear. If I should say, "Work thou to-day, and I will pay thee," you have my promise, but the time of payment is not stipulated. So of this passage we are considering—with one exception, while the time of reward is not stipulated in the promise, but simply the period of work limited—'tis understood, when the promise will be realized by all the faithful, viz.: When Jesus in that day he hath appointed, shall reward his servants.

Proof No. 28 does not require much notice as 'tis but a repetition of No. 19. The gentleman affirms that there are millions of such cases as the rich man and Lazarus. No doubt there are millions of men who, by their proud and selfish spirit find it representative in Dives, and so of the poor and Lazarus. But that millions of men have gone from this earth to heaven or hell (using the latter word in Orthodoxy sense) I deny, and have abundantly sustained my denial. The gentleman calls this "parable" "a true picture." Of what, "Rev." sir? "Immortal soulism." Nay, for you call it a looking-glass into the spirit state, and in your proof No. 4 you affirm that spirit is possessed by all animal matter that has life. Your calling it "animal spirit" does not relieve you in the least. You, no doubt, imagine that you see in your "looking-glass" the reflection of the truth, but, in reality, you see but the reflection of your own vain imaginings.

If your mind was the embodiment of truth, when you look on God's word, you would see the truth. Rid yourself of all delusion and then will you rejoice in the light of the "truth as it is in Jesus."

W. I. CHOLLETT.

JUSTIFICATION.

Answer to Bro. Myers' Letter in July 21, 1880.

I trust you have given due attention to the parts of my article in June 23, that you do not antagonize. My reply to your many points must be short at the risk of seeming blunt.

There is yet a little too much Campbell and not enough Jesus in your theology. Your logic is like John's, Mark ix. 38. He reasoned less confidently but more spiritually after that.

It is a monstrous blunder to put baptism equal to faith or repentance. Jesus and the Apostles always made faith and repentance universal essentials to salvation, not so of baptism. Pardon me if I say it seems impertinent to try to bottle up divine mercy in logic, that is, to try to make the way of salvation seem more difficult than the plain language of the New Testament shows it to be. Jesus only once stopped to ask the masters of ceremonies if it would be proper for him, under the circumstances, to show mercy, and then only to stop their mouths.

If pardon is obtained only in baptism, as you argue, would not ordinary Christians have to be baptized at least every day?

Rituals and sacraments are servants in the church, but it is a common infirmity to make them masters of God and saviours of his grace.

To the great embarrassment of your theory, the New Testament is not quite full enough. It does indeed say, without faith it is impossible to please God, and "except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish;" but, unfortunately for you, it does not say that no man can be saved without baptism: and this omission is conspicuous just where you may well wish it were not, viz., in the great commission. Mark xvi. 16. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." How it would relieve your argument if "believeth not" were followed by "and is not baptized." But it is not there nor anywhere else equivalent, yet you interpret the New Testament just as if it were there. Has it ever occurred to you that this looks like taking improper liberties with the Great Teacher? And have you tried to think why baptism was left out of the negative part of the commission? Was it not that mercy might be free and not liable to be "coerced" by officious meddlers? Do you think it right to force an amendment into the Lord's commission by logical inferences? Don't you see that is reasoning in the opposite direction from Paul? He reasoned out of the Scriptures; you reason your theory into them. If your reasoning is sound, would not the Lord have waited till Peter's Jewish brethren had baptized Cornelius and his friends before he bestowed the Holy Ghost on them? And those brethren, like some in later time, might have used the baptism of those distinguished Gentiles to ornament a conference and advertise Peter's skill; but if the appointment had been made at Jerusalem the whole thing could have been vetoed. You see, as it was, on your theory, it took seven other names besides that of Jesus to save them; God did not wait, but overwhelmed them with proofs that he could not be "withstood," that he could pardon the penitent without human intervention.

Your theory would make it impossible for God to save any man without some other man's consent. Can you believe that Jesus put such a brake on the car of salvation?

Now please read each of your questions and then my answer to it, to save re-printing the questions.

1. "A past act," and Ananias would have him observe the Christian ritual showing it. A figure that any scholar can understand.

2. In the exercise of faith and repentance.

3. Not clear. As it stands it implies pardon only at the end of "the whole Christian life;" pardon begins the Christian life.

4. I never knew any one to teach that faith without repentance would save. Their believing had not yet amounted to faith; this is an active principle and leads to immediate repentance and obedience. They had not repented, else Peter would not have told them to repent. Baptism was added of course; that is the Christian formula. This ritual is not redundant or useless, any more than circumcision was in the old economy, but it is more fit and expressive.

5. You see that believing the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ was not a sufficient pre-requisite for baptism. Simon had not repented; his believing was not faith. I thought the readers of THE RESTITUTION would not need to be told that repentance is implied in the sixty-five texts, nor that repentance follows close upon the inception of genuine faith.

6. Duty requires that I say very plainly what I "mean." Those who hold your theory act or delay action —as if they did not believe it; and it seems to me impossible for any body to believe it: That God has so bound himself by his own law that he cannot forgive a repentent sinner till some other man baptizes him. If this is so, gospel "liberty" is a new "bondage," not of men only but also of God, and Christ and the Holy Spirit. God has locked all the sympathies and powers of heaven against the sinner and thrown the key where none but frail men can get it. The sinner does all he can—believes, repents, asks, seeks, knocks, but God cannot forgive him, Jesus cannot have mercy on him, the Holy Spirit cannot come to him, angels cannot rejoice in his recovery; all heaven must wait till some dull mortal can be convinced that he is qualified for baptism, and finds leisure and convenience to baptize him. If this is the "free woman," don't you think we better pray for Hagar and the shades of Sinai?

7. You "state that faith destroys the affections to sin, repentance destroys action to or practice of sin and thus the party is dead to sin; but is he yet freed from sin? has he yet reached the blood of Christ? has he yet reached the death of Christ where that blood may be found?"

Have you forgotten, dear brother that Christ died on the cross, so in the tomb? and that he was buried dead, not alive? that his shed blood and broken body were exhibited on Calvary to all the world, not in Joseph's vault under the Roman seal and guard? Let me ask how your "party" got faith to destroy his sinful affections without the blood of Christ. When faith and repentance have "destroyed his affections to sin and the practice of sin, and him dead to sin," what condition is he in? Is he still a sinner? Is he a Christian? or is he neither? Is there an hiatus in his experience in which he has no character? Must he stay in this limbo till somebody can be persuaded to baptize him out of it? If he dies in the transit what will become of him? He cannot be lost, for John says whosoever believeth shall not perish; and you say he cannot be saved because he has not been baptized. You say he is dead to sin and ask if he is freed from sin. Paul says he is, Rom. vi. 7. "He that is dead, is freed from sin," also, verse 11, that he is "alive unto God." You see Paul helps you out of your confusion.

8 and 9. No; but yours seems to.

10 and 11. You stumble just where sprinklers do and quote 1 Pet. iii. 21, to prove that baptism saves from the filth of the flesh or sin, precisely what Peter says in the same verse it does not do; but it is the "answer [response] of a good conscience toward God." The conscience becomes good by faith and repentance before baptism. Baptism saves us as the flood did Noah and his family. Did they all go into the ark sinners and come out saints? Noah was a preacher of righteousness 120 years before his baptism, and Ham was wicked after his as he had been before. No change of character in their baptism, nor in ours.

12. Dr. Clark says on John iii. 5, "It is not necessary that by water and the spirit, (in this place,) we should understand two different things; it is probably only an elliptical form of speech for the Holy Spirit under the similitude of water." You needed an exception to "all scholars;" I have also known many intelligent brethren who did not feel sure that it refers to baptism. One at my side says, "If it does, why did not Jesus tell Nicodemus that he must be born again twice?" Faith and repentance are "deeds" in which one is "blessed;" and see John vi. 29.

I have carefully answered your twelve questions. I thank you for your frank letter. It would be no compliment to either of us to praise your kind bearing or boast of my own; any thing different from that would be a shame to men of our age and Christian experience. In conclusion.

1. Allow me to suggest the great impropriety of urging an inference, unsupported by positive statement, as a condition of salvation. John iii. 5, Rom. vi. 3, and Gal. iii. 27, can be abundantly honored without it, and spare violence to scores of other texts.

2. And to commend to you a thorough study of justification by faith in the New Testament, and especially in Romans, Galatians and Hebrews.

3. Baptism is most forcible and beautifully significant in the relation given it by the head of the church. We hurt it, and mar the system, and hinder the gospel by exalting or depressing it out of place—by shadowing other features by it or it by them. But all this you know and keenly feel. Praying that we may still grow in grace and knowledge, and help others in the same, to the glory of God, I am with great respect your brother In the blessed hope. O. R. L. C.

Protestantism in Spain has made wonderful progress. Senor Carrasco states that twelve years ago a New Testament was hardly allowed to enter the country, and fifteen years ago a little society having been formed for the simple reading of the Bible, its members were condemned to the galleys; but now even in Madrid there are five or six Protestant churches; and if Philip II., were to come back to life and hear the gospel preached at the very gates of his palace, where Protestants used to be burnt, and were to see people reading the Bible where he ordered it to be destroyed, what would he think of the change?

Rev. Dr. Fisch, of Paris, says that four million copies of the Scriptures have been sold in France; that all the young men in the army have been taught to read the Gospel of John, and that 500,000 young men know that gospel by heart; and that 100,000 soldiers driven into Protestant Switzerland during the late war, have returned to France, each with a New Testament and various religious tracts.

Truth is ever forbearing, courting inquiry, while error is ever overbearing and intolerant of investigation.

THE RESTITUTION signifies the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the restitution of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the future exaltation of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a literal belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life essential for final salvation.

Coming Age—Its Proximity—Fifth Period—Signs in the Social World—Christ's Prayer Applied—Social Element in the Apostolic Churches—In the Wilderness Church—Reformation Churches—In the Nineteenth Century Churches—Perversion of the Element.—No. 30.

J. P. WEETHEE.

In the world, but not of it,—hated by the world, because not of it.—What is the world? Christ, in his prayer, uses the word, κοσμος,—world, eighteen times. It means all people of every country not belonging to the Christian household;—all except Christians with their governments, institutions, occupations, and wealth. They belong to one household; Christians to another. The supremacy of the one in this age, that of the other in the coming age. The one is composed of a people, gathered out of this world, and, by their education, prepared for the coming age.

They are in the world, but not of it; and because not of it the world hates them.

Such, then, did Christ recognize to be the position of his household—the chaste virgin—the future bride—till his return to take her to himself. Their field of labor was the world. They were to occupy till he should return. Their labor in one age, and their affections in another—the future. Hence they were commanded, "Love not the world, neither the things of the world.

How was this social element improved in the Apostolic age?—They were a family within a family, yet wholly distinct. Such was their love for him that had been taken from them into heaven, that they were not satisfied only when in each other's society, talking of his sayings and doings, and speaking of his return. They went from house to house; were all of one accord in one place. They had all things common. They wanted no other entertainment. They were, for a time, fully satisfied with their own household (the church). No other society could draw off their affections. The congregation of believers, was their only law tribunal, to settle all difficulties. To it they looked for support when disabled, by physical infirmities. They submitted to the civil officers; paid tribute; prayed for them that they might be allowed to pass a quiet life.

Christians, in the apostolic age, formed a community of love; they had their feasts of love. In the midst of a world of enemies, Jews, Pagans, heathen philosophers, and civil rulers of the great empire, they carried out the royal commission, "Go teach all nations." Such was their active zeal, that the Gospel was heard through all parts of the empire. This was the golden age of Christianity. By this we mean that pure Christian practice was then popular in the Christian household.

It was popular not to be conformed to the world; not to be overcome of evil, but to overcome evil with good. If their enemy was hungry, it was popular to feed him. It was popular to work—to be diligent in business, and, at the same time, fervent in spirit; serving the Lord. It was then popular for Christians to carry on business in such a way, that God could be allowed to examine their book accounts, without producing the feeling of our first parents, on the Divine call, Adam, where art thou?

It was popular to read the Scriptures, to learn the will of God, in order to obey that will. It was their daily food. It was popular to attend the ordinances of the household.

Read what Christ said; read the epistles; also, if you want to know what doctrines and practices were then popular with the people of God.

Their tastes were after the standard of Christ and his inspired apostles. The popular crowd in the household were the the mes. devoted,—the most like their Master; the disorderly were the few and the unpopular.

It was popular then to be humble; for it put them near the Savior. Poverty was popular, also, for it made the greater contrast with their anticipated future.

We leave the reader to make his own list of things that were then unpopular; for, in so doing, he may see some things that may not suit his own practices.

Christian household in the wilderness.—It is moving in quite another sphere. An abode in the world some four centuries has made its mark on Christian professors. A noted change in their views of Bible topics,—in theory and practice. The conflict with the world has resulted in the conversion of the masses of the Christian family to its views.—Its maxims and customs. What has produced this wonderful revolution?

The causes can be clearly seen in the history of those times. They were conformed to the world, because they loved it. The crowd of the Christian family had become assimilated, in their views and practices, to the great masses of the empire. Their occupations, their places of amusement; their associations were similar. Their position fully entitled them to the name of, "Citizens of the world." While they attempted to serve God, they succeeded in being the most dutiful servants of Mammon.

The few that loved, and trembled at God's word, were despised and cast out of popular society. They were found among those that were then called heretics. They met in private and obscure places; they read God's word, attended to the ordinances of the Lord's house, and looked, as a loving spouse for the return of her Lord.

The contrast between the two classes in the Christian church was presented to John in two remarkable symbols:

1. "A" woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars.

2. Another "woman" sitting upon a scarlet colored wild beast with seven heads and ten horns. Her character is thus described:—She was arrayed in purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornications. And upon her forehead, a name written, Mystery, Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots, and abominations of the earth. Her character, acts, and judgment are fully described in Rev. xvii., xviii., and xix.

Both women symolize churches (Christian in name) that existed at the same time. The one is a Chaste Virgin; the other is a noted harlot. What made the sun-clad, star-crowned woman a pure virgin? She was reared such by her parents, Moses and the prophets (the moon), and Jesus and his inspired apostles (the sun and twelve stars). She had never deviated from their pure and holy teaching. She had lived in the world without contracting any of its vile habits. She was in the world but not of it; hated by the world because she hated the world.

How came her sister (of one family) to be such a prostitute? Vile company, as is usually the case. All nations were her lovers; for they drank of the wine of the wrath of her fornications, and the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies. Rev. xviii. 3. Read the entire chapter, and learn her character. She preferred the companionship of her lovers, rather than that of her virtuous sister.

Who can read her inspired history, without the convictions that her associations formed her character, and that her civil and social education was the chief agent of her apostacy. She had acquired a love for national power; and, consequently, forsook the more private life of virtue and obedience, for one of honor and social fawdness. She became a national church—the spouse (vile prostitute) of the nations.

Christian household in the days of the Reformation.—Was it then divested of its political and social elements? Was her character apostolic? Was it then divested of its political and social element? Did not the Lutheran reformation divide the nations? Since that day have not the nations been called Catholic and Protestant? What distinction exists in their civil and social credit? Protestantism reformed many doctrinal abuses, as to foreign elements (civil and social). She carried with her the features of the great mother church. They constituted a division in the family. They associated with the family of nations; and controlled them when practicable. If the mother church, when connected with, and controlling them was symbolized by a woman on a wild beast; the daughters, doing the same act, would require the same complex symbol. If association with the nations made the mother a harlot, the same act would stamp the same character upon her daughters. She is called a harlot, and is a mother; therefore, she is the "Mother of harlots."

The book of Revelations is either Divine or human. If it is human in the teachings, let us tear it out of our Bibles; but, if Divine, let us tremble at its word; let us give heed to its terrible denunciations.

Christian household of the nineteenth Century.—It is a fearful number we have made some general remarks on the political character, that the churches by birth or by incorporation, belong to the family of nations. We call attention to their Social Aspect; and by the term "social," we refer to an element not in the apostolic church, and not recognized in the writings of Jesus and his apostles. This element assumes a variety of features, and is called by many names. Christ, when speaking of our times (as we think) calls it δεσμας—bundles, from δεω —bundle. δεσμη ποιεω = δεσμας —bind them into bundles. Matt. xiii. 30. Those persons under the guidance of this element are named, Communists, Socialists, Nihilists. They have many other titles by which they are now designated. They are societies having a constitution and by-laws, under which members are initiated and by which they are governed. These organizations are usually bound to each other by very solemn oaths, and transact their business in secret. They are usually incorporated bodies, possessing all necessary civil power. Their membership is promiscuous. Members of Christ's family and citizens of the world stand on the same platform. Many of these societies have a form of Godliness, but do not require of their members, the power. Conversion is not required. They have chaplains, also. These officers may be selected from members of Christ's household, or from the family of Mammon, for they attempt to do what Christ said, "No man can do, Serve God and Mammon." Their laws are strict, and punctuality in attendance upon all stated duties, is required. Punctuality is the road to all honorary distinction. Meetings of the Christian household must give way to these. Even prayer meetings, these social nurseries, instituted by the Son of God, where Jesus meets with the two or three gathered in his name, must be neglected!!

Letter From T. Wilson, Formerly Editor of "The Restitution."

CHICAGO, Ill., Aug. 11, 1880.

Dear Brother:—

Yours received; was glad to hear from you. A letter from a party in Delaware, who has received and read "Prophetic Numbers," says: "The formation of history upon the basis of Christ's life is truly marvelous, and quite a new idea." I cannot as yet subscribe to the Advent idea that the darkening of the sun one hundred years ago was a fulfillment of our Lord's prophecy. My understanding of the text is, Matt. xxiv. 1. The darkening of the sun, 2. and of the moon, and 3. falling of the stars, coupled with perplexity and fear of men on seeing these and the terrible agitations on sea and land, are consequent on the shaking of the powers of heaven, and do not precede it. "Powers"—δυναμεις—evidently referring to the strength, ability, or governing power as manifested in the heretofore well-ordered laws of the heavens as related to the earth,—they are to be disturbed—shaken, agitated, rock, roll, toss, etc., from ... And the beginning of these disturbances we have witnessed for several years past, and they are continually being repeated in various parts of the earth, and in various ways, and will increase in frequency and magnitude. The sun, moon and stars are disturbed and the earth and sea also because the powers of the heavens are shaken. This is my present understanding of the text. Hence I believe the darkening of the sun, etc., is yet future.

Then again, these signs were to follow "immediately after the tribulation of those days;—that is, the tribulation beginning with the siege of Jerusalem and continued all through the time of captivity of the people and treading down of Jerusalem. Now it is certain that one hundred years ago this tribulation had not ended, and indeed it is not till recent times that we can reckon its cessation. The Turkish abomination is yet in Jerusalem, although great deliverances have been wrought both upon the people and their land. So that it could not be said to be after the tribulation until quite recently, and perhaps not in the full sense even yet. But we do see strong preparatory signs of its full end, and at the same time we see the beginning in earnest of disturbance in the heavens and consequent disastrous results in earth—but to my mind, these are but the beginning of troubles. After Jerusalem is fully delivered from the Mohammedan abomination, and full liberty is restored to the Jews—then look out for the rapid and terrible increase of these signs in the heavens and distress of the earth.

Again our Lord plainly declares that when these things begin to come to pass we may lift up our heads, for our redemption draweth nigh—the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. How nigh, Lord? "Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled,"—thus, to my mind, plainly teaching that the generation who are privileged with witnessing the beginning of these signs, will not pass away until all be fulfilled, or all other words, the beginning and end of these wondrous events—including the coming of the Lord in power and great glory—will be accomplished during the lifetime of one generation. If we assume that the darkening of the sun, one hundred years ago, was the beginning, it will be a difficult task to crowd all the events named into the lifetime of one generation, especially when many of them are still future. The average length of a generation is reckoned at thirty to forty years. Job xiii. 16.

So that taking all these evidences together I am constrained to believe that we are but entering upon the portals of that great building where we shall witness the grand display of Almighty power once more among the children of men—a display that will eclipse the terrible manifestations on Mount Sinai, and one that will strike terror into the stoutest hearts, and cause the knees of strong men to tremble with fear.

But I do not forget, dear brother, that after our Lord had presented this great scene of distress to his disciples for their understanding, he coupled with it an admonition to "Watch and pray always that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things, and to stand before the Son of Man." So that if we watch and pray, and are always ready for union with our absent Bridegroom when he may call us, then depend upon it, we shall escape all these tribulations, and instead of passing through them, we shall be in his blessed company, standing beside him. Thus will his Bride be privileged to hide herself for a little moment in the secret chambers, or pavilion of the Lord, while he comes forth to shake terribly the earth and punish its inhabitants for their sins. Isa. xxvi. 20, 21.

Our Lord notes the distinction between his disciples and worldlings in his great prophecy, Luke xxi. To his disciples he says, "When ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand;" but of worldlings he says, "Then shall they see the Son of Man coming," etc. Note that he does not say, "Ye shall see the Son of Man coming," etc. Why? Because when the Lord comes in a cloud with great power and glory, he will come "with ten thousand of his saints." Jude 14. The saints, or Bride of Christ, will have been previously gathered to her Lord in the air, and as Isaac conducted Rebecca (having met her on the way) to his father's tent, or house, so Jesus will conduct his Bride to his Father's house, for a season at least, until the time comes for him to enter upon the administration of the affairs of his kingdom on the earth, when with him she will also enter into the fulness of the great reward in store for her. Blessed day, soon may it come!

I believe, therefore, that at about the beginning of the signs referred to, the Bride will be gathered to her Lord; then the signs will appear one after another, resulting in a time of trouble such as the world never experienced; but that the church—the "accounted worthy" ones—will be absent with the Lord during this distressful season; then at a great crisis in Israel's affairs, Jesus and the Bride will descend in great power and glory, and be seen by every eye. Verily the gathering time is very near. Who is surely ready?

THOMAS WILSON.

Nazareth.

Travelers in the East can scarcely find language glowing enough to depict the loveliness of the scenery by which Nazareth is surrounded. Up a cleft in the hills which form the northern limit of the wide-stretching plain of Jezreel, a steep, and narrow pathway, bordered with grass and flowers, leads into a little valley. Its breadth is not more than a quarter of a mile, and its basin is divided by hedges of cactus into small fields and gardens, which, at the time of the spring rains, wear an aspect of indescribable calm, and glow with a tint of the richest green. Gradually the valley opens into a little natural amphitheater of hills, and there, clinging to the hollows of a hill which rises to the height of some five hundred feet above it, lie, like a handful of pearls in a goblet of emerald, the flat-roofed white houses, of a little Eastern town, huddled close together and gleaming in the sunlight.

And such as it is to-day, with but slight exceptions, must have been the aspect of that little Eastern town centuries ago, when it was the home of the incarnate Son of God, the Savior of mankind. Often must the feet of Jesus have stood upon the hill on which Nazareth is built. Often must his eyes have rested upon the view which there greets the delighted traveler's gaze—a view not only remarkable, on account of the central position of the spot, for its wide sweep and varied beauty, but replete on every side with the charm of ancient story. Carmel, the scene of Elijah's triumph over the priests of Baal; Tabor, down the slope of which Barak, inspired by Deborah's ringing words, had swooped upon Sisera; the plain where Gideon smote the Midianites, and where the beloved Joshua met his death; the highland of Gilboa, along which Saul fled before the Philistines—amid sights and memories like these, Jesus in the remote Galilean village grew up to the prime of manhood. The calm, untroubled seclusion of the happy valley, with its green cornfields and glorious scenery, was eminently conducive of a life of spiritual communion. And it needs no strong imagination to behold him, in accordance with what was so often his habit in after years, retiring frequently from the haunts of men, to find on the hilltop, communion with his Father and his God. The summits of these heights around the vale of Nazareth are consecrated spots.

The golden moments in the stream of life rush past us, and we see nothing but sand; the angels come to visit us and we only know them when they are gone.

SENTENTIOUS PARAGRAPHS.

The world's best history is but the record of faith and its triumphs.

The sweetest companion a man can have, is a holy, watchful, tender conscience.

No books are so legible as the lives of men; no characters so plain as their moral conduct.

If the disposition is good, the acts will be so too, though a man may not be able to do as he desires.

Friendship is no plant of hasty growth;
Though planted in esteem's deep fixed soil,
The gradual culture of kind intercourse
Must bring it to perfection.
—Joanna Baillie.

As the sweetest wine is the fruit of the press, so are men's noblest deeds often the result of weighty responsibilities keenly felt.

Faith grows by expression, not by repression. "I believed, therefore have I spoken." If you believe in Christ as your Savior, confess him before men. He will confess you before angels. He can better do without your confession than you can do without his.

To commit one's self to what is right is a great step forward. Then right-doing becomes easy, which before was difficult. These are the steps upward in life. Many people refuse to join some association for doing good because they do not like to promise what they may not be able to perform. But to commit themselves will often help them to perform what they undertake to do. We unite with those who are wishing to do good things, and we find ourselves in a current which carries us forward in the right direction.—J. F. Clarke.

Lands mortgaged may return, and more esteemed;
But honestly, once pawned, is ne'er redeemed.
—Thomas Middleton.

Be indifferent to nothing which has any relation to the welfare of men. Be not afraid of diminishing your own happiness, by seeking that of others. Devise liberal things, and let not avarice shut up your hand from giving to him that needeth, and to promote the cause of piety and humanity.—Archibald Alexander.

It is not until we have passed through the furnace that we are made to know how much dross was in our composition.

For me—fall my fortune as it may—
A comfort and a strength it is to know
That wheresoe'er I go
There is the same heaven over me on high,
Wherein to fix the steady eye;
The same access for prayer,
The same God, always present everywhere;
And if no home, yet everywhere the bed
Which earth makes ready for the weary head.
—Robert Southy.

A sinning world knows the difference between piety and profession. The most godless man that lives respects piety wherever he finds it. The worst infidel finds in the lives of the truly pious an argument that he can never successfully gainsay or resist. The most blatant atheist is dumb in the presence of the triumphant death of the pious believer. Simple, heart piety is mightier to persuade a scoffing multitude than all the eloquence of scholarly divines.—Christian Standard.

With cheerful feet thy path of duty run;
God nothing wills, nor suffers to be done,
But what thou wouldst, thyself, could thou but see
Through all events of things as well as He.

So through the years that come, the years that go,
May I desire more fully thee to know,
And, loving mankind here,
Serve thee with godly fear,
Fearing not death, a shadow of the night,
Since thou art Life and Light,
The strong tides of whose love unending flow.

He alone by whom the hairs of our head are all numbered, can count the widows who are widows because of drink; the madmen who are mad because of it; the gray heads that it has made gray; the sad hearts that it has crushed with sadness; the ruined families that it has ruined; the brilliant minds which it has quenched; the unfolding promise which it has cankered; the bright and happy boys and girls whom it has blasted into shame and misery; the young and the gifted which it has hurried along into dishonored and nameless graves.—Canon Farrar.

SOMETIME.

Sometime, in the beautiful future,
When the lessons of life are all learned,
And we turn from the school by the wayside,
Each wearing the laurels we've earned,
We shall know why, when toiling and striving,
The Master withheld from our grasp
The things which we strove for the hardest,
Those toys which we longed most to clasp.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, AUG. 18, 1880.

A Newspaper From Jerusalem.

The following line from Bro. H. V. Reed will explain how we came into the possession of a paper recently from the City of the Great King:

"Bro. Chaplin:—I have sent to your address to-day a copy of a Hebrew paper at Jerusalem. I know that you will highly prize it, as it comes from the Jewish press in the Holy City. I obtained it with two other copies from an old Rabbi here. The sign is in the Holy Land are very marked, and Jewish restoration is going on as rapidly as it did in the days of Babylonish captivity. It seems that the old city is now able to publish newspapers, has schools and synagogues (18) and only wants time to make it the 'joy of the whole earth.' Your brother waiting and watching." H. V. R.

We are truly thankful to Bro. Reed for this favor. A paper printed in the vernacular of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; the language of Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms—printed where Jesus himself "Spake as never man spake," comes to us the herald of approaching restitution.

The name, or title, of the paper, printed in large, beautiful Hebrew characters is חכצלה. This word occurs only twice in the Old Testament Hebrew—Cant. ii. 1; and Isa. xxxv. 1; and is rendered "rose" each time in the authorized version. Its subordinate title is כבשרת ציון which means literally "Messenger of glad tidings to Zion." Let us see the title of this paper in bold English:

THE ROSE.

The Herald of Glad Tidings to Zion.

This title is little less than prophetic. The number that has come to us contains eight pages and is printed in the unvoweled, or unpointed Hebrew. Its date is Jerusalem, 29 April, 5640. This corresponds, according to this paper, if we interpret the Hebrew correctly, with the 18th of the month Iyar according to the Jewish reckoning.

Gentile times are nearly fulfilled. This dispensation is very near its close. The chosen tribes will soon gather back to the land of promise, and the Messiah will be their Sovereign King seated upon David's throne. We hope to have something more to interest our readers soon in regard to that land. We, for our own part, feel far more interest in the fulfillment of prophecy than in fruitless controversy. Let us drop the discussion of some backneyed themes for awhile, and attend more to the great theme of the Lord's soon coming and the requisite preparation to be found of him in peace.

THE American Newspaper Directory for 1880, published by Messrs. George P. Rowell & Co., New York, has been duly received. More than five hundred pages are given to a list of papers published in the United States and Territories, the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland, with a brief account of the places where the periodicals are published. The remaining pages are filled with fuller advertisements of the more important journals. It is a handsome volume of 1044 pages in all, and contains a detailed list of 10,978 newspapers and magazines. It must have cost the publishers an immense amount of labor to collect and arrange the vast fund of information contained in this Encyclopaedia of Periodicals. Numerous testimonials place its accuracy beyond doubt, and to general advertisers it must be indispensible.

COMMUNICATIONS.

The Spirit of Prayer.

Nothing is more essential to true worship than a right perception of the relation in which Jehovah stands to the worshipper. The disparity between the creature and the Creator is infinitely great, and intercourse between the parties can only be conducted on terms specified by the Almighty himself; the man who neglects these terms and attempts to worship God in a manner different from what God appoints, not only attempts what is impossible, but also, justly, incurs the Divine displeasure. This is true of men in their relation to God as creatures and no less true in their relation to him as fallen creatures.

But not only does intercourse between God and man imply that it can be carried on only on terms specified by the Holy One himself, it also implies that the worshippers draw near being worshipped in a proper frame of mind—with feelings becoming the awful solemnity and importance of the occasion. Such feelings can only be maintained by the understanding and remembering of the position which Jehovah assumes while listening to the praises or supplications of his people. And what is that position? Is it the position of "incomprehensible Deity?" Does he hold intercourse with the fallen sons of earth in the position of the great and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords? Or do the people of God, while presenting their petitions before him, require to view him in all the matchless glory and majesty of his supreme and regal power? Ah! if it were such the case, how should we—atoms of the lower creation—come before the Almighty? The very thought of such a meeting would so affect with terror and confusion as effectually annihilate all power of utterance, yea completely prevent any approach between us and the Almighty. Prohibited by God—we are taught to regard him with feelings, not of terror, but of confidence and love—and to address him as our "Father in heaven!"

It is by forgetting this fact that a certain class of professors in the present error of the most subversive character. They imagine that, in order to pray acceptably, they must, in spirit, enter the high heavens, and, in full view of the celestial throne, around which the seraphim, with veiled faces, cease not to cry one to another, "Holy! holy! holy! is the Lord of Hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory," and therefore, send their petitions before enthroned Deity. These devotional enthusiasts think they have only prayed acceptably when they have obtained some undefinable and mystic view of the invisible God, and their great end in prayer is not so much to have their requests granted as to have their feelings excited; and when such sensations fail to be produced, they sink down in despondency and sullenness, complaining that the Lord has hid his face.

The class of persons we just attempted to describe are more numerous than may be supposed, and, although the error does not always take such a definite form. All attempts to form adequate notions of "the invisible God" must prove fruitless and vain. The distance between Him and the highest orders of his creatures is, necessarily, great beyond comprehension. How much farther removed are we, who "are of yesterday and know nothing"—nothing, comparatively, of the appearances around us and contemporary with ourselves—much less of the "things unseen!" Jehovah has drawn an impenetrable veil between us and the glories of the upper sanctuary; and all attempts to pierce that veil are not only fruitless, but tend more than ever to obscure our vision. Any one who, for a few moments tries to form an idea of the duration, immensity, or power of the Deity, shall find his notions of the Infinite more dark and confused than before; and, should he continue the pursuit, speedily find himself lost in the transcendant glories of "light ineffable." God has indeed favored us with some manifestations of his glorious Majesty, but these are only mere, and occasional glimpses; and every light they cast in our minds regarding the glory of Jehovah, only discovers to us our own insignificance, and the impassable distance between us and the being we adore. It is then evident that all such attempts to hold communion with God fail of success. That all such wild and extravagant speculations, instead of bringing the mind nearer to him, only distract it, and carry it away from the true object of worship to the vanity of its own wild imaginings. It is, perhaps, for this reason that God has fixed the scene of our worship on earth, amid terrestrial objects. He graciously condescends to place himself within the sphere of human affections. He does not require us, in our present state, even in spirit, to enter "the place where his honor dwelleth" and there present our petitions, but hiding from our sight the glories of the upper sanctuary. He, in his infinite condescension, "dwells as a Father in the homes of earth."

But not only does the devout worshipper of God not require to ascend to the regions of spirituality and celestial light in order to hold communion with his God, inasmuch as his Maker comes down to him; but he must himself take the most humble chamber. It is not with men of high station that Jehovah deigns to dwell; it is only with the "humble and contrite." It is not as sages and philosophers that the people of God pour out their hearts' desires to their "Father in heaven," but as poor and needy beings, entirely dependent upon him for every blessing they possess. If Jehovah stoop to hear their petition with a father's ear, they must approach him with the helplessness and simplicity of children.

So far, then, is it from being requisite for acceptable worshippers to ascend from their low condition, and, as it were, meet God half way. They must, themselves, come down to the place of the humbled. The man, therefore, who attempts to soar above the range of human feelings and enter in contemplation the vagueness of upper space is gone in imaginations where God is not; at least, where he should never meet him.

Again, the Lord not only condescends to listen to his people as a Father hears the desire of his children, but authorizes them to address him as if he possessed like feelings with themselves to tell him their wants in their common language, and plead before him some relation he has to them by the ties of human sympathy. And, not only so, but to tell him their wants with the most earnestness; yea to plead with him, and reply to him with importunity, as one who required to be influenced by argument. That this is the case is evident from the instance of acceptable prayer recorded for our benefit and example in the Holy Scriptures. We have a striking instance of this recorded in Exodus xxxii. 11-14. The children of Israel had grievously offended the Lord who had but recently delivered them from the bondage of Pharaoh. In the absence of Moses they had made for themselves a molten calf of gold, and paid to it the homage due to God alone, and, on account of their rebellion, God had threatened to consume them. To arrest the threatened wrath, Moses thus intercedes: "Lord, why doth thy wrath wax hot against thy people which thou hast brought out of the land of Egypt with great power and a mighty hand? Wherefore should the Egyptians speak and say, for mischief did he bring them out to slay them in the mountains and consume them from the face of the earth? Turn thou away thy fierce wrath, and repent of this evil against thy people. Remember Abraham Isaac and Israel, thy servants, to whom thou swarest by thine own self, and saidst unto them, I will multiply your seed as the stars of heaven, and all this land will I give unto your seed, and they shall inherit it forever. And the Lord repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people."

It is, then, plain that the worship of God is altogether adapted to the nature of the worshipper—the creature is not required to adapt itself to the Creator but the Creator, O wonderful love; stoops to the humble condition of the creature. The conduct of Jehovah to those who worship him instead of countenancing the vague and wild notions of dreamy enthusiasts who seek to worship God in a manner above and foreign to their nature, tends rather to lay like their ideas, and confine their devout affections to the circle of earthly associations. Such, also, is the tendency of the dispensations of the Divine Providence toward the pious. The godly man is often exposed to continued and severe toils; subject to disease, want, sorrow, and calamities of various kinds, and, wherefore, are such events allowed to happen to him if not to remind him that he is still of "the earth, earthy,"—the creature of animal instincts and laws; and that, as such, he must seek relief at the throne of grace? If, at any time, the child of God forgets that he inhabits a "body of death," and is still subject to the calamities of the present life, and allows himself speculations to carry him away from the true realities of the present scene some calamitous incident, some urgent want, some bodily care, or evil pain soon awakens him from his idle dream, and sends him to his knees, and leads him to speak as he feels to his "Father who seeth in secret," and who "knows what things he has need of before he asks them."

Some minds, on the other hand, err in a contrary direction, abusing the Divine condescension by an irreverent mode of addressing their petitions to the supreme Jehovah. We have often been shocked and disgusted at the familiarity and irreverence manifested by such persons while addressing the Most High. They appeared to have forgotten that, though Jehovah condescends to listen to his people's prayers, and admit them to his presence, on terms of friendship—it is only in the character of suppliants, not of companions; it is only for the purpose of hearing their requests, not that he might gratify their talkative propensities. Such indecorous petitions justly incur the complaint, "Thou thoughtest I was altogether such an one as thyself." The conditions on which acceptable prayer is presented, while encouraging the utmost freedom and confidence in the suppliant, give no countenance whatever to an irreverent, business-like familiarity; but, on the contrary, tend to fill the mind of the petitioner with feelings of the deepest self-abasement, and the profoundest reverence towards the Most High. To see this we have only to reflect, that the medium of approach to the "throne of grace" is by a Mediator. "No man," says Jesus, "cometh unto the Father but by me." It is in the name of Christ that all our petitions are to be presented—It is for his sake alone, any hearing can be received by us. From all this it naturally follows that, while the believer is encouraged to draw near in the full assurance of faith," he is at the same time kept in remembrance of his own worthlessness and vileness; and the only feelings which can occupy his mind regarding himself, are those of shame, guilt, and contrition. If he needs a sacrifice, then he is a sinner—an offender against the being whose favor he supplicates. If he can only obtain favors in the name of Christ, then, he is himself, destitute of all merit and claim on the Divine goodness; he stands a beggar at the fountain of blessings; a beggar! nay, not so high, but a criminal in the sight of God, and begs for mercy in the name of another. True delightfully true—his offended sovereign has laid aside his regal robes and condescends to listen to his prayers with a father's ear, but so far as the Divine condescension from filling him with high thoughts of himself it rather deepens his shame, for there he sees his sin contrasted with the transcendant benignity of his Father's love.

The true spirit of prayer is thus at utter variance with that of the visionary enthusiast, who affects to meet God in the air, and worship him with the feelings not of a human, but of an angelic nature, and alike opposed to the irreverent familiarity of common companionship. It is, in a word, a spirit of artless, child-like simplicity and earnestness; united with self-abasement, shame, contrition, love, joy, gratitude, affectionate obedience, and reverential awe.

Thus saith the High and Lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy. I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, and revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones.

Our Motto for 1880.

And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness.

We have been feeling the comfort and force of this passage for months. Looking out on the hosts of error, seeing them massed in conscious strength, against the feeble bands who hold the truth, it would seem to the eye of the natural man, as if the battle were a desperate one and impossible to win, but as it was with the prophet and his servant, we see the hidden legions of the Lord, and say "they that be with us, are more than they that be with them." God is on our side, because we have his truth. Feeble, though our hands may be; lacking, as we are in the riches of this world, our voices faint, and wanting in eloquence, yet the Lord is our strength, we will not falter, nor give up. We dare not sit idly down, because we can do but little. We feel our own utter weakness and insufficiency for these things, as it is not possible for any one else to feel them, yet we must and will go on, because God's strength is made perfect in our weakness. It will be all the more glory to him if some are saved through our instrumentality. We shall not be tempted boast, nor to to glory in ourselves, but in him alone. Pray for us.

NEWS ITEMS.

LONDON, August 14.—A Berlin dispatch reports fresh floods in several districts in Upper Silesia, causing enormous damage.

BERLIN, Aug. 13.—The harvest prospects in Upper Silesia and east Prussia are very gloomy.

LONDON, August 14.—The following is the verbatim copy of the dispatch received by the Daily News from its correspondent at St. Petersburg last night: "I have grave reason to believe that Ayoob Khan has been acting in concert with and been assisted by Abdurrahman Khan and that the worst suspicions are not without some foundation. I would assuredly not send such disconcerting intelligence except on the most serious grounds." The expression, "worst suspicions" is interpreted to refer to Russian intrigues, or possibly to rumors of actual Russian co-operation with Ayoob Khan.

LONDON, August 14.—A St. Petersburg correspondent has grave reason to believe that Ayoob Khan is acting in concert with and has been assisted by the present Ameer.

The Standard has the following from Quetlah: "Fresh native reports state that Ayoob Khan still intends to attack Candahar. His hesitation to attack does not arise in disbelief of his capacity, but because he is uncertain whether to attack by Kandahar or Cabul and Ghuznee.

LONDON, August 14.—According to reports from Bucharest, 45,000 Russians are concentrating near Border, to be ready in the event of action of Bulgaria. The augmentation of military forces, horses, commissary stores, and troops is continually going on near the Roumanian frontier. A steamer has arrived at Galatz, with Russian artillery and ambulances, destined for Bulgaria. It is also stated that the Russians are concentrating at Reni, on the Austrian frontier. TROUBLE WITH BULGARIA EXPECTED. LONDON, Aug. 14.—A Bucharest correspondent says the Bulgarians positively refuse to cede Arab Tabia to Roumania, and that there are large armed bands of Bulgarians in the vicinity. Roumania has taken measures to occupy the position immediately on receipt of the notification of the Powers.

In the district of Bolbor, Germany, more than twenty villages have been destroyed by floods, and a loss of many millions of marks has been entailed by the total destruction of the harvest. Four hundred and eighty square miles are under water in Silesia.

A despatch from Cabul says: General Roberts' exact force for the relief of Candahar is 9,986 Europeans, 7,750 natives, and camp followers. Gen. Roberts says he is confident of the successful accomplishment of his plans.

SELECTIONS.

Prophecies Concerning Israel, their Land and King, not yet Fulfilled.

Note.—The literal fulfillment of prophecies in the past is a guarantee of the future literal accomplishment of unfulfilled prophecies. In most cases, indeed, any other than a literal fulfillment of the prophecy is an impossibility; they who attempt to spiritualize the words of the Spirit lamentably fail. Take, for example, the nine last chapters of Ezekiel, which contains what he saw in vision when a captive in Babylon, viz.:

"In the visions of God" he was brought into the land of Israel, and set upon "a very high mountain, upon which was as the frame of a city on the south;" and there, in spirit he saw and subsequently wrote so minute a description of a temple, or house of God, and its porch, courts, gates, altar, tables and paraphernalia, that a model of it has been constructed. When completed he saw it filled with Jehovah's glory, as was Solomon's at its inauguration, (2 Chron. vii. 1) and heard "the man" who had shewn him the house and measured its various parts say to him: "Son of Man, the place of my throne, and the place of the soles of my feet, where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel forever," etc. xliii. 7.

And again, "This is the law of the house; upon the top of the mountain the whole limit round about shall be most holy. etc." Shewing that the whole top of the mountain on which this future house of God shall be erected will be as sacred as was that part of the tabernacle which was "within the vail," where only Israel's high priest dared enter, and that once a year, and then not without blood; (Heb. ix. 7) for on these occasions the Lord appeared in the cloud upon the mercy seat. Lev. xvi. 2. So in the future, "when the Lord builds up Zion and appears in his glory," as foretold in Psa. cii. 16, his glory shall cover the whole top of the mountain, and there "be seen" (Isa. lx. 2) and be for "a covering," a "tabernacle" for a shadow in the daytime from the heat, and for a covert from storm and from rain." Isa. iv. 5, 6.

These things are very wonderful to contemplate among "the glorious things which are spoken of Zion," (Psa. lxxxvii. 3) yet they are but a repetition, on a grand scale, of what Israel of old saw on Sinai and in the wilderness. Such prophetical expressions as, "the glorious holy mountain;" (Dan. xi. 45) "the mountain of the house of the Lord;" (Mic. iv.) "the hill of God," (Psa. lxviii. 15) all point to that one locality in Palestine, which God hath chosen and determined to glorify as his dwelling place on earth, when his throne and sanctuary and tabernacle shall be with Israel for ever; (Psa. cxxxii.; Ezek. xxxvii. 26, 28;) and it is a serious mistake to otherwise understand them. That the true church of God, individually and collectively, has been, is, and will be when completed and glorified, the temple of God, a habitation of God through the Spirit; (1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; Eph. ii. 19, 22; Rev. iii. 12,) also, that Christ, at his coming, will raise up from among the dead and change from among the living every individual who shall have a place in that spiritual glorious house, of which He is the "chief corner-stone, elect, precious," (1 Pet. ii. 6) is God's truth; but not more so than that the temple which Ezekiel describes shall be built in the land of Israel, and that Jehovah's glory shall be there revealed. There is no contradiction between the temples of the prophets and the temple of the apostles; each has its appointed place in the divine purpose; as much as the redeemed out of every nation who constitute the one body of Christ, and the redeemed remnant of Israel, who shall become a strong nation in God's time.

Let Bible readers take heed how they fall into the error of the Jews, who see Christ glorified in Zion, but do not behold the Lamb of God. Let us see both, and not be "fools," and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken. The Lord shall reign in Mount Zion gloriously (Isa. xxxv. 2) as surely as he rode into Jerusalem upon an ass. Gentile no more than Jewish unbelief "will not make the faith of God without effect." Rom. iii. 3.

The word of the Lord endureth for ever, and no man ever believed and trusted in it in vain. Messiah's "rest shall be glorious," as Isa. xi. 10, foretells; let us believe in it, and labor to enter into it, as Heb. iv. 3, 11, exhorts. With glory and honor, power and dominion, shall they have who shall be enthroned with Jehovah's Anointed in that day! Reigning gloriously on Mount Zion and Jerusalem over Israel restored and blessed, and over all the nations that survive the great and dreadful day of the Lord, of which all the prophets speak.

Whoever would know the full purport of New Testament references to Christ's future kingdom and glory, which his joint heirs are to inherit with eternal life, (for example, Matt. xix. 28-28; xx. 20-23; John xvii. 24; Acts xiv. 22; 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10; Gal. v. 21; 2 Tim. ii. 10-12; 1 Pet. i. 4-6; iv. 13; v. 1, 4, 10; 2 Pet. i. 10, 11; Rev. v. 9, 10,) must study the prophetic Scriptures, as 2 Pet. i. 19, iii. 2, exhorts Christians to do. Only thus can such a knowledge of the kingdom to come, and the glory to be revealed, be attained, as will enable us to emulate the faith and walk and spirit of the primitive disciples, who suffered the loss of all things, even their life, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus; and accounted their afflictions "light," in view of the exceeding and eternal "weight of glory" to which these trials of their faith were the necessary prelude, "If we suffer with Christ," they said, "we shall also reign with him." That faith nerved them to "fight the fight of faith," "take joyful the spoiling of their goods," and live godly, righteous, and sober lives, looking for that blessed hope, eternal life, and the appearing of the glory of the great God and their Savior Jesus Christ. Titus ii. 12, 13.

In my next letter, the future division of the land of Israel, as described by Ezekiel, will be considered.—Omega.

BREVITIES.

Eugenie visited Napoleon's Malmaison at St. Helena. Longwood House, originally a farm belonging to the East India Company, and prior to its being Napoleon's prison the residence of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Island, has suffered so much degradation, dilapidation, and so many vicissitudes that it bears not the slightest resemblance to its former self. The drawing room, the dining room, the bath room, of the ex-Emperor have been by turns converted into stables and granaries, into barns and threshing floors. It was neither water tight nor wind proof in Napoleon's time, and what remains of it is a veritable cave of the winds.

The Russian newspapers report that much mischief is being done to the crops in southern Russia by locusts and other insect pests. In the district of Rasachs 5,000 men were daily employed in the work of extirpation. On the railway from Tiflis to Poti the locusts lay so thick on the line that the trains were obstructed. The steppes of the Don have been swept bare of all vegetation, as if a fire had passed over the land. Fourteen companies of soldiers are employed in the Odessa district in destroying these insect plagues. The mischief is not confined to the south; swarms of locusts have been observed also in the northern governments. A huge swarm passed by Moscow in the middle of June at an elevation of from seventy to one hundred feet.

Earthquakes in Manila, the capital of the Philippine Islands, have caused the death of eleven people and serious injury to fifty others. The last of the series occured on Wednesday, July 21. Not a single public edifice is spared. The Guadeloupe convent, which has lasted three centuries, was destroyed, but no lives were lost. The inhabitants are encamped outside the town. The earth opened in several places, and jets of boiling water and showers of ashes were ejected from the fissures. The cathedral and the barracks fell in, and the troops encamped outside the city. Manilla suffered severely from an earthquake in 1863, when the Governor General's palace, the cathedral, and several churches were destroyed, and two thousand lives were lost.

POETRY.

In His Vineyard.

There is never a way so narrow or short,
But the Master's work is there;
There is something to do for His dear sake,
Or something to calmly bear.

There are trials to meet with Christian faith,
Zion, and duties with Christian grace;
And there's Christian sweetness to every one,
To be given in every place.

Their working days are never so hard
Who find in Christ a stay,
And the days of darkness are days of light,
When Jesus leads the way.

And the waiting days of those who hope,
Are days of quietness:
And the praying days to those who trust,
Are days of perfect peace.

There are flowers down in the valley low,
And over the mountain side,
Which were never praised by a human voice,
Nor by human eyes descried,

Yet as sweet as the breath of the royal rose,
In the garden they ravish;
And who they bloom and where they bloom,
The good Lord knoweth well.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Editor Restitution:—I have frequently seen in periodicals setting forth Scriptural information long articles in proof of different theories, many such articles containing a large amount of irrelevant matter, and, in some instances, disproving, in a few lines, all that the writer attempted to prove in four or five columns; and, not very unfrequently, that amount of writing is intended to set aside some plain, positive, fundamental doctrine of the Bible, especially of the New Testament, taught and appointed by Jesus as a guide to his followers during the existence of the gospel dispensation. Upon none of these instructions, however, has there been more written, nor a greater "Babel" of opinions entertained, than upon the proper mode of entrance into the church of God, which ought to be "the pillar and ground of truth," and no opinion of man, or body of men, should be introduced as a different mode of entrance to that appointed by Jesus in his great commission. Matt. xxviii. 19; Mark xvi. 16. Any other mode of entrance was appointed by some one else, never by Jesus.

This mode is laid down as plainly as words can make it, and need not be mistaken, unless led astray by a false translation; and, in such a case, would be unintentional on the part of some who might not be able to detect the error, but others who know the original, are without any excuse whatever, and should teach those who do not know, according to the language of the commission in Matt. xxviii. 19, "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, Immersing them into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." In this single verse, as it reads in the popular version, there are at least two false translations—"baptizing" and "Ghost." The first is not translated at all. The long, or double o, is detached from the Greek word baptizo, and an e substituted, placing it in its present form baptize, which word is made to do duty in every case, let the difference of opinion in other things be what they may. The second word—"ghost"—cannot be produced by translation from any word in the Greek Testament. It is only a corruption of the word Gust, as the spirit descended at Pentecost like a rushing, mighty mind, etc. The Greek word is, agion pneumatos,—Holy Spirit. Acts ii. 2; and so it is in Acts ii. 4, and should be "spirit" all through.

Any one who is in the habit of reading religious literature must be aware that those who ignore immersion, employ whatever talent they may happen to possess, in attempting to prove that it is unnecessary, in order to constitute what they call Christian baptism, although they sprinkle a little water upon those who know nothing whatever concerning Christianity. What does a baby of the age of one week to one year old know about Christianity? Absolutely nothing. Still, how many such receive so-called Christian baptism? With those, however, we have nothing to do, only to bear our testimony that any other mode than immersion is positively unscriptural, therefore, useless, if not an insult to Jesus. And it remains yet to be proved whether any deviation will be allowed by Jesus. From his own special appointment, the only rule which he has ever laid down on the subject, which I take to be as unchangeable as himself. Any omission or alteration of a single item of the appointments of Jehovah, under a former dispensation, would have cost a man his life; and Jesus now possesses the same power. Matt. xxviii. 18. And it remains yet to be seen how disobedience will be treated.

How can any one, organizing a church different to the appointment in Matt. xxviii. 19, shew their claim to be acknowledged followers of Jesus? whatever amount of so-called piety they might possess, as they must surely consider their mode better than his, and should be prepared to prove it so. When Saul was sent to destroy Amalek he was commanded to do it utterly. 1 Sam. xv. 3. But he imagined that he performed a very pious work when he spared the best of the oxen and fattlings "to sacrifice to the Lord;" but Samuel's answer is a standing warning against disobedience. "Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, ...for stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry. Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, he hath rejected thee from being king over Israel." 1 Sam. xv. 22, 23. But many say they cannot see immersion. Can they see to believe? If they can see the one, they can see the other. They are both in the same verse, and both spoken in the same breath, and both of equal authority.

Some time ago I saw a long article of about five colums, one column and a half of which contained a large number of Scripture quotations in proof of a certain theory, which, if carried out, would separate duties which ought always to go hand in hand, and, doing so, would, in a large degree be criminal, and should not be encouraged. If I read it aright, it would separate the two primary commands of Jesus, who joins them both together. About forty of the quotations are altogther irrelevant to the subject, being spoken previous to the issue of the commission, and to a people in totally different circumstances, i. e., to Jews who had received John's immersion, which required and directed them to believe in Jesus, hence so much spoken about faith alone, and are totally inapplicable to Gentiles after the issue of the commission. I think any intelligent professor should be able to see the difference. Ergo, this large number of quotations prove nothing on this point. Still they answer to swell the number and make it formidable. The remainder of the total given are mere evasions at the very best. The writer does not quote Acts ii. 28, where the gift of the Holy Spirit is predicated, partly, if not wholly, upon immersion, even to them who had received John's immersion; and there was not a word spoken to that large number concerning faith. Of course they were believers in Jesus or Peter would not have immersed them, but the whole transaction proves that no undue influence was given to faith alone, without its accompaniment, immersion. This was enjoined upon every one of them. Not one exception. This was according to the requirement of the commission, where both were joined by Jesus, and never should be separated by any creature professing to be his true follower. Neither is Acts viii. 35, 36, 38, quoted. Here, also, there is not a word spoken of faith, as the 37th verse is acknowledged by the best critics to be spurious. At the same time, I repent that, if the eunuch had not the faith required by the instructions of Jesus, Philip would not have immersed him. It may be seen, also, in the twelfth verse of this chapter, in the case of the Samaritans, that faith and immersion are united, the one immediately following the other, as they do in every case of true obedience.

The writer commences at Acts x. 43, but cunningly avoids the 47th and 48th verses, which would destroy his theory. Peter would not ignore immersion upon this occasion, although the parties had received the extra gifts of the spirit, and his conduct, on this point, is a standing proof of the necessity of immersion, although these converts had been favored as highly as those on the day of Pentecost, and proves, also, that neither faith nor immersion, singly, or alone, is sufficient to place a candidate in Jesus Christ. It requires that they be united, as Jesus has placed them, to constitute male or female a true follower of Jesus, and, at the same time, shows the truth of the language of Jesus. John iii. 5: "Except a man be born out of water and spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God." I say to all whom it may concern, that professors make light of, or reject immersion at their peril. What Jesus has joined, let no man dare to separate.

Neither is Acts ix. 18, quoted. In it there is nothing said concerning faith; but, upon Paul's eyes being opened, he at once "arose and was immersed." But no one would suppose for a moment that Paul was an unbeliever. Acts xvi. has not been quoted, though containing two notable cases—that of Lydia and her household,—and not anything spoken about faith. But, who will say that Paul would have immersed them without faith? The case of the jailor was one requiring faith, but nothing is spoken to him about immersion; but still he was immersed the same hour, even at midnight. Nor does the writer notice Acts xviii. 8. Here, faith and immersion were united also. In Acts xix. 5, the case of the Ephesian disciples being immersed, is not fairly noticed, although they had received John's immersion, were again immersed according to the commission. In Acts xxii, the case of Paul's conversion is repeated, and his immersion noted minutely, as if the account of his conversion, wonderful as it was in itself, would be incomplete without it. Here are a dozen of cases, including the language of the commission, where it is shown that immersion is just as necessary to place a candidate in Christ as faith. And it is no improper stretch of the imagination to believe that, in every case after the issue of the commission they were united; but this writer can find only two.

The whole question on this point, however, is in a nut-shell, did Jesus appoint immersion? He did. Did he join faith and immersion together? Unquestionably, he did, in his commission. Then, how dare any professed followers of Jesus separate them? Another question, is it right and safe to obey Jesus? I think all professors would answer, yes. Is it right or safe to disobey him? Here is where the trouble comes in: and just here is where the trouble will make its appearance,—"At the appearing and kingdom of Jesus." The Holy Spirit, in Hebrews v. 9, says, "He became the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him." What did he become to all them who disobey him? Nothing. He never knew them as his people, even though they may "have done many wonderful works in his name." No recognition of them: let their professed piety be what it may. Of course it is expected that an immersed individual will exhibit a walk and conversation, becoming such profession. If they do not, there is no evidence to themselves or others, that they constitute a part of the family, and, in reality, they do not.

Who believes that Jesus laid down a line for his followers, and yet allowed them to follow a different course, as hundreds of professors are now doing? Will he thus relinquish his authority? He will not. In order to be partakers of his great salvation, all must become interested in a Scriptural manner, and this can only be done by his own Scriptural appointment, i. e., "believing the things of the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus," and then being "immersed into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." What use would it have been to know that the ark was built, if Noah did not enter into it? It is further said, "Cannot Jesus pardon a sinner without some other persons consent and help?" I never heard that he could not, if so minded, but where has he told us to find out what he can, or cannot do? The charge against "indolent preachers," I trust, is not true. I do not believe it. At any rate I am satisfied that ten brethren can be found ready and willing to immerse, for every one candidate that offers, and want of opportunity is an extremely isolated case, —one in a hundred. My own idea is the reverse. I should be more inclined to fear haste in brethren assisting a candidate, and thus be in danger of catching some bad fish, as did Peter in the case of Simon. I fear such cases exist now.

It is further stated, "If he deliberately neglect baptism, he cannot be saved." Does not this short sentence destroy all he has written? how does this agree with the idea that, if a man "be in Christ by faith, he cannot be lost?" Both these ideas cannot possibly be true! Again, "baptism is essential, because obedience is essential." True, those acknowledgements embody all that the most strenuous advocates of immersion require or claim, i. e., that faith and immersion should both go together united, as Jesus saw fit to place them. If Jesus condescends in mercy to save a miserable, unworthy sinner, surely he should be allowed to make his own terms, and any one altering or omitting either of them, does so at the risk of their future life and happiness in the kingdom of God. This idea all faithful followers of Jesus proclaim to the church and the world.

As to the mere single fact of faith in Jesus, I deny that it is a sufficient criterion; and such a faith will not place male or female in the Christ. What is the obedience required? Faith in the gospel of the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus. This faith entitles a person to immersion into it. How many of the different professors throughout Christendom possess this faith? Not one in twenty thousand. How many of the same professors believe in the Jesus Christ of the Scriptures? About the same number as believe in the Scriptural kingdom. Nearly all with one consent oppose this true Scriptural Christianity, and ignore its Scriptural requirements.

So far as the general profession of faith in Jesus goes, it is all but, if not altogether, worthless. Large numbers believe that he is just the Son of Joseph and Mary. Other numbers believe that he was a pre-existent being or creature of some kind, who entered the womb of the Virgin and became the Jesus that was born of her, but the overwhelming majority of professors believe that Jesus is the eternal God himself, who became Jesus by a similar process to the one mentioned case. The numbers are extremely few who believe with John that the "word was made flesh," John i. 1-14, or with Paul, that "God sent forth his Son, made of a woman," or "born of a woman." Gal. iv. 4. This was done by an act of creative power by Jehovah, without the intervention of man or any other created being; and thus Jesus is emphatically "the seed of the woman" as in the old Eden promise.

For the truth.

LETTER DRAWER.

Editor Restitution:—One year has passed since I sent my first communication to your paper, and now I have so much to say, that I'm afraid to begin for fear of trying your patience; but I will try to condense all I have to say in as few lines as possible.

When I came to this mountain retreat, it was with a full determination to spend the balance of my days in solitude. At that time I was an infidel in belief, and thought the Bible to be a book gotten up by designing men, for the purpose of enslaving the mind, and to retard science, that they might rise to power.

But I must hasten on and not stop to tell what I used to think; but tell in as few words as possible what I now know and believe. After exhausting the stock of reading matter that I had brought with me, I commenced the study of the Bible: not that I expected to find anything new, for I had read it through from beginning to end, and had "parrot like" repeated chapter after chapter in Sabbath school, with no more idea of its meaning than so much Chocktaw; but now by the aid of THE RESTITUTION (a few copies of which my brother had induced me to take along) I began to see in its pages something more than the works of human hands; and after weeks of study I became convinced of its authority, and in the language of Paul, I said, "Lord, what will thou have me to do?" In Acts xvi. 31, I found my answer; but unlike the jailor, I had no one to baptize me, so I made a journey to St. Louis, (118 miles) for that purpose but met with disappointment, and returned with a sad heart to my mountain home. I remained here until the last of May, and then started for Michigan and was so fortunate as to reach Bro. Bradley's in time to hear Bro. J. M. Stephenson preach the first doctrinal sermon I ever listened to, and it is needless to say, I was more firmly established in the faith of the Gospel of the kingdom of God. It rained nearly all day Sunday, but the house was well filled and a great deal of interest manifested by all. After the morning service, we repaired to the water, where I was (by the assistance of Bro. Bradley) buried with Christ in baptism, and let my days be few or many they shall be spent in the service of Him who has done so much for me. I now believe in the promises of God, and know that I shall be raised at the last day.

I feel truly thankful to Bro. Bradley and family, also to others whose names I have forgotten, for the kindness and consideration shown me during my short stay among them.

I have since visited friends in Iowa and talked to them about the Gospel of the kingdom, and some gave a willing ear, and wished to hear more about this (to them) new doctrine. I can see but little chance of doing anything for the cause where I now am, but feel willing to leave my retreat, and go forth and battle for the truth if it be the will of my Master.

I will visit the brethren in Bro. Bailey's neighborhood in a short time, and am in hopes to find the seed scattered there last fall, by Bro. J. M. Stephenson producing an abundant harvest.

Yours in the faith,

G. W. BROWNE, M. D.

Editor Restitution: Since my last I have held my twenty-first annual Grove meeting, near the village of Norwichville. Also my thirteenth annual Grove meeting, at Sweaburg, Ont. Each day was beautiful, the congregations were large—equal to a Methodist's camp-meeting. Some coming fifteen miles, good order was observed, considering the crowd, no latter could be expected.

Although the doctrine presented, was in direct opposition to what is taught in the pulpits occupied by a time-serving ministry, yet the great body appeared to be deeply interested during the delivery of each discourse, and at the close, all left as quietly as they would in leaving one of the regular churches. These appointments had been standing a year, and by request I have left appointments to preach in the same groves, on the last Sunday in June, 1880, near Norwichville, Ont., at 10:30 A. M. and 2:30 P. M. And on the first Sunday in July at Sweaburg, Ont., at 10:30 A. M. and 2:30 P. M. Two requested baptism.

Brethren of THE RESTITUTION: It is about forty years since I commenced to preach in streets, parks, groves, and hold tent meetings, and I am confident that much good has been done in this way of laboring, and can be, and with less expense than in any other way.

Not long since a Bro. came and introduced himself to me, after I was through with my sermon, saying that it was from your mouth that I first heard the gospel that saves, when you were preaching one evening in the street, in the city of H———. And I sold him my book "The Kingdom of God and Life only in Christ." At a tent meeting I held in the town of ———, between two and three hundred, as the result of the meeting, came out and professed faith in Christ. At another, as the result of the meeting, and my labors through the winter, about a hundred and forty came out and were immersed into the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins. And were I younger, and possessed the strength and means of former days, I would secure a tent, and go to work as formerly. Brethren we as a people, need more energy and zeal. We have the truth, as a people, that saves, but in zeal it will be well for us to imitate the apostacy.

Fraternally,

R. V. LYON.

P. S. About one month subsequent to my grove meeting, held last year at Sweaburg, the enemy death, laid hold of Bro. John Innis for his victim. But he sleeps in Jesus. He had worked all day in the barley field, and to escape a shower that was coming upon them, he run to the barn to escape it. Upon his arrival he said I have beat you, and at once fell, but his son caught him, and he died in his arms. His age was near 70 years. He was at our Grove meeting and enjoyed it much, and added me in my mission of love. He was a supporter of THE RESTITUTION. His loss is deeply felt by Sister Innis, and all the friends of truth, as well as his family.

SELECTIONS.

(The Witness.)

The Oldest City in the World.

DAMASCUS, Syria.

Some writer exclaims: "Though old as history itself, thou art fresh as the breath of spring, blooming as thine own rosebud, and fragrant as thine own orange flower. O Damascus, Pearl of the East!" And so we thought as, descending from the bare mountains of Anti-Lebanon, we obtained our first view of the city from one of the overhanging ridges on the west. No wonder Mohammed, as he stood on the sacred height above, whilst yet a camel driver from Mecca, and gazed on the scene below, said: "Man can have but one Paradise, and my Paradise is fixed above." Marble minarets, domes glittering with the crescent, massive towers, and terraces of level roofs rise out of a sea of foliage, the white buildings shining with ivory softness though the broad dark clumps of verdure which, miles in depth and leagues in circuit, girdle the city, making it, as the people love to say, a pearl set in emeralds. It is a wilderness of bloom, fragrance and fruitage, where olive and pomegranate, orange and apricot, plum and walnut, mingle their varied tints of green—a maze of flowering and scented thickets pierced with wild woodland glades, that are sweet with roses and jasmine blossoms and alive with babbling springs and rivulets. And close up to the forest edge comes the yellow desert, and farther back the sterile mountains in a dry and desolate region, "than which," says Stanley, "the peaks of Sinai are not more sterile;" so that you are standing literally between the living and the dead. Towering above all is Hermon with his snowy crest, standing like a sentinel with shining helmet, "the tower of Lebanon which looketh toward Damascus."

I wish I could picture to you this, the only hotel in Damascus, at which we are stopping. A Greek lady is the proprietress, and she keeps a thoroughly Oriental house. You enter by a small, low doorway into a large marble-paved court, surrounded with galleries opened or latticed. In the centre is a large fountain of pure water, giving a cool and comfortable air, the murmur and plash of its waters making soft music in the quiet evening hours. Around are a variety of trees, such as the orange and lemon, the citron and apricot, and green vines trained aloft forming beautiful towers, their flowers sending forth a delicious perfume. On one side is a most luxurious divan, with another and smaller fountain, and a higher part called the dais, elegantly fitted up with couches and pearl inlaid furniture. Here in the evening merchants come and exhibit curious specimens of Damascus manufacture, among them the celebrated sword-blades, which may be purchased at the usual disadvantage. To complete the scene, our dark eyed hostess, with ten bracelets on her arms, might often be seen smoking her narghileh in the cool shade of the court.

There are very few antiquities to be seen in Damascus. Its chief interest consists in its display of genuine Oriental scenes, costumes, life, and character; and then its great antiquity. Josephus makes this city even older than Abraham, and Shakspeare alludes to the story that the murder of Abel took place here.

"Nay, stand thou back; I will not budge an a foot;
This be Damascus, be thou cursed Cain,
To slay thy brother Abel, if thou will."

Abraham's steward was "Eliezer of Damascus." The history of Naaman and his gentle Hebrew captive, and of his proud preference of Abana and Pharpar to the thirsty waters of Israel, are familiar to all. Its mercantile greatness is indicated by Ezekiel in his address to Tyre: "Damascus was thy merchant, in the multitude of the wares of thy making, for the multitude of all riches; in the wine of Helbon and white wool."

In New Testament times it is associated with the history of Paul, who was converted near by, when "suddenly there shined round about him a light from heaven," and he was told to go into the city, into the street called Straight. It still exists, full of life and power. Like Constantinople, it was evidently a "predestinated capital." While other cities of the East have risen and decayed. Damascus is still what it was. It was founded before Palmyra and Baalbek, and it has outlived them both. While Babylon is a heap in the desert, and Tyre a ruin on the shore, this city remains what Isaiah called it, "the head of Syria." It has witnessed Jerusalem, Alexandria, Athens and Rome rise, flourish and decay; but through all the vicissitudes and wars of past history its freshness and youthful vigor have never faded—it still remains "the oldest city in the world."

AN ANCIENT ROSE TREE.

Herr Leunis, a well-known botanist of Hildesheim (Hanover), thus describes a remarkable rose tree (or rather climber, for it is supported against the wall of a church) growing in his town, and which was in existence when Christianity itself was little more than 1,000 years old; and, if tradition is to be believed, had even then been blooming nearly 300 summers. "The oldest known rose in the world," he says, "is one at present growing against the wall of the cathedral of his town (Hildesheim), remarkable alike for its extreme age and for the scanty nourishment with which it has supported itself for many centuries. It varies but slightly from the common dog rose (Rosa canina); the leaves are rather more ovate, the pedicils and lower leaf surfaces more hairy and the fruit smaller and more globular. The stem is two inches thick at its junction with its root, and the whole plant covers some twenty-four square feet of the wall. Bishop Hezilo, who flourished between 1054-1079, took special interest in this rose as being a remarkable monument of the past; and when the cathedral was rebuilt, after being burned down in 1061, he had it once more trained against the portion of the wall which had been spared by the fire.

"I Thought on My Ways, and Turned My Feet Unto Thy Testimonies."—Psa. cxix. 59.

W. L. CHOCKLETT.

Soft fall the mellow shades of evening,
Whispering come the breezes of the night;
A precious balm of consolation is mine
As fades the light.

A consolation for my glowing hopes departed;
Hopes based upon the fleeting things of life;
A consolation that has courage now imparted
To face earth's strife.

I've oft been weak and have no strength exerted
To break away from life's allurements now;
But nevermore shall duty be deserted,
Come joy or woe.

How often have I cast my dearest treasures
Upon the world's bright seeming, fertile field;
But ere I sought to gather in its pleasures
Untold sorrow yield.

Then learn, O heart, from this, these often sorrow
That all these earthly frolics soon away;
And place thy love upon a golden dawning tomorrow—
The everlasting day.

Cast off things vile, and in closeness turning
From worldly friends who've proven false to thee;
Earth's gilded pomp is only worth thy spurning—
Be thou like free.

The Bible Versus Trinitarianism.—No. 3.

Isa. ix. 6, 7: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder [or given into his hands by the Father]; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth, even forever. The zeal of Jehovah of hosts will perform this."

Here we have the wonderful prophecy that is supposed to settle the question beyond dispute that Christ, "who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary, suffered and died under Pontius Pilate," is truly the mighty God who created the heavens and the earth, and the everlasting Father, as well as the Son of God and the Prince of Peace! But this Scripture enunciates no such doctrine, no such absurdity; neither does any other passage in the Bible. It is unfortunate that theologians had not analyzed this language before jumping to such a conclusion as to its meaning.

We have in this sixth verse the simple announcement that this "child" and "Son" is to take the name of his Father just as any son takes the name of his father. Mark the language—"And his name shall be called the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." Not that he is the mighty God, the everlasting Father, for if so, then how could he be a Son begotten by the everlasting Father?

"Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God, the Father," "whom he [God] hath appointed heir of all things by whom also he made the worlds; who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his (God's) person [not his attributes] and upholding all things by the word of his power [which his Father had given him] when he had by himself purged away our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high, being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they. For unto which of the angels said he at any time, thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee? And, again, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be my Son? And, again, when he bringeth in the first begotten into the world, he saith, and let all the angels of God worship him. And of the angels he saith, who maketh his angels, spirits, and his ministers a flaming fire. But unto the Son he saith, thy throne, O God, is forever and forever; a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom. Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity; therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." Heb. i. 2 9. Thus we have an explicit explanation of all the passages that refer to Christ by the name of God, Almighty, etc. And thus we see that Paul does not contradict himself when he says, "There is but one God, the Father."

But does not the apostle in this text, when he says, "There is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things," also say, "And one Lord Jesus Christ by whom are all things?" And does he not, therefore, assert that all things are by Christ, the Son, as well as by God, the Father? And does not this prove that Christ is "the true God," and Creator of all things?

To these questions I will give a fair and Scriptural answer. In the first place, it must be remembered that no doctrine can be sustained by the sole use of the Greek prepositions, as the following facts will show: Dia, which, in this text is rendered by, is translated, in the N. T., through, one hundred (100) times; because and because of, more than fifty (50) times; and for forty (40) times. It is also rendered by reason of, by means of, on account of, and that, too, when it is followed by the genitive case. En, is rendered in, at, with, by, etc., with the following senses: "As referring to place, denoting state or condition; referring to time; by means of; in respect to, in reference to, on account of, because of, for the sake of, etc.—Greenfield. That the translators have frequently rendered these prepositions, with others, in accordance with the received doctrines of the church at that time, and not according to the doctrines of the Bible, (and other words also,) can be made very evident by referring to a few places and facts connected with certain passages. John, the immerser, says, (Matt. iii. 11): "I indeed baptize (immerse) you (en—in) with water . . he (Christ) shall baptize (immerse) you (en—in) with the Holy Ghost, and with fire." Now, what is the fact connected with John's baptizing? Was it performed "with" water—by the application of the water to the subject, as the translators have it? or was it in water? We have the answer in the sixth verse as follows. "And were baptized (immersed) of him in Jordan confessing their sins." And, again, in the 16th verse: "And Jesus when he was baptized, (immersed) went up straitway out of the water," etc. Again, Mark says, (vii. 3, 4): "For the Pharisees, and all the Jews, except they (niptontai) wash their hands oft, eat not,"...."And when they come from the market, except they (baptisontai—immerse themselves;—the translators have—shall I say knowing it to be wrong?—put it) wash, they eat not."

Greenfield, in his Greek Lexicon, says, nipto, from which the word, used in verse 3, is taken, means "to wash the face, hands, feet, etc., differing from louo, to wash the whole body, bathe; and from pluno, to wash clothes." So that if Mark intended to convey only the idea of washing or bathing the whole body,—and the translators do not give even this idea—he would have employed the word louo; but as he has used a word (from baptizo) which signifies to immerse, he, undoubtedly, states a fact, and that fact is, that, when they returned from the market, they immersed themselves.

I might give many more illustrations of a similar character where the translators not only give a sense not in the original, but one clearly in conflict with other portions of Scripture, and even making the inspired penmen contradict themselves.

The text now under consideration is not an exception, and before I get through we shall find many more. Paul is made to say (1) that all things are of God, the Father; and (2) that all things are "by" Christ, the Son. Now, I claim, as above stated, that the apostle is made in his second affirmation to contradict, not only the many passages which declare that God created all things, but to contradict himself as to his first affirmation. For it is certain that, if "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," Christ, the Son of God—born of the Virgin Mary—did not.

I know that, in this text and Col. i. 16; Eph. iii. 9, and other places where the expressions, "by whom are all things," "by Jesus Christ," etc., occurs, the preposition dia, being followed by the genitive, is translated critically, but not doctrinally, or Scripturally correct. It may be also rendered critically correct in all these passages by some other word or words which will not make the Bible contradict itself as the Common Version does. We have already noticed how en and dia are variously translated; and I will now add that dia, followed by the genitive, is rendered through one hundred times with the following senses: "By, by means of, on account of, because of, to consequence of."—Greenfield. So, those who have contended that the real meaning of these and similar passages is not changed by substituting through for "by" are certainly mistaken, and their specious argument, in the light of the above, falls to the ground. But it is also critically correct—King James' translators being the judges, having rendered it "because of" twenty-five times—to translate dia followed by the genitive with the words, on account of, because of, etc.

I will now write this text in accordance with the above, and, as it should be written in order to harmonize the Bible and make Paul consistent with himself. "But to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, through [or on account of] whom are all things and we through him." The translators make Paul say, (Heb. ii. 10): "For it became him (Christ) dia—for whom are all things and en—in, not by whom are all things," etc.

In this connection let us look at Col. i. 16, 17, which reads as follows: "For by him (Christ) were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth .... all things were created by him and for him. And he is before all things, and by him all things consist."

It is only necessary, in showing that the translators have gone out of their way in order to fortify the Trinitarian position, to note the fact that they have twice rendered en "by," when, as every Greek scholar knows, it should have been (in) thereby making Paul, contrary to the Scriptures, affirm four times in two sentences, which would seem unnecessary, that all things were created by Christ as well as for him.

This translation, then, not only makes the Bible contradict itself, but makes Paul inconsistent with himself. Take the expression—"all things were made by him and for him"—and see if it will bear the light of other passages, or the analysis of facts. Moses says, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." The Psalmist, (ciii. 22, 23), "Of old hast thou (God) laid the foundations of the earth; and the heavens are the work of thy hands." The Prophet (Isa. xlii. 5) says, "Thus saith God the Lord (Jehovah), he that created the heavens and stretched them out, he that spread forth the earth . . he that giveth breath unto the people upon it, and spirit to them that walk therein." Again, he says, (xl. 28), "Hast thou not known? hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the Lord (Jehovah), the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary?" "Thou art worthy, O Lord, (God Almighty, verse 8,) to receive glory and honor and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." Rev. iv. 11. Christ says, (Mark ii. 19), "From the beginning of the creation which [I have created? no, but which God created." Christ never claimed to be God, but only the Son of God; and no inspired penman has ever claimed more for him than he did for himself. If he is not God, then all things were not created by him, but on account of him "and for him." "Have we not all one Father? hath not one God created us?" Mal. ii. 10. Thus, we show that God, the Father, created all things "by the work of his hands," and not "by" Christ, as Paul is made to say, in Eph. iii. 9. God, the Almighty, had no need of help, or need of agents in creating the universe; he only had to speak the word, and it was done, to command, and it stood fast. "For by the word of the Lord were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth." But the phrase—"by Jesus Christ" (Eph. iii. 9) is evidently spurious, and was so considered by Dr. Clarke, Prof. Whiting, and other learned men. Griesbach, it is said, has thrown it out of the text. The text, then, should read as follows: "Which from the beginning of the world had been hidden in God, who created all things."

If it be true, then, that God, the Father, created the universe, is it not a logical, conclusive fact that Christ, the Son of God did not create all things?

But, again, if Christ is the Creator, how can it be that God "hath appointed him heir of all things," (Heb. i. 1, 2,) seeing that they must be already his by the right of creation, and that he can only inherit that which was made by another?

So, again, if Christ created all things, his creative power must have inhered in himself; but, so far from this being true, Christ says, (Matt. xxviii. 18), "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth." "All things are delivered unto me of my Father." Chap. xi. 27. "And hath given him authority to execute judgment also, because he is the Son of Man." John v. 27. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, the Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do." "I can of mine own self do nothing." Chap. v. 30. "My Father is greater than I." I now ask, in the fear of my Master, could Christ, being the supreme God, make such statements as the above? Does not all power and authority inhere in the supreme and only true God? Then, if such power and authority do not inhere in Christ, but were given unto him by the Father, as Christ declares, Christ cannot be God, and, consequently, is not the Creator of all things.

Thus, it is proven, that all things were create I by God the Father, on account of, and for his only begotten and well beloved son; and if they were created for him, as "heir of all things," as Paul says in the text, they could not also have been created by him, as the translators, erroneously, make Paul say in the same sentence.

I will now write this text as it should be, in order to harmonize the Scriptures—rendering the Greek prepositions as the translators have in many other places, and giving the true sense, in accordance with the best authorities, in brackets.

"For in (en) i. e., in respect to, or in reference to him were all things created that are in heaven, and in earth .... all things were created through (dia) i. e., on account of, or because of him and for him. And he is before all things as 'the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world,' Rev. xiii. 8, and in (en) i. e., in respect to, or on account of him all things consist."

In reference to the above rendering, I will merely add, that it has been thus understood and so translated by many good linguists, among them are Wakefield, Macknight and Prof. N. N. Whiting, the two last, as is generally known, having translated the New Testament. The Emphatic Diaglott reads, "Because in him were created all things, . . all things have been created through him and for him."

In my next I will take up that part of the first chapter of John which is supposed to relate to this subject, and which so many most erroneously believe settle the question in favor of Trinitarianism.

H. H. HALL.

The Odor of Life and of Death.

O. M. MYLES.

I am sure Jesus Christ is a sweet savour of Christ, in them that are saved and in them that perish. To the one we are the savour of death unto death; and to the other the savour of life unto life. 2 Corinthians ii. 15, 16.

After hearing this language often quoted, and so variously used I have thought fit to write of it and to make inquiry into its possible meaning. But how shall we begin?

It is a well known fact by all Bible readers that the original manuscripts prepared by the Apostles are not now possessed, and that all the manuscripts now possessed are but copies, or copies of copies. Also it is understood well that when a copiest desired to give the synonym of any word in the text, or to explain any word or phrase in the text, that he entered the synonym, explanation, or paraphrase in the margin. Then when the second hand came to copy this manuscript if the synonym, explanation, or paraphrase happened to strike him with force, in many cases he would introduce these into the body of the text. Of our text, Boyer in his Greek criticism, quotes Dr. Wall where he says: "Eis thanaton unto death, and Eis Zoen unto life, perhaps came from the margin." If this is correct, it would leave the last verse of our text to read: "To the one we are the savour of death; and to the other the savour of life."

But to waive all doubts, at the present, as to the correct reading of our text, and investigate it as it now stands, let me ask,

1. Can it be possible that Paul here by this language as a basis, starts with all men as resting under condemnation to death, and means that the savour in its effect adds more death to the one party, and life to the other? The language of the text can hardly justify this, for if so the text would have to read: To the one we are the savour of—from—death unto death; and to the other the savour of—from—death unto life. But,

2. Can it be possible that Paul starts with all men as possessed of life as a basis and means by this language that the odor adds more life unto the one party, and adds death unto the other? The language of the text can hardly justify this thought, for in such a case the text would have to likewise be remodeled, and made to read: To the one we are the savour of—from life unto death; and to the other we are the savour of—from life unto life. As the textual reading will not justify either of these ideas, then we will have to seek the meaning of the text by noticing some of its phrases and words.

1. Verse 16, indicates either that the savour or odor found its origin in Christ and that it flowed through the parties both saved and lost and terminated with God; or that the word unto should be for, and that the savour—odor—found its origin in God, came through Jesus as his representative, and in its effect flowed to and terminated upon those saved and lost. From all the circumstances, when properly weighed we are strongly inclined to the latter view.

2. The word Eis rendered unto in verse 16, denotes transition, it has in it the idea of movement, forward movement, an end to be obtained, a leading forward, or a leading unto, or into, and fitly joins cause and effect.

3. The word savour in the text is from the word osme—smell, odor, fragrant odor, as in Jno. xii 3; Eph. v. 2; Phil. iv. 18; and by metonomy our text. Thus it is a medical word, but one that is familiar to all.

Now to the basis of the illustration. We say, "But as dew is but the dissevered particles of the medicine, or vegetable, as the case may be, escaping into the atmosphere which come into contact with our olfactory nerves, and that upon those nerves produce an effect pleasant or otherwise. So in the point illustrated, by figure, Paul declares himself to be the odor. I have translated that by figure Paul is the odor. But, as the facts teach in the case, literally Paul occupies the place of the medicine sending forth his proclamations as the odor, to have their effect upon those who heard. To the one these teachings were the odor containing in them the principles which as an effect led into or unto life, and into or unto death to the other. This view and exposition is sustained by the following renderings and criticisms.

1. Macknight—"To these indeed we are the smell of death, ending in death; but to the others, the smell of life, ending in life."

2. Wakefield—"To one a deadly savour unto death; to the other, a living savour unto life."

3. A. Campbell—"To these, indeed, we are the odor of death ending in death; but to the other, the odor of life ending in life"

4. H. J. Anderson—"To the one we are the odor of death ending in death; to the other, the odor of life ending in life"

5. Belsham—"To the one we are a deadly odor unto death, but to the other a living odor unto life."

But let us look to the facts in the case a little further. The gospel, which at least was a part of Paul's message or proclamation, contained in it the principles which lead to life. The glad tidings saluted the sinner's ear, they produced a mental effect. This mental effect wrought upon the thoughts and the purposes and thus was the moral nature and lead to life in their effect.

But now to the other side. I do not mean, to the other side of the gospel, for the gospel has but one side to it, but to the other side of Paul's declarations as results, as in the expressions: "But he that believeth not shall be damned." Mark xvi. 16. "He that believeth not on the Son shall never see life." Jno. iii. 36; "He that believeth not on the Son is condemned already," Jno. iii. 18, is the man affected mentally, morally and physically as in the former case by the principles of the gospel? I do not mean by this question, is he made to believe, repent and obey as in the former case, but is he affected mentally so that his unbelief is stronger? is he affected morally so that his morals are not so good as before? is he affected physically so that in action he grows worse, all of which leads naturally to death. Or is he not left in his mental, moral and physical nature just where the gospel found him?

To develop this point further, let me ask and answer the question, what is the meaning of the word gospel? Answer; good news, glad tidings, in effect good spell. But does the good news contain in it the enunciation of death? Do the glad tidings contain in them condemnation? Is the good-spell which is produced, the effect of the death sentence? Inconsistent!! Did the gospel promise made in the presence of Eve contain in it death to any one save the serpent's seed? Did the promise to the fathers, "In thee, and in thy seed shall all nations be blessed," contain in it death? If then condemnation is not found in the gospel where does it come from? We answer from the representative penalty for sin, which was passed upon Adam—the federal head.

But we are met at this point with the question, does not our text say that the gospel is a savour—odor—of life unto life, and of death unto death? We answer no, such a statement is not in the text; nor in the Bible. The text presents, not the gospel, but Paul as the odor. But as we have already explained that literally Paul stands as the medicine, the question arises then is not the gospel the odor? We answer this from the foregoing reasons, as to the nature of the gospel, and then also to declare to these parties their destiny. The destiny of the one for compliance was salvation. But to elucidate further a question arises, a salvation from what? the answer elicited from all is a salvation from sin. But we remark that it is not a salvation from the past act of sin, or from the fact that sin has been committed; impossible, all the powers in the universe cannot blot it out. Then it must be a salvation from the effect of sin, from the penalty of sin. But what is the penalty of sin? The Bible answers death—not the act of dying, but death the absence of life. The sentence "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," touches this to be the penalty. Then the salvation standing as the result of the compliance with the gospel is salvation from the state of death which can only be accomplished at and by a resurrection from that state. But does the condemnation also give this to the other party? Inconsistent, impossible, it is only promised for a compliance with the gospel. Then the condemnation announced to the one for non-compliance is no new condemnation. It is not an additional condemnation, nor indeed is it necessary or possible for it to be since the first one in its effect is eternal. Further condemnation could not be executed without first a suspension of the original penalty, and a suspension of the original penalty is only obtained by a compliance with the gospel. Therefore Paul's enunciation as an odor to the unbeliever must have been an enunciation to him of his final destiny. This idea at this point is sustained by Macknight as quoted in the Cottage Bible. He says: "The preachers of the gospel diffused the smell (or cur) of the knowledge of Christ; (in a manner as fragrant flowers and perfumes were scattered in a Roman triumph). This knowledge, to those who believed, was (a savour of life; or) a vivifying smell (or savour,) ending in life to them; but to unbelievers, it was as little fragrant or grateful as the odors of the procession to those condemned to die (as were many of the captives, in the close of the procession;) it was a savour of death ending in death, if they continued in unbelief."

Let me illustrate further. I now turn physician, and with medical case in hand I visit A, and B, who are sorely sick and nigh unto death with the same disease, and find that without medical aid both are bound to die. I diagnose the case, and prescribe for both patients alike, knowing that all things considered, the cases are alike, and announce to each the results: Relief upon the reception according to directions, or death, certain death, and sudden death in case they will not receive the proffered aid. A complies, and is, through the influence of the medicine, restored to health, while B refuses and as a natural consequence, dies. Here is an enunciation to A of relief, and likewise an enunciation to B of death provided he will not comply. To B, here is no new condemnation to death, but merely an enunciation of what he may expect in case he will not appropriate the remedy prescribed. Upon him no additional death is added, but simply the one that follows as the result of the disease implanted in his system. Death does not come upon him because I have made the enunciation, but I have made the enunciation because I knew what the result would be provided he would not accept of the offered assistance. So in the point illustrated.

But some reader of this may remark that the odor—the principles of the medicine have had their effect upon the physical system of A to produce their result, but not so with B, to produce a result—death—upon him. We reply, just as we have shown in the case of Paul's enunciations. The gospel has laid hold upon the mental, moral, and physical nature of the one who has received it and upon him it has produced its effects, but upon the one who complies not, no effect whatever is produced. To him simply results are announced.

Prof. Proctor explains away the turning of Lot's wife into a pillar of salt, by stating that she was simply buried under a meteoric shower of sodium. On which the Burlington Hawkeye remarks: "Now, this simplifies it. This brings it out of the fanciful realm of the supernatural, and places it within the creditable sphere of every-day events. We always had very grave doubts about the pillar of salt business, but when science plainly explains that the poor woman was simply buried under a meteoric fall of sodium, then we can readily accept it. There is nothing singular, remarkable or unusual about that. Very few people are there, indeed, who do not know of hundreds of instances in which their friends and acquaintances have been caught out in a shower of sodium and buried. It is wonderful indeed how science simplifies the miracles."

Love makes time pass, and time makes love pass. Time strengthens true love if there be mutual discretion and forbearance; but makes favor with lust and mere infatuation.

What peace life bringeth to my heart,
Deep as the soundless sea,
How sweetly singeth the soul that clingeth,
My loving Lord to Thee.

In most situations of life the consciousness of innocence is our best shield, and our firmest security.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to which end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; and the essentiality of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and baptism as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a life thereafter devoted to final salvation.

Coming Age—Its Practicality—Status in the Social World—Social State of the Christian Household Continued—Secret Societies—Various Worldly Associations—Their Effects on the Household.—No. 31.

J. P. WESTBEE.

Social State of the Christian Household.—If it be true that the social element of the apostolic church is a perfect sample of what Christian socialism should be, is it not, in our days, totally perverted? Are church members satisfied with this ancient institution? When entering the family of Christ, do they say, "Whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people (shall be) my people, and thy God my God?" Are they contented to move under his banner? Are they willing to put on, and keep on the whole armor of God? Are they resolved to accomplish all their warfare in this army? If their doctrines, manners and customs are apostolic, such will be their unchangeable purpose; but if, on the contrary, they partake of the spirit of modern socialism, we shall expect results quite the opposite.

Popular Christians of these days have, socially, scarcely any resemblance, in names, titles, habits of thought, modes of action or views of duty. They are two classes of Christian professors, with opposite tastes. We have already described apostolic Christians; it now remains that we place before the reader the photograph of a modern popular Christian—a popular member of a popular church.

Popular church member—his views and actions—past, present and future.—A specimen is all that is necessary,

He is born and educated in what is termed a Christian community; that is, one that is not pagan; not Chinese nor Indian. He is educated as a citizen of the world; his parents Christian, and therefore, he has been taught to respect the Bible, Christ and his family. He looks upon Christianity as a good thing; it is an element of civilization. Everybody should make a profession, and join some church, no matter what church, so that it's popular and Orthodox; for, with him, orthodoxy and popularity are synonymous.

What are pre-requisites, in his estimation, to membership? Bible Knowledge (in his view) is a very good thing where it can be gathered without too much waste of time; not essential to private membership; good for ministers to have, since that of teaching the Bible is their profession.

It does not matter by what name we are called; what is in a name, so that we have the nature? It will not do for private members to set themselves up as critics and theologians. Leave these things to the learned doctors.

No special change is required for honorable membership, where persons have been religiously educated. Conversion is a very good thing; pagans must be converted; but how can we tell whether a man is converted who has always lived a Christian life? Such are some of his thoughts in regard to the pre-requisites of church membership.

In regard to what he is to do:—his ideas of action are as faulty as his views of what a person is to be. He can be either baptized, or let it alone. Baptism does not save; it is simply the answer of a good conscience This dispute about the mode of baptism is (in his estimation) a great squandering of time. A man may be immersed, sprinkled, or poured; either will do; or, if he is a Christian and lives right, he will be saved. Many good persons are now in heaven that were never baptized.

Such are his thoughts of Christian pre-requisites. Let us now hear his views of a popular Christian life!—what a Christian may believe, and what he may not believe; what a Christian may do, and what he may not do.

A Christian may believe any thing that is popular; for, is it reasonable that the masses would be wrong? Is not the voice of the people the voice of God? (vox populi vox dei). He believes with the crowd, that is orthodoxy enough for him. Should he choose to read or read the Scriptures, and be well satisfied as to what they teach, so soon as he learns that such are not the views of the "crowd" of believers. His duty is clear; the majority should rule.

He attends church services in a popular way. The maxims and customs of his locality, and of his church always govern. If it is popular to attend church he goes to church; if it is popular to give money, he gives just in that manner, and just that amount, that the masses think that he should give He is on the popular side of all questions; otherwise he would compromise his popularity. If, through any hasty temper or otherwise he finds himself with the few he thinks it most prudent to "cram fish."

He delights to be called a "pillar in God's temple, and to hold an elevated seat in the Christian Synagogue.

He makes Christianity just what the masses think it is. If simply a form, such is his view. If it is popular at any time, especially in winter, to have protracted meetings, he is in for such meetings.

What can Christians do, in his estimation? Almost any thing that would be honorable in the world's estimation; for in so doing he knows that he would be with the crowd of church members.

Hear him on Christian liberty.—"Everybody should belong to some Orthodox Christian church—as a profession of Christianity is popular; and adds weight and respectability to character. It is our duty to avoid all disputation on matters of religion; it produces discord among brethren and destroys the peace of society. Live in peace with all men, even at the sacrifice of what some call conscience. Educate your conscience to subserve worldly interests. Avoid any peculiarities in your faith and practice. Be sure of this one thing, "The crowd is always right, since the masses have an inherent right to carry out their views."

Religion is designed to be made use of in this world, not in the next; therefore, you should utilize it, in every possible way. Don't study the Bible to know what to believe, and what to do. Such a course will make you unlike the world, and very unpopular. Study the character of the community where your lot may be cast, that you may learn what they consider popular religion; and apply yourself fully and with zeal to that Christianity.

Christian liberty, and popular Christianity, (and you should avoid every other kind) allow you to mix in with all worldly associations, for in so doing you gain popularity, and influence others.

Secret societies open a wide field of usefulness, they are the golden chain by which the church and the world are united, as in the most sacred wedlock.

Join every society that your circumstances will allow. You can then be sure that in case of disability you have means of support; without depending upon the charities of the Christian household. Their duties must not be neglected, even should they conflict with the church duties.

Aspire, in these societies, to the highest seats of honor, for in so doing you add popularity to your denomination. The more social honors church members possess, the more respectability will be conceded to the church.

Christians, to gain the world, must associate with the world, and act like the world—be all things to all men. Otherwise you make the church unpopular and restrict its influence. If you are an officer in the church allow your young members full social freedom. If you restrain them, you scar them against the church, and make them dislike the exercises.

The church must be popular with the world or it will fail to convert the world. The world will not seek the church, since it is the larger and more popular family; the church must seek the world; it must adapt its doctrines and practices to worldly tastes.

Their buildings must be attractive—large and costly. Their services more entertaining than those of theatres, so as to draw that crowd. The music must be first-class, preaching in every particular modern and highly emotional.

Seldom speak of the Bible, since that is too ancient, and its doctrines obsolete with the masses. Speak of Shakspeare, and of modern literature and science. Introduce into the church all such social gatherings as will draw worldly influence and money to it.

Sects are useful, since they watch each other. As it is in the political world so is it in the Christian family. Parties keep the moral atmosphere in motion. Better have storm than calm.

Christians should have full liberty in the political affairs; they impart to them a healthy tone;—and for kings, emperors, presidents, and distinguished statesmen to be members of the Christian household, is truly ennobling. The world would soon be converted if the church could be elevated, and its membership honorable in a worldly sense.

Church members are citizens; therefore, they should hold offices, lead our armies; fight our battles, even on the Lord's day—the end sanctifying the means; and kill our brothers. Thou shalt not kill, means thou shalt not kill in time of peace, in retail, but thou mayest kill by wholesale. This must be the meaning, since the majority of the Christian household thus reflects and act, and the crowd must be right (vox populi vox dei).

Our country's claims are paramount to all other claims. To defend, and fight for our country is the popular Christianity of our times, and we are, therefore, required to give it our hearty support.

How can the world be converted in any other way? And does not the Bible teach the world's conversion? They must be assimilated. This is done by the churches becoming more liberal. Let her meet the world, at least half way. And when we get the word into our school, can we not teach and elevate it to a higher standard?

Thus have we followed this popular modern church member, in his expositions of Christian liberty. In our next number, we propose to show, by quotations, that the popular Orthodox churches set up to all the suggestions of their imaginary exponent.

Knowledge Puffeth Up.

"Knowledge puffeth up but charity edifieth."

While knowledge is truly commendable, and within and of itself perfectly harmless; yet when possessed by an unsanctified heart devoid of charity it sometimes puffeth up, while if charity or love was allowed to rule in our hearts, instead of being puffed up we would humble ourselves, and be edified, and if this is not the case we may safely say that something is lacking, charity is wanting.

God designs that men and women should have abundance of knowledge, even being filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding. That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work and increasing in the knowledge of God.

And I myself also am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye also are full of goodness, filled with all knowledge, able also to admonish one another. Yet he never designs to have selfish-minded men and women who are so completely filled with self, that he crops out at nearly every puff. Many a smart man is puffed up and almost ruined for want of charity. Many a good sermon has been spoiled by mixing in too much dear self instead of God's love to man.

And if any man think that he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know. But if any man love God the same is known of him. Let nothing be done through strife or vain glory but in lowliness of mind let each esteem others better than themselves. For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus sake. Jesus our great and perfect pattern, whose spirit and meek disposition we must cultivate and manifest to be acknowledged his, whose knowledge was immense—far in advance of man, was not puffed up, but very meek and unassuming. He then let us crucify self, just slay him away, and learn of Jesus our meek and lowly Savior and thus find rest—sweet rest. T. E. ADAMS.

Temperance.

To the brethren in Iowa, Kansas and Michigan.—Greeting:

Dear Brethren: Inasmuch as temperance is to be added to our knowledge (2 Pet. i. 6.) inasmuch as temperance is one of the fruits of the spirit (Gal. iii. 22.) against which there is no law—inasmuch as our brother Paul, was so much interested in temperance (Acts xxiv. 25) that it called out his reasoning power to such a degree that he caused the king to tremble upon his throne, and inasmuch as the Bible frequently warns us against the sin of using strong, intoxicating drinks, we may reasonably conclude that this is a subject of vast importance to every Christian.

I need not set forth the evils arising from the traffic in, and use of ardent spirits. There is scarcely a home in our states where the demon has not left his foot prints.

In view therefore of the importance of this subject as relating to Christian character, its bearing upon us as children of God and the keeping of the commandments, in view of the terrible ruin the rum has wrought among those who are strangers to the covenants of promise and without God in the world and when we reflect that thousands annually fill drunkards graves, of whom it is said that no drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God, in view of all these considerations is not our duty plain, and should we not do all we can to remove the terrible evil of drink?

This may be done in many ways but chiefly by prohibiting its manufacture and sale. In the states of Michigan and Kansas the people are petitioning the legislature to submit, at their next state election, to the people for their ratification or rejection, an amendment to the constitution of these states forever prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage. The Iowa legislature has already referred this question to the people and the simple issue before every voter is, are you for or against whisky? Will you vote for more tax, crime, immorality and the devil, or for less tax, temperance, virtue and the interests of God and the welfare of humanity. I do not belong to any political party neither do I advocate mixing the truth with politics, yet I can see no harm growing out of voting to do away with this great evil. It seems rather to be a duty we as Christians owe to God and suffering humanity.

Brethren of the Church of God in Iowa, the whole world is watching with intense interest for the result of the coming struggle between temperance and whisky at your next state election. Will you refuse to do your duty now when such tremendous interests are at stake? Can you give a valid reason, why you ought not to do good when such an opportunity as this is offered? Look at the thousands of homes made sad by this rum traffic, look at the hopes blighted, the reputations soiled, the characters tarnished, the crimes fostered and the diseases sown everywhere; and then vote as conscience dictates. Not only is it your duty to vote on the right side but also to work as you never worked before both before election and at the polls, pray too as never you prayed before that God would give us courage, strength and patience and at last rid our fair state from this terrible curse. In Michigan and Kansas we are yet to petition the legislature. Sign those petitions, work faithfully in circulating them, pray devotedly and by the favor of God our legislatures too may submit this question to our people for their final decision. Having accomplished this it never can be said that the Church of God refused to do its duty in helping to lift this heavy burden off the poor the suffering and the sad. This brethren is not a political question, but a moral one. It is not party but principle. There is a question of propriety for Christians to vote when party or persons are subjects of suffrage, but when principle or the well being of fellow man is at stake it is not only a privilege for a Christian to vote for the right but it is his duty to do so.

Respectfully submitted,
A. J. EICHANER.

Forgiveness.

"But if ye do not forgive neither will your heavenly Father, which is in heaven, forgive your trespasses."

"If ye have aught against any, forgive, when ye stand praying." Do we? Can we obey in this thing? when cruelly wronged and misjudged can we forgive?

We can and must, or have not the forgiveness that we crave from our Father in heaven.

Now how does he forgive? Do we not pray that "our sins and transgressions may be blotted out?" "our iniquities covered?" "that our wrongdoing may no more be remembered nor come into mind?" And do we not feel that our prayer will be answered if we live in accordance with God's will? Now we are to forgive as we would be forgiven. When a brother or sister craves forgiveness, we are not to say "we can forgive, but we cannot forget." This is not forgiveness. The wrong must be covered. It must be remembered against the sinning one no more. God help us to come into the bond of perfectness—to have the charity that never faileth. Our Lord is coming.

SELECTIONS.

No. 13.

Prophecies Concerning Israel, Their Land and King, not yet Fulfilled.

Sir,—Maps of the land of Israel, as it was in the days of Joshua and Solomon, are as familiar as those of most other countries, ancient or modern; but only in "the visions of God," Ezek and recorded by Ezekiel, when a captive in Babylon, is the future allotment of that land foreshown.

In the 47th chapter of Ezekiel, at the 13th verse, we read: "Thus saith the Lord God, this shall be the border whereby ye shall inherit the land according to the twelve tribes of Israel; Joseph shall have two portions. And ye shall inherit it one as well as another; concerning the which I lifted up mine hand to give it unto your fathers; and this land shall fall unto you for inheritance. And this shall be the border of the land toward the north side, from the great sea, the way of Hethlon, as men go to Zedad; Hamath, Berothah, Sibraim, which is between the border of Damascus and the border of Hamath; Hazarhatticon, which is by the coast of Hauran. And the border from the sea shall be Hazarenan, the border of Damascus, and the north northward; and the border of Hamath. And this is the north side. And the east side ye shall measure from Hauran, and from Damascus, and from Gilead, and from the land of Israel by Jordan; from the border unto the east sea, and this is the east side. And the south side southward, from Tamar even to the waters of strife in Kadesh, the river to the great sea; and this is the south side southward. And the west side also shall be the great sea from the border, till a man come over against Hamath; this is the west side. So shall ye divide this land unto you according to the tribes of Israel."

These boundaries include much more land than Israel ever occupied. Indeed, God's covenant with Abraham, (Gen. xv. 18) as well as the prophecy in Isaiah xix. 23, 25, requires that Israel shall be the only nation between Assyria and Egypt. And not a foot of the Mediterranean sea coast, from the Nile north to where Mount Hor is visible from the sea, (Num. xxxiv. 8) is about lat. 30, but shall be possessed by Israel. Controlling the Euphrates down to the Persian Gulf on the east, and all the Mediterranean sea-ports between Asia Minor and the Nile on the west, including the Suez Canal; we can easily understand how quickly Israel's commercial supremacy will be established, and the prophecy by Isaiah is in course of fulfillment. "The abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee, the wealth (margin) of the Gentiles shall come unto thee." Isa. lx. 5. Not only the wealth of distant nations shall flow into the land of Israel, but from Nebaioth and Kedar; Midian, Ephah and Sheba, Israel's southern neighbors and kinsmen, all being of the stock of Abraham, (1 Chron. i. 28-33) shall come multitudes of camels and dromedaries, bringing "gold and incense," as Isa. lx. 6, 7, foretells; and as Cowper has sweetly versified:

"The glory of all lands
Flows into her, unbounded is her joy,
And endless her increase. Thy rams are there,
Nebaioth, and the flocks of Kedar there;
The looms of Ormus, and the mines of Ind,
And Saba's spicy groves pay tribute there."

But God has not only foretold that Israel shall again possess their land, but he hath predetermined and foreshown each tribe's position and portion therein. Ezekiel's last chapter shows that the land is to be divided into thirteen parallel portions, running from east to west, all of equal length from north to south. The tribes of Dan, Asher, Naphtali, Manasseh, Ephraim, Reuben and Judah, are to have seven northern portions; the tribes of Benjamin, Simeon, Issachar, Zebulun and Gad are to have the five southern portions. The other portion, between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin is reserved as "an oblation unto the Lord," and "for the prince." The oblation consists of a square of 25,000 reeds on each side, each reed being six great cubits, each a "cubit and an hand-breadth." Chaps. xl. 5, xlvii. 20. The prince's portion is all on the east and west of the oblation. Chap. v. 21. The oblation is divided into three parts; one part measuring 10,000 by 25,000 reeds is for the sanctuary, and those of its ministers who come near to minister unto the Lord, and for their houses. Chap. xlv. 3. Another part of the same size is for the Levites, who are also ministers of the sanctuary, but do not "come near unto the Lord." The different duties of these two classes of priests are defined in chapter xliv. the Levites, in verses 10-14 and 23, 24; the others, called "the sons of Zadok," in verses 15, 16. Many interesting details of the duties of the princes of Israel in that day are given. See xlv. 8, 17; xlvi. 2, 18. A third portion of the oblation, measuring 5,000 by 25,000 reeds, is for the city, whose name from that day shall be Jehovah Shammah, signifying, the Lord is there, (xlviii. 16, 35.) The city is to be in the midst of its portion, a square of 18000 measures round about, with suburbs of 250 measures in width on each side. The rest of the city portion is for those who serve the city "out of all the tribes of Israel," (v. 19.)

Reserving for another letter some remarks on the rivers, and trees, and sacrifices, of which Ezekiel's last chapters speak, I subjoin a statement and diagram which may assist some of your readers to better understand Ezekiel's visions of the future allotment of Israel's land.—Omega.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, Aug. 25, 1880.

WE shall try to give our readers something regarding Palestine before long. Perhaps in our next paper.

WE have deferred some articles for which we hope to find room soon. We will try to give one from Brother E. Miller next week. Its publication was earnestly requested by several brethren.

STILL they come! What? Long articles and reviews. We intended to write an editorial of moderate length in explanation of our course, but there is no room left. All right so far as we are concerned.

IN some of the appeals for aid, from persons who have claimed to be in distressed circumstances, we have been imposed upon, and have unintentionally imposed upon our benevolent brethren and sisters. We say to all concerned, to send no more aid in response to appeals that have heretofore been made through our paper. While the present editor manages THE RESTITUTION no appeal for help will be admitted without ample proof that benevolent charity will not be bestowed on an unworthy object. Like some of our cotemporaries we have learned from experience the necessity of this course.

NEWS ITEMS.

BERLIN, Aug. 21.—The collective rejoinder of the Powers to the Porte's reply to their note on the Greek question will be presented in a day or two. The unity of opinion among the Powers still is perfect. France is ready to follow where the others are prepared to lead, but will not take the initiative.

LONDON, Aug. 20.—The Standard's Bucharest correspondent reports that the minister of war, who is in the Dobrudja, telegraphs that the district is very much disturbed. The troops annihilated two companies of Bulgarian insurgents, two hundred of the insurgents being killed. Two more batteries of artillery have been ordered to Dobrudja.

TURKEY—FORTS ORDERED TO BE REPAIRED.

LONDON, Aug. 21.—A dispatch from Constantinople says orders have been given for the immediate repair of the forts at Black's entrance to the Bosphorus.

OPPOSED TO YIELDING TERRITORY.

A Constantinople dispatch says private telegrams from Scutari report that much excitement exists among the Albanians since the sudden and unexpected departure of the Turkish governor, and much anxiety is expressed in regard to the attitude his successor, Riza Pasha, will observe. Whatever that attitude may be, there is a determination to resist any cession of territory. Preparations to resist have already begun in the district of Dulcigno.

THE MURDER OF DR. PARSONS.

LONDON, August 23.—A correspondent at Bucharest gives the following additional details of the murder of Dr. Parsons, the American missionary: One of the assassins placed the muzzle of his rifle close to Dr. Parsons' servant, fired at and killed him instantly. Dr. Parsons then started up, but before he could say or do anything the bullet pierced his heart. The two Circassians threw the bodies over the precipice at the foot of which they were found after a few days. An American residing at Ismidt telegraphed the facts to Goschen, the British Ambassador, who communicated them immediately to Mr. Heap, American Consul General.

A squad of soldiers went to the camp of the Circassians and threatened to shoot the whole tribe unless the murderers were surrendered, whereupon the murderers were delivered to the authorities. The affair caused great consternation at Constantinople, and people travel armed, and, if possible, with an armed guard, when riding or driving in the suburbs.

LONDON, Aug. 23.—Mr. Heap, American Consul General, has delivered a note to the Porte demanding that the murderers of the Rev. Mr. Parsons be brought to Pera immediately to be tried.

BELGRADE, Aug. 22.—The Servian Government is seeking 200,000 rifles of the newest pattern in America, deliverable before the end of this year.

ST. PETERSBURG, Aug. 21.—Asiatic cholera of a severe type has broken out in the Russian camp and town of Saratoff. The mortality has been great, and is increasing. Saratoff is a fortified town, Capital of the province of the same name, situated on the right bank of the Volga, and it has a population of about 65,000 souls.

A TOWN DESTROYED BY A STORM.

ST. LOUIS, Aug. 20.—Col. Baker, Superintendent of the Western Union Telegraph Company here, has received despatches from Corpus Christi, Texas, which say that it is reported there that Brownsville, Texas, near the mouth of the Rio Grande, was nearly destroyed by the fearful storm which prevailed along the Texas coast on the 12th and 13th instants, and that many lives were lost. The telegraph wires along the coast from Indianola south were prostrated, and are still down south of Corpus Christi. The telegraph lines from Brownsville up the Rio Grande are also torn down; therefore no communication can be had with the stricken city.

The damage by the recent storm on the Mexican and Texas coast is estimated as follows: Matamoras, $500,000; Brownsville, $2,000,000; Garrison, $30,000; Point Isabel and shipping, $2,000,000.

"Chicago Evening Journal."

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., August 23.—The small-pox pestilence continues at Camden, N. J. There are now twenty-three cases of small-pox in the hospital which has been specially provided for the reception of the patients. About fifty people are prostrated with the disease. It is scattered all over the city, and causes the utmost alarm. To-day the Board of Health issued a circular to householders, containing useful advice as to the best method to secure favorable sanitary conditions, a list of disinfectants and how to use them, and various suggestions to prevent the spread of the contagion. The type of the disease is virulent in the extreme.

COMMUNICATIONS.

A Short Reproof.

Editor Restitution:—I am constrained to offer a suggestion to some of your correspondents, who are constantly differing with each other and discussing their differences through your paper, that "the word of the Lord is not yea and nay." It is folly to think that a people can be made wise unto salvation by a class of teachers who are persistently contradicting each other on first principles. What is the trouble that teachers cannot agree on the A, B, C, of divine truth? I notice, in reading your paper that these teachers never disagree so far as is apparent, except on the most vital parts of Bible teaching.

The first things the alien is called upon to learn, and required to understand, are the very things these men are disputing about. Is this right? Is it wise? What can an earnest man say to such work? "How can you keep silent? Has it come to this, that the wise men, so-called among you, cannot agree on first repentance, baptism, resurrection, etc.? Now, I would suggest to these men that, if they desire to show themselves workmen, and turn many to righteousness, and thus make ready a people prepared for the Lord's coming, and be accounted as wise and faithful servants when the Judge of quick and dead appears, it is high time they stop this jangle of words and submit to the testimony of the apostles in all things. "Be of one mind. Speak the same things," is Paul's plain language. Your correspondents don't seem to know that Paul ever wrote such language. Besides, they don't seem to care a fig or a straw whether they speak the same things or not. I sometimes think it is their ambition to differ, and discuss their differences to see who can get the mastery. Now, the fact is, scarcely any two of your ablest writers agree. Were they born crotchety? Is it their misfortune that, after twenty-five or thirty years of discussion, they still cannot understand the first principles of the gospel? Shame to such men; professing themselves wise, they turn out to be fools; ever learning, but never able to come to a full knowledge of the truth. How can you put up with such folly? How can you publish a forked tongued testimony to the world? Do you realize the responsibility? If you are set for the defense of the truth, you should be an earnest man, though all the rest be faithless. The day has past to keep silent. The twilight is gone, and we are in the full blaze of the truth as developed during the past forty years, and there is no longer any excuse for men to parley over first principles. G. MOYER.

SELECTIONS.

For Spirit of the Truth and Restitution.

THE IOWA METEOR.

It Is Purchased for the British Museum—$6,500 Being Paid for It.

In May, 1879, the largest meteoric stone ever beheld in America fell on a farm in Emmet county. The farm belonged to Mrs. Colonel C. H. Perry, of Keokuk. The stone lay embedded fifteen feet deep in the ground for ten or twelve days, visited by hundreds of people, each one carrying off a piece of it. A friend of Mrs. Perry, residing in this city, wrote her asking her if she would not like to have the meteor stored in the Davenport Academy of Sciences. She replied that it would cost $150 to $200 to get it out and place it upon the railroad train—for something would have to be paid the tenant of the farm, who claimed a sort of partnership in the ownership—and if the academy would raise the amount it might have the stone and welcome. Alas! there wasn't a dollar in the academy treasury, and the effort to raise the sum failed. Then a Mr. Berge gave Mrs. Perry $100 for the stone, she supposing he intended it for an institution in this state—and Mr. Berge gave the farm tenant $50 or $60 for the right of way across his fields. And so Mr. Berge got possession of the stone, and not long since he sold it to the British Museum for $6,500, and there it is to be placed in a glass case and preserved as a celestial wonder. Its weight when shipped for London was 441 pounds. When Mr. Berge was exhibiting the stone in Keokuk, Mrs. Perry secured a couple of pieces, and one of them she had sent to the academy. Accompanying Mrs. Perry's gift are two late photographs of the original stone. She says in her letter: "These views, with the specimen of the meteor, will illustrate the character of the great aerolite, now so famous. The specimen was sealed off in some way after it came to Keokuk, and weighs just one pound. I hope there may be something else I can do for that blessed academy, not only for the sake of those I love who are at work, but I feel greatly interested in it as an educational power in the world, and as a splendid example of what may be accomplished by energy and devotion to a good cause. Surely the recognition that comes so gratefully from abroad will start echoes at home."

Do you know what made the Emmet county aerolite so valuable? It was unlike any other well authenticated rock from heaven that ever fell upon earth. It was composed of earth, triolite, iron, nickel, cobalt, phosphorus, copper, sulphur, lead, silver, gold, silica, magnesia, alumina, soda, lithia and potassium, all distinct, yet all together like the particles of a granite block. The piece in the academy lies at the side of a sample of an aerolite which fell in Jonnson county, in 1875—but the latter is nothing but stone glazed black with fire; and still another piece of aerolite from California, is in the case—and it is composed of splints of iron.

The Witness.

The Sea of Galilee.

The expense of travelling in Palestine, where railways do not exist, and wagons, except from Jaffa to Jerusalem and from Haifa to Nazareth, are never seen, depends very much upon the style in which you journey. If you hire a dragoman and instruct him to furnish tents and provide good warm meals on the way, it will cost at least $5.00 a day. For our trip from Jerusalem to the Dead Sea (three days on which we had a dragoman and guard, who provided everything needful, including lodging at the convents of Mar Saba and Jericho) we paid $4.25 each, per day. Coming to Nazareth, four days, in the same way, only without guard, and providing our own lodging and provisions, the dragoman's pay alone was three dollars each, per day. This time we tried another plan, which worked well and reduced our expenses very much. With the assistance of the kind monk at the convent in Nazareth, Father Giovanni, we hired two horses and a young man to attend and guide us, for only a dollar a day each, and our other expenses were but trifling.

We left Nazareth early in the morning and passed by Cana of Galilee, where we rested about an hour to read the Scriptural account of Christ's turning the water into wine. Just as we arrived a funeral procession was leaving the village. It was joined by nearly all the inhabitants of the place. I should think, and there was the loud chanting of the hired mourners, the firing of guns and other noisy demonstrations. While the men were consigning the remains of the departed to their last resting place on the brow of a hill near by, the women gathered on the plain below, the relatives sitting and weeping, others forming a circle, within which two or three of the number danced wildly about, with uplifted arms, and uttering loud plaintive cries. I saw one girl near the men who seemed wild and frantic with grief.

Another interesting spot noticed on our way were the Horns of Hattin, a mountain with twin peaks and a level place near the top, which might be called a plain. Many think this the Mount of Beatitudes.

At Tiberias, the only village of any importance on the lake, we spent the night. It is noted for fleas. The Sultan of the colony is said to live there, and the Pasha at Jenin. We can add our testimony as to the immense number of their adherents in both places.

The second day we made an excursion as far as the entrance of the Jordan on the north, a four hours' ride. A little above the mouth of the river we saw a fishing boat, and a couple of fishermen lounging on the grass. We offered them backsheesh, and they took us across to the other side, and we spent a few minutes in the land of Moab.

The ride to-day was a very delightful one, and full of interest. The weather was superb, all that a confirmed invalid could ask. There were beautiful oleanders in blossom along the pathway; at times we rode along the beach completely strewn with shells of almost infinitesimal size; then there were fountains, and ripe barley fields; and often we were accompanied by a troop of armed Bedouins, causing the imagination to picture romantic incidents that might happen.

We passed Magdala, and lingered on the sites of Bethsaida and Capernaum, the latter Christ's own city, and where he worked so many mighty miracles. Though once exalted unto heaven, now a mass of debris and loose stones overgrown with weeds hardly serve to indicate their former position. Indeed travelers disagree as to which is Bethsaida and which is Capernaum.

The next day we rode down to the exit of the Jordan on the south, and I swam across the river and stood in the country of Moab again. In the evening we were joined by our old friends, who came with us from Jerusalem, and we hired a boat and spent an hour upon the tranquil bosom of the lake. How much of our Savior's life after he left Nazareth was spent upon these shores! Here he called his disciples and worked so many of his mightiest miracles, and taught the sublimest truth to poor fallen humanity. It was a joy to think we had walked along the same shore on which he walked; these were the same mountains upon which he gazed, and to whose solitudes he retired to pray. To these deep blue waves, when lashed to fury by the storm, he said "Peace, be still!" Surely no other locality in all the Holy Land, unless it be Jerusalem, is so intimately associated with the name of Jesus as the Sea of Galilee. In the words of McCheyne,

"How pleasant to see thy deep blue wave,
O Sea of Galilee!
For the glorious One who came to save
Hath often stood by thee.

"On every mound and hoary steep
That circles round the sparkling deep,
Thou calm-reposing sea;
But oh! far more, the beautiful feet
Of Jesus walked o'er thee."

The Arch of Titus.

Prof. J. W. McGarvey, of Lexington, Ky., last year visited Rome on his way to Palestine, and reported his travels in the St. Louis Christian. The following from one of his letters is interesting when taken in connection with such passages as Deut. xxviii. 49-57; Dan. ix. 26, 27; John xi. 49; Luke xix. 41-44; xxi. 20-24.

"We next saw the arch of Titus, the first object which brought us into direct contact with Sacred History. Here stands an arch of marble spanning the street, and supported by heavy buttresses of the same material, erected by Titus to commemorate his conquest of Jerusalem in the year 70. Our carriage stopped under it, and to our left, a little above our heads, was a group of sculptured figures representing Jews carrying the golden candlestick, and the golden table of shew-bread, on bars of wood covered with gold resting on their shoulders. No words could be written or printed to correspond more exactly with the description of these vessels found in the book of Exodus. Here, then, is a heathen monument, erected by the very man who destroyed the temple of God, and standing entire after the lapse of more than 1800 years, to attest the accuracy of sacred history."

The Day of Salvation.

How often we delight ourselves with hopes, and distress ourselves with fears concerning the time to come. We think of the day of death, of the day of judgment, with their mighty issues, and inquire, How shall it be with us in that day? There is a far more important question: How is it with us now? Our future is decided by our present. What we desire to be hereafter we may be now. Do we wish to be saved in the day of judgment? Undoubtedly we do. But if we do, our only reasonable way of securing our desire is to be saved to-day. Right here, in this present moment, in this present hour, God calls on us to settle the question of salvation for eternity. We need not be anxious about the dying bed. We need not inquire curiously, "How shall it fare with us when the judge of quick and dead appears?" The great question is, How is it with us to-day? Are we saved or are we lost? Are we within the ark of God, or are we without, awaiting the storm of vengeance that shall burst upon the world? A life of sin brings a death of sorrow; while if we to-day know and serve the Lord, we shall have boldness in the day of judgment and no fear shall assail us there. Let us see to it that this question is rightly settled, and settled to-day, and settled as we shall wish it to be settled when we come to stand face to face with the judgment day, and the judge of quick and dead. "Behold now is the accepted time; behold now is the day of salvation." H. L. H.

The Standard, for Me.]

Eternal Punishment.

Belief in the dogma of eternal torment (we speak with all possible deference for the feelings of those who suppose themselves bound to uphold it) is incompatible with a moral conception of the nature of the Deity; and when it is combined with predestination, its reception can be explained only by the facility with which people will go on repeating a traditional creed, and even arguing metaphysically in support of it, without realizing its mortal import. Edwards, who is the great metaphysical reasoner in support of this doctrine, manifestly recoils from his own moral conclusions. He may well do so; and the stone which his unidentified genius has helped to tie round the neck of Christianity must be cast off, or it will sink the religion.

BREVITIES.

There are eight complete translations of the Bible in the languages of the South Sea Islands and New Zealand.

In common with many other perfumes and rich spices, the myrrh of Scripture has never been positively identified. Those who have sent specimens from Arabia, as the genuine myrrh-bearing plant have sent different things. It is generally believed to come from Balsamodendron Myrrha. There seems to be no doubt that different varieties are obtained from various species.

Dr. T. J. Conant, who has been at work on a translation of the Old Testament for the last twenty years, but was interrupted by the financial difficulties of the society for which he labored, will now be enabled to finish the work, Captain Ebenezer Morgan, a wealthy and liberal-minded citizen of Groton, Connecticut, having given the sum of $25,000 to defray all expenses.

THE GOSPEL IN GOLD AND SILVER LETTERS.

A valuable and interesting manuscript has been discovered by two German scholars. They were searching through the libraries of Southern Italy and Sicily, when they came upon an ancient manuscript in the Palace of the Archbishop of Rossano. On examination it was found to contain the Gospel of Matthew and the Gospel of Mark as far as the fourteenth verse of the sixteenth chapter. Scholars believe it was written in the fifth century, and it is in excellent preservation. The leaves of this manuscript are made of purple parchment, and the material used throughout in writing is silver, except in the first three lines of each gospel, where the letters are golden. There is only one other manuscript of this kind in existence, containing any portion of the New Testament, and it is in a mutilated condition, four of its leaves being in London, six in Rome, two in Vienna, and thirty-three have been more recently discovered in the island of Patmos.

Out of 850 localities mentioned in Scripture 600 have been identified by modern investigation, either with certainty, or with great probability. Most of the unknown places are to be sought in the Sinaitic Desert, or east of Jordan. The famous Springs of Scripture can all be identified, and have still a good supply of water. The rivers are still perennial, and the "depths" (Deut. viii. 7) are recognized in the fathomless pools from which such streams as the Abana (now Barada), near Damascus, spring up full-grown rivers, almost as broad at their sources as at their mouths. The districts called "dry" or "desert" in the Bible (the wilderness of Bethaven, or of Judah, for instance) are now as desolate as of old, and the porous character of the chalk formation renders it a physical impossibility that these regions can ever have been fertile or well watered within historic times.

SENTENTIOUS PARAGRAPHS.

God's forbearance has its appointed limits.

An malarious air may endanger a good constitution, as bad companions endanger a good character.

Adversity is the trial of principle. Without it a man hardly knows whether he is honest or not.

To rejoice in the happiness of others is to make it our own; to produce it is to make it more than our own.

Right habit is like the channel which dictates the course in which the river shall flow, and which grows deeper and deeper with each year.

Life is not done, and our Christian character is not won, so long as God has anything left for us to suffer, or anything left for us to do.

"He still," nor doubt His faithful love,
Though he thy faith and patience prove;
He while he tries thee, through the fire,
Will give thee strength thou dost require.

"He still," thy cares are measured all
By him who notes the sparrow's fall;
There's not a grief which rends thy breast,
But he can chase or calm to rest.

All truly consecrated men learn, little by little, that what they are consecrated to is not joy or sorrow, but a Divine idea and a profound obedience, which can find their full outward expression, not in joy, and not in sorrow, but in the mysterious and inseparable mingling of the two.

No sin, no death, no grief, no tears
Can shade the glory of that home,
Where love shines through endless years,
And flowers in fragrant beauty bloom.
H. Jones.

The surest method of arriving at a knowledge of God's eternal purposes about us is to be found in the right use of the present moment.—F. W. Faber.

There is not a thought, word, or deed, that men have ever been conscious of or done in all their lives but God can bring all to remembrance, though all had been forgotten by the actors.

God's agency does not exclude nor supersede our instrumentality. He gives the increase, but Paul must plant and Apollos water. He furnishes the wind, but we are to spread the sails. He gives, but we gather. Prayers and diligence, dependence and activity, harmonize in the Scripture, and are only inconsistent in the crudeness of ignorant and foolish men.—William Jay.

Just beyond this world of sorrow
There's a land all fair and bright,
By the mists of death's dark river,
Hidden from our mortal sight.
Eye hath never seen its glory,
Ear hath never heard it told,
Heart cannot conceive its beauty,
With its streets of shining gold.

With life's river clear as crystal,
Flowing from the great white throne,—
Gates of pearl and walls of jasper,
Built with many a precious stone;
Tree of life, whose fruit never faileth,
Sweetest flowers which never fade,
Many mansions everlasting,
By our Heavenly Father made.

Thomas, the Sceptic.

He would not be contented with seeing Christ—that might be a dream, it might be the vision of a disordered fancy. He would not be satisfied with the assurance of others. The evidence of testimony which he did reject was very strong: ten of his most familiar friends, and certain women, gave in their separate and their united testimony; but against all that St. Thomas held out sceptically firm. They might have been deceived themselves; they might have been trifling with him. The possibilities of a mistake were innumerable; the delusions of the best men about what they see are incredible. He would trust a thing so infinitely important to nothing but his own scrutinizing hand. It might be some one personating his Master. He would put his hands into real wounds, or else hold it unproved. The allegiance which was given in so enthusiastically, "My Lord and My God," was given in after, and not before, scrutiny. It was the cautious verdict of an enlightened, suspicious, most earnest, and most honest sceptic.—F. W. Robertson.

Everlasting Punishment.

The doctrine of everlasting punishment, as it is held to day, is, that man is sent into this world by his Maker in such a condition that he is capable of plunging himself into eternal ruin by what he can do in this world, so that he may reach a state in which he may be for ever and for ever a sufferer, without any power of reform or return. Now, there is not a man, I will not say a good man, I will not say a saint; but there is not a decent man, with decent human feelings, who would be willing to be accused of such a thing as is thus ascribed to the Almighty. It is one of the saddest things in the world that theology can so pervert the common human sense and human heart that we can ascribe to the infinite blessedness and the infinite love that which we should consider disgraceful, if performed by a human being. J. F. Clarke.

POETRY.

Unheeded Psalms.

God hath his solitudes, unpeopled yet,
Save by the peaceful life of bird and flower,
Where, since the world's foundation, he hath set
Th. Lasting of his power.

Year after year his rains make fresh and green
Lone wastes of prairie, where, as daylight flies,
Legions of bright-hued blossoms all unseen
Their carven petals close.

Year after year unnumbered forest leaves
Expand and darken to their perfect prime;
Each smallest growth -- alas thy achieve-
Ments, appointed time.

Amid the strong recesses of the hills,
Fixed by His word, immutable and calm,
The murmuring river all the silence fills
With its unhindered psalm.

From deep to deep the floods lift up their voice
Because He hand hath measured them of old;
The far outgoings of the morn rejoice
His wonders to unfold.

The smallest conflict wrecked in distant storms,
That wanders boundless through the summer skies,
Is reckoned in His purposes, and forms
One of His augories.

Where, the perpetual mountains patient wait,
Girded with purity, before His throne,
Keeping from age to age fortotate
Their everlasting crown;

Where the long-gathering waves of ocean break
With ceaseless music o'er untrodden strands,
From isles that day by day in silence wake,
From earth's remotest lands,

The anthem of His praise shall uttered be;
All works created on His name shall call,
And land and they His holy name, for He Hath pleasure on them all.

LETTER DRAWER.

Editor Restitution:—I send you $2, being my subscription to May 1, 1881, I am a little behind time for which I trust you will excuse me. There are some good things in THE RESTITUTION on the reign of the King in Mount Zion in the soon coming age, which seems to be close at hand. The signs in the political heavens appear to be working into that condition that will bring the Gog of the north quarters with his mighty hosts on to the mountains of Israel to the battle of Armageddon. I trust we shall be found worthy by being obedient to the faith and walking in the statutes of God and of Jesus Christ our Lord.

I send my best respects in particular to Brethren Magruder, Stephenson, Weethee, Myers, &c., not forgetting the other brethren and sisters who give words of comfort and admonition to the household, which is meat in due season.

I am not much used to writing, if I was, I should like to write somewhat more. Please excuse my weakness.

I remain your well wisher, trusting that you will remain faithful unto the end, so that you may have a portion in the glory soon to be revealed.

Editor Restitution:—Enclosed find one dollar, which please apply on my subscription to THE RESTITUTION. I prize the paper very highly, its weekly visits are to me a rich entertainment. I should be pleased to hear more editorially but I suppose you are kept well supplied with manuscript articles. Many at this time I think would halt with joy a few bold, stirring articles on practical Christianity, especially on a complete separation from the world politically and religiously. I think too little attention is given this subject. Its importance demands the attention of all who are expecting the return of our Lord. I desire to be found occupying a position that will be approved by the Life Giver.

I do not wish to form any unholy alliance with the world socially, politically or religiously, that will shut me out of the kingdom of God. I earnestly exhort those who are now entangled with the world to sever your connection and stand boldly for the truth. It will make us unpopular with the world, but let us remember that the friendship of the world is enmity against God. If God is our friend we can afford to be hated of the world. Yours for the truth.

Editor Restitution: It becomes necessary that I should inform the brethren what we are doing for the truth in this part of Kansas. Brother John Foore, has just closed a discussion with Elder Murry, of the Campbellite Church, in which Elder M., affirmed the conscious state of the spirit after death. It is hardly needful to say that Elder M., made a most complete failure, not being able to give one text that said, the spirit was conscious while the body was dead. Although the proof was called for time and again, Elder M., got in a wonderful hurry to close the debate before we reached the last session, saying he had an appointment to meet that night; although the elder came over to debate three propositions and only discussed one, the others being put off until September. I think it justly due to Brother Foore and our cause that we set this discussion down as a most complete victory.

Yours in hope of eternal life,

J. M. LEWELLEN.

Towson, Kansas.

Editor Restitution:—It is a long time since I have written to you, I therefore, seated myself this morning to write a few thoughts of my life. In the past seven or eight months I have been well as far as health is concerned, although we had an awful Kansas drouth which destroyed almost the entire wheat crop in north-western Kansas. Corn promises fair, although a person cannot know whether it will amount to anything, as the army worm is working on it now to some extent. There will not be enough grass in these parts for hay. The drouth was severe. Wheat was only one tenth of a crop here this year. It only turns out, as a general result, about two buskels to the acre of what has been cut. Some was not fit to harvest. Dear editor, I am in arrears now on THE RESTITUTION, although I have had bad mishaps since I came on Kansas soil. I came here with a moderately good team about a year and a half ago and I could not get grain to feed it; one died, and so my team was broken up; and last winter I had to sell the other. I have a government claim, but no team or cow, or no stock of any kind; only a few chickens. I have a very nice claim; only about seven miles from the county seat, but the shape the drouth has left me in and the scarcity of labor in this part of Kansas with the family I have to support, and then nothing but corn, dry bread to eat, I cannot now renew my subscription. We are just about naked. Although I prize THE RESTITUTION as one of the most valuable treasures I have, except my Bibles. Dear editor, I have preached about seventy-five sermons since New Year's, on the Gospel and the Glorious Reign of the Christ and his Saints, and the Budding of Israel as the Head of Nations and not the Tail; also the Kingdom to Israel Restored; and I calculate, if I have life and health, to proclaim these glorious truths of the Deity and kindred truth, till the Master comes, or till I am dead. Dear editor, I should like a lot of Bible Pearls to scatter among a dying people, and scatter the good seed in every way, but I have no means at my command to send for them. Dear editor, will you say to the scattered few of Kansas and Nebraska that I will labor in the gospel field wherever I am wanted? I will close by saying, I watch and pray for the return of the Master, and the setting up of his kingdom.

Your brother,

DANIEL FIKE.

Station, Kan.

Editor Restitution:—I do not regret to see, what I believe to be, a spirit of greater liberality and generosity shown by some of the writers in THE RESTITUTION. I think we all, to a greater or less extent, have been the victims of exclusive illiberality. I plead guilty to the greater degree. We have not studied the mercy of God as he has promised to manifest it to the sons of men, but have contemplated rather with satisfaction the threatened destruction of the wicked. We have manifested the spirit of Jonah complaining to God of his extreme mercy, not the spirit of Abraham. If there be fifty, if forty-five, if forty, if thirty, if twenty, if ten, God spare, nor the spirit of Moses interceding for the rebellious, nor the spirit of Christ. "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." No allowance has we made for lack of opportunity or ignorance, but we have indiscriminately denounced "outsiders." What is Christianity? that is the question. And what is a Christian? Is it the man that practices the spirit of the "gentle Nazarene" from the heart, or he that has the letter in the head? Have only those the promise of salvation that have walked up to the stern letter in the fulness of knowledge? Nay; but those also who, by reason of limited opportunities and knowledge have blindly practiced the spirit, for "unto whom much is given, much is required, and unto whom little is given little is required."

It is not the laws of God that govern; it is God that governs; laws or rules require exact precision in obedience, but pardon is at the option of the governor. Law is necessary, but it is neither justice nor is it mercy. God makes no laws to govern himself and no rule to which he cannot take exception, and even the creature is allowed, in certain circumstances, to take exception. "Have ye not read what David how he went into the temple on the Sabbath day and ate the showbread that it is not lawful for any but the priests to eat?" Of course, this does not enumerate the instructed. "The servant that knoweth his lord's will and doeth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes;" but it is a great comfort to us in considering the case of others who have not had opportunities of scriptural instruction like ourselves or who were prevented by circumstances over which they had no control from knowing and doing. In considering the question of baptism, for instance, brethren, don't forget this standard principle, that the Lord God is merciful and gracious; that God is love, willing to take the will for the deed and the little for the much where the spirit is; witness Abraham's offering and the widow's mite. Remember he is not an austere being, reaping where he has not sown, gathering where he has not strewed. Some of us may have to work all day for our penny. Let us be thankful, for the remuneration is ample. Others may drop in at the last hour. Do you grumble? And even if the husbandman goes outside the vineyard and distributes his liberality around to those who were ignorant of the vastness of his wealth and the depth of his generosity. Suppose such a thing, who can find fault? Witness, then, the surprise of such, when they exclaim, "Lord, when saw we thee an hungered and fed thee, or thirsty, and gave thee drink, naked or a stranger, and took thee in?" The gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, but behind even the gospel the person Jesus of Nazareth stands, whoso believeth on him hath life. We may discriminate as to who believes and who does not, but our discrimination will not be taken into consideration. The gospel is a rule, a law as it were; the man Christ Jesus is a judge, a good one and a merciful one.

Editor Restitution:—I have delayed writing in order to obtain my subscription money, as times are pretty hard here in the west on account of light wheat crops the two last seasons, and, at the present time, the chintz bugs are doing great damage in this part of the country, and, consequently, we have not money always at command. But I don't feel willing to deprive myself of the comfort I take in reading THE RESTITUTION for the small amount it costs. The news from the Holy Land is worth more to me than the subscription money the year round, besides letters and articles from some of my brethren in Christ with whom I have taken sweet counsel in former years. Was glad to see their names in the paper, and to hear they are still trying to fight their way through to the kingdom, but not with carnal weapons, but with the old Jerusalem blade—the Word of God. May God speed them on their way. I once attended a three day's discussion between Brother Corbaley and Mr. Walker, a Campbellite, of Kokomo, Indiana, on the Kingdom, Nature of Man and the Destiny of the Wicked, which, forever confirmed it in my mind, that we are right on those points. It was held at the little German school house in Miami county, Indiana, in the year of 1865 or 1866; Elders John Foore and Wm. Coffel being present. Their names and labor for the truth are not forgotten. I have anxiously looked for other names; have been favored with seeing two of my old neighbors' boys, J. S. Hatch and W. B. Fennimore; glad to hear they are in the Advent ranks, and hope they will be faithful and gather many sheaves for our Masters garner. Brethren and sisters, write, and exhort, and encourage one another, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching; for we are certainly in perilous times, and the love of many is waxing cold, but he that endures to the end, the same shall be saved.

Pilgrim on, the day is dawning;
Strike your tents and homeward bend;
Wait not till the blush of morning
Calls you from the desert waste.

Budding fig-tree tells that summer
Hasting o'er the land;
Signs portend that Jesus' coming
Is near at hand.

Your sister in Christ, watching and waiting for the kingdom.

ELIZA WILKINSON.

Editor Restitution:—I would again report progress in Omaha. Last first day I had the privilege of helping three to put on Christ, in the act of baptism, and thus become united with the household of faith, making six additions; we now number ten, with meetings every first day, and the breaking of the loaf as often as we can get together for that purpose, as we are somewhat scattered. I have calls from different parts, more than I can attend to. The times of the Gentiles are undoubtedly drawing to a close. Our labor in gathering in from the highways and hedges will soon be closed, and the sheaves be gathered home. Yes, angels will shout the harvest home. Then there will be rest, yea, rest for the weary. Brethren and sisters, are we ready, are our lamps trimmed and burning? The times are being hemmed for the burning—let us be careful that we are not bound with them. All classes of men are being bundled up, combined together. Matt. xiii. 30. The time of harvest is at hand, the wheat will soon be wanted to execute the judgments written. What a privilege to be a child of God, one of the royal family, to be associated with our living head in the government of the world, having power over the nations. He that hath this hope purifieth himself and is waiting for the return of the Great King. Morn anon.

W. S. FINS.

Editor Restitution:—I find my subscription has run out and I cannot do without THE RESTITUTION as long as I can get anything to pay for it. I am satisfied that it is the most faithful expounder of the Scriptures there is published, and, although the "watchmen do not yet see eye to eye," I believe they all desire truth, and will continue to search and learn till the Lord shall bring again Zion. Fearful and trying times are before us. We need much faith and grace, and, above all, patience, to endure and overcome. I am far from all of like precious faith while at home, as I have been for several months, trying to assist others in bearing the trials and burdens of this mortal life. Have been very weary many times while watching the sick and caring for the well ones. There is very much being published upon the "perihelia of the planets," and the awful state of things that will ensue in consequence. Is it not synonymous with the "time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation?" According to Prof. Grimmer's prediction, it will be a fulfillment of our Savior's prophecy of things to come upon the earth prior to his second advent, and, O, how it becomes us to "watch and be sober," as the Judge standeth before the door. May the God of Israel grant us grace and help us to "lay aside every weight, and run with patience the race set before us, looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith, who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross and despised the shame, and is set down on the right hand of the Majesty on high." Who will be accounted worthy to escape all these things and to stand before the Son of Man? Those who have the privilege of assembling themselves together and exhorting one another do not appreciate the blessing I fear, always, or think of the lonely and scattered ones. Brethren and sisters, remember such, especially in your devotions I pray, and may we all be "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time."

Your sister in faith and hope.

Conference Report.

The annual Conference of the Church of God met, pursuant to previous notice, at Remington, Ind., on August 12, 1880. The election of officers was as follows: R. S. Dwiggins, president; A. B. Oppy, secretary; J. O. B. McDougle, treasurer. Committee on arrangements: Alfred Thompson, William Mills, J. O. B. McDougle. The attendance from abroad was not as large as was expected. Brother Richard Corbaley, of California, and Brother D. T. Halstead, arrived on the first day of the meeting, by whom the preaching was done. Brother Corbaley preaching most of the time; he fully sustaining his reputation as a workman that needeth not to be ashamed. The preaching was practical, pointed and much to the acceptance and comfort of the believers in the Christ. The social meetings were made quite interesting by cheering words and exhortations by many of the brethren present. The community manifested a great desire for the truth by giving marked attention and increasing audiences to the close of the meetings. On Lord's Day, two brothers and one sister, very intelligent believers, were inducted into the Christ by baptism. The meeting closed Lord's Day night in perfect harmony, and the best of feeling resulting, we trust, in the encouragement, strengthening and upbuilding of the waiting ones in their most holy faith; also exerting and leaving an influence for good on the community.

"Credits."

Some misunderstanding having arisen concerning the credits for money received at this office, a word of explanation may not be out of place. The person sending money receives the receipt. This may not be right in many instances, but is in the majority. For instance:—A sends a letter with $1.00, and says: "Give me credit on my subscription for $2.00, and for the other $2.00, send the paper one year to B." The natural supposition, in that case, is that A is sending the paper to B as a present, and it would be nonsense to send B a receipt for $2.00, when the facts are he never sent it. Again: A sends $4.00, and says: "Find enclosed $4.00, $2.00 of which is for my subscription, and the other $2.00, B handed me to send with mine. Please give him credit for B." Then I know just what to do, viz., Put B sends $2.00, and must have the receipt the same as if he had sent it in a letter of his own. But suppose A had said nothing about B having loaned him the money to send, (as is the case nearly always) how can I know but he is sending it himself. I cannot tell, therefore am compelled to give A the whole credit, in which case no one will think for a moment that on the subscription book and mail list B does not get the amount placed to him, as A has instructed. Our friends will take notice of this and when they send for others, if the credit is not to be given to them, state explicitly who to give it to. Otherwise they will receive it.

RESTITUTION FUND.

AKRON, Fulton Co., Ind., Nov. 29, 1880.

Editor Restitution—With your permission I will make an appeal to the brethren for help to support THE RESTITUTION for the year to send issues by weekly visits.

Now, dear brethren, I call upon one and all who love themselves side, to donate to the cause of Christ the small amount of $3.00 between this and the first of January.

Dear brethren, we could do this with a few exceptions, if we just thought so. I am well aware that some brethren have contributed nobly, but I make this appeal in a special manner to those who have become of late rather backsliding as a first will offering.

Dear brethren, do not say, I am too poor! Perhaps you are using that useless weed, tobacco, in some form. Quickly for our consecration are we when called to be the chosen of God so greatly afflicted that we cannot support a weekly paper.

We do hope that every one will respond to this appeal. Please let us hear from all those who cannot or will not pay the $3.00, and will they please give us their reasons. I am also a poor man. My name is Abraham Fouthous. I am 67 years old and have a large family to support. I have a small farm of 80 acres. I farm and work at the carpenter's trade to support my family. I use neither tobacco nor intoxicating liquor.

And, dear Editor, I will enclose a few cents more on. I read THE RESTITUTION, and the Bible, and I hope to see you all in that coming kingdom. So, farewell.

ABRAHAM FOUTHOUS.

POETRY.

"Life Hath Its Shadows but a Promise Given, Lights the Future With a Fadeless Ray."

W. L. CROCKETT.

Before me rise the mountains,
And the clouds hang o'er them
Threatening and dark,
But beyond them I can see
A line of golden light, and sea of blue
And floating isles of purest white.
It is a picture of our lives;
Above us hang dark clouds
And before us the huge barrier
Of prejudice rears its frowning height.
But looking upward we can see
Beyond our sorrow, and be made to know,
That the summit of all earthly ills
Reaches not to the heavens.
That there is a fairer sky
Lit with the pure light of hope.
That gilds earth's gloominess, and shines
Unceasingly, with steady burnished rays
Upon the clearly marked yet narrow way
That leadeth unto God.
Each day that dawns upon us
Brings some undeserved good.
Be it dark, or fair,
Crowned with the splendor of the sun,
Or in garb of mourning dressed
It has for us a blessing.
We cannot see through all;
We know the flower must droop
And fade; yet time reveals
Where once did bloom the flower
We gather the ripened fruit.
We stand like one who stands upon
The ocean's boundless shore,
And sees the gloomy cloud
And maddened waves rush by;
And fearful of each wave
That thunders at our feet,
How oft we fail to realize
That hem all it plows
The wondrous precious pearls

The Bible Versus Trinitarianism.—No. I.

"And the word was God."

The first chapter of John is considered by Trinitarians the great bulwark of their doctrine. When dispossessed of their smaller and weaker fortifications, they fall back on this one as confidently as if they had never suffered defeat or lost a gun. Although every other fortress be dismantled and every gun taken and spiked, they have the fullest confidence that here they can make a stand and forever maintain their position.

It is true if they cannot defend themselves here, nay, if they cannot here assume the offensive, and carry the battle to the very gates of the enemy, and take possession; if they cannot here overthrow the opposing force; in a word, if they cannot prove from this chapter that Christ is the supreme God, the creator of the heavens and the earth, they may as well surrender at once, when their strongest fortress is taken, and their heaviest artillery is turned against them.

That this introduction to John's Gospel has been wofully misunderstood and most erroneously interpreted, I shall be able to show, I think, to the satisfaction of every reasonable and candid mind.

The first question to settle is, shall we so interpret John's language as to make him contradict the explicit words of his Master recorded in John xvii. 3, and the positive language of Paul, 1 Cor. viii. 6, and also contradict his own teaching in all of his epistles? Or shall we not rather so explain it as to be in harmony with all these, and in harmony with reason and stubborn facts?

To show that Trinitarians do so interpret John's language as to make him contradict his Master, it is only necessary to refer to 1 John v. 20, and compare their understanding of it with the words of Christ as recorded by John himself.

They claim that the expressions—"him that is true," and "this is the true God" refer to Christ instead of to the Father. And I suppose they base this claim on the evident error of the translators in supplying the word "even"—which has no corresponding word in the Greek—where they should have put the word "and."

The text (with its palpable meaning in brackets) is as follows: "And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true [which is the Father]; and we are in him [the Father] that is true; and in his Son Jesus Christ.

This [referring to him that is true—the Father,] is the true God and eternal life."

What similarity of expression, and how harmonious is the language and sentiment of the beloved disciple, as above explained, with the following words of his Master as recorded by John (vii. 28, 29; xvii 3): "And I am not come of myself, but he that sent me is true, whom ye know not. But I know him, for I am from him, and he hath sent me." "This is eternal life that they may know thee the only true God; and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."

In further proof that their interpretation of John's introduction makes him contradict himself I quote his language as recorded John xx. 31: "But these (things) are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the true God; no, but the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name."

He does not say that he wrote to affirm that Jesus existed from the beginning as God the Word, or God the Son, equal to God the Father, but to show that he was the Christ, and "the only begotten Son of God."

When our Lord asked his disciples whom they thought him to be, "Peter answereth and saith unto him Thou art the Christ the Son of the living God." And Christ did not correct him.

It will be well to remember then, as we approach this chapter, that Christ never claimed to be more than the Son of God and the Son of Man, and that the inspired apostles would not claim for him more than he claimed for himself.

John begins his Gospel so unlike the other evangelists that a reference to the peculiar circumstances under which his noted introduction was written, will make his design more apparent, and the terms he employs more significant. And for this purpose I will here introduce a scrap of history taken from Forrest's History of the Trinity.

"It was the basis of the Gnostic philosophy, that all matter was essentially evil, and an annoyance to what was spiritual; but that God, on the other hand, was a benevolent Being, perfectly free from evil."—Mosheim.

"The Gnostics expected that the all benevolent God would send a Divine messenger, who should be a purely spiritual being, one of the Eons (an Emanation from the Supreme Mind) out of his fulness for the purpose of delivering mankind from their subjection to the evils that result from matter. When, therefore, some of them saw or heard of the miracles of our Savior, and could not resist the conviction that he was ordained of God, performing wonders by God's power, they found themselves compelled, on confessing his claims as the expected means of deliverance, either to renounce the opinion which led them to expect a purely spiritual Eon, or else to reconcile our Savior's circumstances with their preconceived and still loved view. Accordingly they took the latter alternative. They invented the hypothesis, that Jesus of Nazareth, the person who taught, wrought miracles, lived a life of holiness and piety, suffered, died, and rose again, was not actually the Christ, but rather a shrine or receptacle in which the Christ, a Divine Eon, who was entirely spiritual, dwelt for a certain period of time. Some of them said that Jesus of Nazareth, the shrine in which the Christ dwelt, was a human being; these were they who, whatever their name at first, were soon called Cerinthians, after their principal guide Cerinthius. Others said that Jesus of Nazareth, the mask under which the Christ dwelt, was a phantom, or human being in appearance; these were the Docetes. But both equally denied that the Christ or Divine Eon, had come in the flesh. Both maintained that the Christ was an invisible spiritual being, while that which was visible, whether a man or a phantom, was only Jesus of Nazareth. Against both parties, most probable, St. John wrote, declaring that Christ had actually come in the flesh—that Jesus is the Son of God.

"Irenius, also writes in order to correct the false theory that the Messiah was a dual being—a spiritual Eon and a man:—He says: "The Gospel acknowledges no other Son of Mary except him who was born of Mary, and who suffered. It knows nothing of the Christ flying from Jesus previous to his passion. It knows only him who was born, viz: Jesus, the Christ, the Son of God, who, still the same person, suffered and rose again from the dead; as John, the disciple of the Lord confirms, saying. But these are written, that, believing, ye might have life through his name; guarding against those blasphemous doctrines which divide the Lord, as much as possible affirming him to consist of this substance and of the other. On which account, also, he (John) hath testified in his epistle; Little children, it is the last time, and as ye have heard that Antichrist shall come, even now are there many Antichrists; whereby we know it is the last time. They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us; but they went out that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us. 1 John ii. 18, 19. Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ. 1 John ii. 22. This is Antichrist.—That homicidal opinion of theirs, which diminishes and divides into pieces the Son of God, was what the Lord forewarned us to beware of, and what his apostle John, in his epistle, enjoins us to shun saying, For many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and Antichrist. Look to yourselves (ye) lose not those things which (ye) have wrought. And again; in his epistle, he says, Many false prophets are gone out into the world. Hereby know ye the spirit of God; every spirit that confesses that Jesus Christ is come in flesh, is of God; and every spirit that divides Jesus Christ is not of God, but of Antichrist. On which account he again says in his epistle, 'Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God,' well knowing that Jesus the Christ is one and the same, to whom the gates of heaven were opened;—who shall also in the very same flesh in which he suffered come again, revealing the glory of the Father."

"That John, in an indirect manner, combatted this Gnostico philosophy," says Mr. Forrest, "is proved by three considerations.

1. The terms which he uses, as the "word," "light," "the life," were terms which were employed as common phraseology among the Gnostics. We do not find such a string of terms in the other Gospels. But John, living at Ephesus, where these words had been brought into notice, doubtless took them up in order to oppose the philosophy of which they were the nomenclature.

2. "Several positions which John lays down are actually in antithesis to positions of the Gnostics.

(1). "The Gnostics entertained the idea of a Divine Being distinct from God and inferior to him, called the "word." In opposition to this, John declares that the word was not a distinct being, but belonged to God, and was God himself.

(2). "As a consequence of this fundamental doctrine, that all matter is essentially evil, while God is a being of perfect benevolence, the Gnostics held a peculiar opinion concerning creation. They said creation was not the work of God himself, but of a being less perfect than God, (Mosheim) who might, consistently with his imperfect nature, employ himself in the composition and arrangement of material objects, (which were not essentially evil,) a work in which the all-benevolent God could not properly engage. In opposition to this view of a creator different from God, the Almighty Father, John delares that it was God himself who made all things through means of his own word of power.

(3, 4). "It was a part of the Gnostic philosophy that there were various Eons, Emanations from the Supreme Mind, two of which were called Life and Light.—Michaelis.

In reply to this, we are informed by John that whatever was understood by life lay entirely in the word of God, and that this life was the light of men, there being no distinct Eons bearing their names.

(5). "The Gnostics probably had some peculiar tenet concerning darkness. If they had, John turns aside their opinion by stating that what he knew about darkness amounted simply to its not having detracted from the lustre of the light of God.

"Notice, however, must be taken here of a statement which John has made, which is not opposed to the Gnostics in general, but to another class, who may have been tinged in some points with this philosophy. "He (John the Baptist) was not that light," or the bearer of that light. Verse 8. Had any one said that John the Baptist was that light? It appears so. It appears that a body of men then existed, who believed in John the Baptist as the Messiah, or light of the world.—Michaelis. Against these, the Evangelist probably penned the eighth verse. This sect, who were called Sabians, which signifies Baptists, are still in existence in the East, holding their peculiar faith.—Ibid.

2. "We have the testimony of Irenius" (disciple of Polycarp who was the disciple of St. John) "that John wrote against the Gnostics in his introduction. He believed the deity of Christ, but confessed him to have been inferior to God, his Father. But his belief, whether it induced him or not always to attach personality to the "word" in John's introduction, does not weaken his testimony to its having been composed in opposition to the Gnostics, for he might have his own view as to the manner of opposition. Irenius says: "John the disciple of the Lord, desiring by the publication of his Gospel to root out the error which had been sown among men by Cerinthius, and some time before by those who are called Nicolaitans (Gnostics) who are a branch of that science, which is falsely so called, that he might confute them, and satisfy all that there is one God, who made all things by his word, and not as they say, one who is the Creator of the universe, and another the Father of the Lord, etc.; the disciple, therefore, of the Lord wishing to cut off these errors, and to appoint a rule of truth in the church that there is one God Almighty, who by his word made all thing, visible and invisible; declaring also that ! , the word by which God finished the creation, by the same word he bestowed salvation upon those who were in the creation, begins his doctrine which is according to the Gospel, 'In the beginning was the word,' etc."

Thus in connection with the above historical facts, we have the testimony of Irenius who must have known through Polycarp the disciple of John what John's knowledge was upon this point, and also his object in using the terms "word," "light," etc.,—which, giving it its proper weight, bears not only heavily, but most fatally against the Trinitarian view.

Being now prepared, as well as our space will admit of, we come directly to the simple, but, as we have seen, the very significant words of John's introduction.

"In the beginning was the word (logos) and the word was with God."

The fundamental error committed in explaining this chapter is the assumption that the word, here spoken of as existing from the beginning, refers to Christ, when John states explicitly that the "word was God." To assume then that he does refer to Christ, is to affirm that John does not mean what he says. There is not in all of the Apostle's writings even an intimation that he could, in this first verse, have referred to Christ. And there is not a passage in the Bible that warrants such assumption.

Why, then, it may be asked, did not John write it: "In the beginning was" God, instead of "word," if indeed he meant God? In reply, I might ask, why did he not write it: "In the beginning was" the Christ, if indeed he referred to Christ and not to God?

But we have already seen why it was that John used this term "word." It was not to represent the Christ, for there is no evidence of this. It has been supposed that St. John confirmed this view in his first Epistle, v. 7, but we have shown in a former number that the words Father, Word, and Holy Ghost, as there penned, are spurious beyond all controversy, having been first written on the margin of the manuscript as an explanatory note, but afterward incorporated in the text with the evident object of fortifying the doctrine of the Trinity.

A reference to a few passages of Scripture will, I think, more fully explain why John used this term.

The fact that all creative power is in, of, from or with God, and that he spoke the worlds into existence by the word of his omnipotent power (the opinion of some scientists to the contrary notwithstanding), sufficiently explains the mode of expressing the thought in his mind in accomplishing the object he had in view, of combatting the peculiar tenet of the Gnostics.

St. Paul says, Heb. xi. 13: "Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God." Does the Apostle here mean that the worlds were created by the Word Christ? Certainly not. What does he mean then? Hesimply means to affirm that he believes the Scriptures when they declare that, "By the word of Jehovah were the heavens made: and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth:" (Psa. xxxiii. 6.) "For he commanded and they were created. He spake and it was done, he commanded and it stood fast." Psa cxlviii. 5; iii. 9.

And Peter testifying says, 2 Pet. iii. 5, 7: "For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the word of God the heavens were (or existed) of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water, perished. But the heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." And Moses says: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. . . . And God said let there be light, and there was light," etc. etc. Thus we have the clearest evidence that it was by the word of God, by the word of command the heavens and the earth were created.

Such being the truth it is very evident that in the use of this term "word," John had no reference to Christ. And another reason why he could not possibly have referred to him is found in the fact that John says the word existed from the beginning, which is understood as having always existed. But this can only be said of the One who is the First Great Cause of all things, the uncreated Jehovah. Christ being the Son of God, and therefore begotten of the Father, at, or before his birth, could not be coeval with his Father. It is surprising that Trinitarians are so blinded by tradition they cannot see that the Father must necessarily exist before the Son in order to beget a Son.

Another error in the supposition that in the expression "with God" the preposition pros implies that two persons are spoken of, the word and God, as though the word, which they say is Christ, existed with God "from the beginning, when, as we have seen, it only implies that the word of power by which God spoke the worlds into existence, was with, in, of, or from him. "He spake and it was done." The truth is, John employs the Greek term logos (without a capital) as a means just as the Psalmist did when he wrote—"By the word of Jehovah were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth."

We here introduce a very striking illustration of the propriety and truthfulness of the above explanation of John's language.

"An American writer," says Mr. Forrest, in his history of the Trinity, "has given a parallel case, which, so far as I can remember, is as follows: 'In the beginning of the war of Independence, there was a hope in America, and that hope was with Washington, and that hope was Washington.' Here, the same person, (continues Mr. Forrest,) is said to have the hope of American freedom lodged with him, and to have been himself that very hope; a method of expression which does not differ in the least from that in John's introduction. And the apostle has used similar language in other parts of his writings. 'Love is of God and God is love.' 1 John iv. 7, 8. 'As he (God) is in the light, and God is light.'"

But let us proceed. In verse 2, John says: "The same [word] was in the beginning with [or from] God as a cause or means." "All things (verse 3) were made by him [or it,] the word of God, and without him [or it] was not anything made that was made." Thus, John confirms the words of the Psalmist—that by the word of Jehovah were the heavens made; and agrees with Paul and Peter whose language I have quoted. Verses 4 and 5, "In him (God) was life (to beget) and the life through the miraculous manifestation in the conception of his only begotten Son] was [or became] the light of men. 'And the light [thus manifested] shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not."

Verses 6 11: "There was a man sent from God, whose name was John. The same came for a witness to bear witness of the light, which was not the word, for "the word was God," but the Son of God] that all men through him [or it, might believe. He was not that light [as some say], but was sent [by God, verse 6] to bear witness [not of the word—God, but] of that light, [Christ].

"That was the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. He was in in the world, and the world was made (not 'by,' but through [or on account of] him, and the world knew him not. He came unto his own, and his own received him not." The Emphatic Diaglott has it: "And the world was [enlightened] through him."

Verse 14: "And the word [which John says 'was God'—not Christ; was made [manifest, or as Paul says: 'God was manifest in the'] flesh [or in the person of his Son] and dwelt among us (and we beheld his glory as of the only begotten of the Father) full of grace and truth."

In concluding this number I will again refer to the pivot on which hangs the correct understanding of this chapter. I think the candid reader has seen in the light of this exposition that John makes a clear distinction between the "word"—God, and the "light"—Christ. The term logos—word, which is in the neuter gender is personified when he says: "And the word was God," and when he says: "All things were made by him." The term "light" which is also in the neuter gender, is personified when he says, "That all men through him might believe."

We have also seen that, "by the word of God" were the heavens and the earth created,—that when darkness brooded over the face of the great deep, the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, and God said, "Let there be light and there was light." When he said, "Let the dry land appear, it was so." Thus, when God spoke the word, it was done, when he commanded it stood fast.

And, again, when this wonderful word of Omnipotence is manifested on the plains of Bethlehem in the miraculous conception, at the appointed time the true light of this fallen world appears. And, as the shepherds watch their flocks by night, the angel of the Lord descends and says: "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people; for unto you is born this day in the city of David, a Savior, which is Christ the Lord. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying, glory to God in the highest, peace on earth and good will to men."

And, now, let it be remembered that this divine personage, this "only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth," by the authority of him who created the universe, by the sanctity of his holy mission, attested by the wonderful miracles he performed, has said in that memorable prayer to his Father: "This is eternal life that they may know thee, the only true God; and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent."

An Admonition.

"Let your light so shine that others, seeing your good works, may be led to glorify your Father which is in heaven."

It is not for honor or worldly interest that I write, but with a prayerful and trembling anxiety for the interest of our beloved brethren. There are so many temptations thrown around our pathway that we tremble lest, in the great darkness, we stumble and fall, and in our fears we are led to cry out, "Oh, Father, shield us by thy loving care and lead us by thy spirit away from worldly enjoyments, and bid us live nearer to thee, nearer to thy Word, nearer to the path that leads to immortality in the near glorious home of thy children."

The subject I wish to speak of is, that of our brethren attending the many shows that flood the country. But a few months ago there was an effort made to get one of our preaching brethren to come and publish salvation to our dear, dying friends and neighbors. Times were so hard that we failed to raise the means to send for him, consequently he did not come. Not long after a show came in town and among the many who thronged to help on Satan's cause might have been seen, represented largely, "The Church of God." Ah, brethren, what, and if an angel should have been sent to declare that "time should be no longer," could he have found amongst Satan's host the dear, self-sacrificing ones who shall congregate in the beautiful home of the righteous? Oh, dear friends, let us be more interested in the work which our Father has assigned us. We have neighbors, friends and children who are yet unsaved, and, oh, let us not enter into the pleasures of this world so much as to cause them to stumble and fall, and be lost, ah! lost forever. Shall you and I so live that our children shall rise up against us and say that we led them astray, that we pointed them not to the joys that Christianity affords, but to the alluring pleasures of the world? Again, we read that "Barnum is coming." Again do we hear our brethren talk about going to the show. Again must they pay the way for Satan's host to rob the country with its knaves and pick-pockets. Again must God's children show to the world that they, too, are more willing to give to the world than to pay the way for some self-sacrificing brother to preach to our dying fellow-men. Oh, brethren, beware how you spend the means that God has given you! Remember that, in the near future, there awaits the faithful ones our home of immortal splendor beyond the toils of life; beyond these scenes of temptations, and beyond all the trials of this poor, struggling, weak humanity. Oh, my brethren, may the joys of Christianity lift you far above these scenes of temptations and place your minds on things more holy, more pure, and nearer like to the pattern of our great Master. Let us live more devoted to the cause of him who suffered to redeem fallen man, that with him we might reign in his glorious immortal kingdom.

Let the lower lights be burning;
Send a gleam across the wave;
Some poor, fainting, struggling seaman
You may rescue, you may save.

A FRIEND IN CHRIST.

THE NEEDLE.

The magnetic poles of the earth do not coincide with the geographical poles. The axis of rotation makes an angle of about twenty-three degrees with a line joining the former. The northern magnetic pole is at present near the Arctic circle, on the meridian of Omaha. Hence the needle does not everywhere point to the astronomical needle, and is constantly variable within certain limits. At San Francisco it points about seventeen degrees to the east of north; and at Calais, Maine, as much to the west. At the northern magnetic pole a balanced needle points with its north end downwards in a plumb line; at San Francisco it dips about sixty-three degrees; and at the southern magnetic pole the south end points directly down. The action of the earth upon a magnetic needle at its surface, is of about the same force as that of a hard steel magnet, forty inches long, strongly magnetized, at a distance of one foot. Of course no ultimate reason can be given for this natural fact, any more than for any other observed fact in nature. —Professor Patterson.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the Bible doctrine of all things which God hath spoken, by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began. Holding as it does that the Bible is the only rule of faith and practice, it cannot hold itself responsible for the views of correspondents, but it does not knowingly admit to its columns anything contrary to the Bible. The restoration of Israel to the Royal Heritage, the overthrow of the Gentile Powers, and the final destruction of the wicked, at the coming of the Lord Christ, are fundamental truths. To this all others are nearly related. Belief of the Deity, repentance, and baptism are prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life essential for final salvation.

The Palestine Railroad.

In that day shall there be a highway out of Egypt to Assyria, and the Assyrian shall come into Egypt, and the Egyptian into Assyria, and the Egyptians shall serve with the Assyrians.

In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land:

Whom the Lord of hosts shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt my people, and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel mine inheritance.—Isaiah xix. 23-25.

An act was passed April 28, 1879, by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts "to authorize the formation of Corporations to construct Railroads in Foreign Countries." Under the provisions of this act there appeared at the State House, in Boston, Mass., a number of enterprising business men in February last, who made application for a charter to construct a railroad which should pass through the Holy Land from South to North with branch lines to Joppa, Jerusalem, and Shechem. The charter was granted. The company was composed of fifteen men, each of whom subscribed for one share of stock at one hundred dollars, and of these fifteen men eight were residents of Massachusetts—a number just sufficient to meet the requirements of the law. The road thus chartered is significantly named

THE PALESTINE RAILROAD.

The road for which the charter was granted is designed to extend far beyond the limits of Palestine. This line if built as contemplated will run from Cairo in Egypt to Mosul on the river Tigris with branches from this main trunk line to Jerusalem, Jaffa, Nablus, Beirut, Aleppo, Iskenderoon, and Erzeroum—making a distance, reckoning both the main and branch lines, of about 2,000 miles. The following is a detailed description of the whole route:

The proposed line commences at Cairo, in Egypt, a city as large as Boston, and runs along the rich alluvial valley on the east side of Pelusiac branch of the Nile to Port Said the Mediterranean terminus of the Suez Canal. At this point connection will be possible with the lines of steamers running between the East and Europe. From Port Said, which has one of of the best harbors on the Mediterranean, the line runs along the level plain near the seashore passing through the sandy and desolate region between Egypt and Palestine, and entering the latter country, passes directly through the fertile plain of Philistia, going through the cities of Gaza and Esdrael, the ancient Ashdod, to Ramleh. At Ramleh a branch runs westerly to Jaffa, and another easterly and up the valley of the Nahr Rubin and Wadi Surar to Jerusalem, coming into that city from the north and west of the Gihon valley, with the station at or near the Damascus gate. From Ramleh the main line runs north, through the plain of Sharon, to a point near the ancient Bethar, where a branch will run up the Wadi Assuf to Nablus, the ancient Shechem. The main line runs northerly from Bethar to the Abu Zabura, and up the river, crossing the Carmel range through the el-Lejjun or Megiddo pass, and down past that great strategic point, the hill of Megiddo, which is the ancient Armageddon, and when fortified, is the key to Southern Palestine. The maximum grade from Cairo to the Abu Zabura is twenty feet to the mile, and through the Megiddo pass it is forty feet to the mile. From the base of the hill of Megiddo a branch is proposed to run down the plain of Esdraelon, and thence northward along the shore through Acre and Sidon, and by the ruins of Tyre to Beyrout. Iskenderoon lies north of Beyrout, at the north-east corner of the Mediterranean Sea, upon the gulf of the same name. The main line passes from Megiddo across the plain of Esdraelon, by the base of Mount Tabor, and along the west side of Lake Gennesaret. It crosses the Jordan at or near Jacob's bridge, and follows up the valley, and gradually climbs the Jebel Heish at a grade of sixty feet to a mile. Crossing the summit and descending the valley on the other side, it stretches across the plain to Damascus. Thence it is projected to the Euphrates, to connect with the Euphrates Valley Railroad, which is about to be built by an English company. From the river it extends to Mosul, and will connect there with a proposed railroad from Diabekir and the Black Sea. Branches to Aleppo and Erzeroum will be constructed as soon as desired after the completion of the main line.

The Aleppo and Erzeroum branches may be soon constructed from necessity, as present political appearances indicate.

Such is the plan. As it stands, it brings the Russian frontier near Egypt, and makes connections with India more feasible. If it should prove to be the beginning of a widely extended system of railways from India to Asia Minor and the Mediterranean Sea, it will quicken wonderfully the older civilization of the East with the newer civilization of the West. It will strengthen the power of English arms, English customs and English language. With the influence England now has over Turkey, with the island of Cyprus in the control of England, with a railroad straight into the continent, built by English money and managed in English interests, the island kingdom would be more than ever a power in the East. Such a road as this will strengthen England in her defence against Russia.

It is the intention of the officers of the road to push its construction rapidly, as soon as the necessary authority can be obtained from the Turkish and Egyptian Governments. This matter-ity is expected soon, through the exertions of the projectors and the English and American Ministers at Constantinople.

POLITICAL ASPECTS OF THE ENTERPRISE.

Russia has her railway system already nearly completed to Kars and the Turkish frontier only a short distance from Erzeroum, the unfinished part being under contract. It is of the most vital importance to England to maintain her connections with India by the way of the Suez Canal, and it is not along the Bosphorus and Dardenelles, neither along the line of the Hindoo Koosh that the future great struggle between England and Russia will take place, which is simply a question of time, but it is down the Euphrates Valley, down through Syria, that the Russian bear seeks to strangle the British lion, by breaking and destroying his connections with the East. In the event of a war between England and Russia which is sure to occur by and by, viewed from the prophetic stand-point, as well as from the signs of the times, Port Said must necessarily become a base for operations, and this would become untenable unless the two great passes through the Carmel range were in the hands of the British. The western pass, or that around Mt. Carmel by the seashore, the British fleet could control at any time; and the other, the Megiddo pass, if properly defended by fortifications situate on the hill of Megiddo, the greatest strategic point in all Palestine or Syria, might easily be held by a few thousand determined troops against the combined armies of Europe.

BASIS OF THE ENTERPRISE.

The immediate objects of the company are to take the products of Egypt and the Nile valley, with its 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 inhabitants, and transport and distribute them throughout Syria, and the region northward and eastward, and, in return, to take the commerce of those countries and carry it to Egypt. They claim that the road can be made to pay, and that it will be the means of greatly developing the countries through which it will run.

The enterprise is an American one. The company was incorporated in Boston on the 9th of February last, and is, of course, a Massachusetts corporation. There are many reasons why the incorporation took place in this state, but not all of them can be here given. It was at first thought best to have it incorporated in England, by act of Parliament; but two other considerations, covering each a part of the ... objections to this company, ... were found to be proposed in England, and also a rival company in Paris. While these were talking the Palestine company ... incorporated, and is now pushing along as fast as possible to obtain the necessary right of way from the Turkish and Egyptian governments. Two of the largest banking houses of London stand back of this company, it is claimed, ready to take their stock and place it in the market, as soon as the necessary right of way is secured, and the latter is expected soon, through the combined exertions of the managers and the English and American Ministers at Constantinople. The principal promoter of the enterprise is an American and a New Englander, and for thirteen years he has been about the business in Palestine. Syria, Egypt, Europe and America. Success at last seems to promise triumph over all rivalry and political complications. It is understood that the principal cities in the Holy Land, concerned in this enterprise, are preparing petitions for this road to be presented to the Sublime Porte.

Description of Cities and Towns on the Contemplated Palestine Railroad Route.

A brief description of the cities and towns on the contemplated Palestine railroad route will, no doubt, aid our readers in comprehending the importance of the enterprise in a commercial, political, and prophetical point of view. Its starting point is Cairo, in Egypt. The Arabs call this city El-Kahireh, "the victorious," but the natives call it Misr. This city is the modern capital of Egypt, and the second city of the Mohammedan world. It is situated about a mile from the right or east bank of the Nile, and about twelve miles above the apex of the delta. Its population in 1871 was 353,851, of whom three-fourths were Mohammedans, the remainder being Copts, Jews, Greeks, Armenians and Europeans. It has always been, and still is the seat of the best schools for Arabic literature and Mohammedan theology. It is connected by rail with Alexandria and Suez. Every year an immense caravan assembles in the neighborhood of Cairo to make the pilgrimage to Mecca; and as the pilgrims generally carry some goods with them for traffic, their departure and return are to Cairo a considerable source of wealth. Cairo was founded about A. D. 970, by Johar, who named it El-Kahira (the victorious) in commemoration of his conquest of Egypt.

Port Said, a town of Egypt, at the ... of the Suez Canal with the Mediterranean, is the first notable place on the line after leaving Cairo. This town, which was founded scarcely more than half a score of years ago in a dreary, arid waste, has, since the beginning of the Suez Canal, grown up to be a place containing 1,000 houses, and a cosmopolitan population of nearly 10,000. One half of the number are Europeans. The works, to secure a good harbor at Port Said, consist of a basin 675 yards square, and of an eastern and western stone jetty, extending into the sea, the eastern jetty being 3,900 and the western 2,625 yards long, having a distance of 437 yards between them. The jetties are constructed of blocks of beton aggloméré, conglomerated concrete made of hydraulic lime from Teil in Ardeche, France, and beach sand. The channel is dredged to a depth of twenty-six feet for a good part of the inclosed space. About 1,000 ships, chiefly steamers, enter the port annually.

Gaza is the next place of importance. It is situated in the southwest of Palestine, about three miles from the sea and fifty miles from Jerusalem. Gaza is among the very oldest cities in the world, and is remarkable for its continuous existence and importance from the very earliest times. It is mentioned in Gen. x. 19, before the call of Abraham. Both Christians and Moslems claim that Gaza is larger than Jerusalem. Dr. Thompson estimated the population a few years ago at from 16,000 to 18,000. Being the last town on the frontier toward Egypt, it is an important station for the caravan traffic between Syria and Egypt. Dr. Thompson says: "Latterly a large trade in wheat, barley, and sesamum has sprung up with Europe, shipped mostly to Jaffa. With a harbor at hand and a government to protect from the Bedouin, Gaza would rapidly rise in importance. It is admirably situated for trade with all the eastern Arabs, and with Egypt. At no very distant day a railroad will pass down from the Euphrates Valley, by the valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris, to Egypt, and then again Gaza, as the frontier city, will become populous and flourishing." As a city of the Philistines it was connected with the romantic adventures and exploits of Samson. It is the first place shown on the outline map.

Ashdod, the Azotus of the New Testament, was one of the five confederate cities of the Philistines. It is situated about three miles from the sea, about twenty-one miles south of Jaffa, thirty-two miles west of Jerusalem, and thirty miles from the southern frontier of Palestine. It occupied an important position on the high-road from Palestine to Egypt, commanding the entrance to or from the latter country, and though assigned to the tribe of Judah, Joshua xv. 47, was never subdued by the Israelites. An extensive, fertile, and well cultivated plain stretches eastward while the narrow tract between it and the sea is nothing but a mass of moving sand, from the encroachments of which the village is protected by extensive groves which serve to break the force of the winds. A railroad would make this a place of some importance.

Ramleh is shown next on the map, and is eight miles southeast from Joppa, and twenty-four miles northwest from Jerusalem. By some this place has been identified with Arimathea, the birth place of Joseph in whose sepulcher Christ was laid. A late traveler states that it (which has about 3,500 inhabitants, and that a greater number of them are Christians than in any other town on the plain of Philistia. It is said to contain many good houses, and several churches, and convents, to have more wealth, and to have made a greater approximation to the style and manners of a city than other towns of the same size in Palestine. There is a lofty tower to the west of the town about 100 feet high from the top of which the view over the surrounding country is said to be inexpressibly grand. The whole plain of Sharon lies spread out like an illuminated map. "The eye is fascinated, and the imagination enchanted, when the last rays of the setting sun light up the white villages which sit or hang upon the many shaped declivities of the mountains. Then the lengthening shadows retreat over the plain and ascend the hill-sides, while all below fades out of view under the misty and many hare of sweet's twilight. The weary reapers return from their toil, the flocks come trickling to their folds, and the solemn hush of nature shutting up her manifold works and retiring to rest, all conspire to soothe the troubled heart into sympathetic repose. At such an hour I saw it once and again, and often lingered until the stars looked out from the deep sky, and the breezes of evening shed soft dews on the feverish land. What a paradise when Solomon reigned in Jerusalem, and 'knew the roses of Sharon!' But a still will it be when he that is greater than Solomon shall sit on the throne of David his father, for in his days shall the righteous flourish and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth. The mountains shall bring peace to the people, and the little hills by righteousness.

"He smiles round in wheels of time,
And brings the promised day."

—The Land and the Book, Vol. II. P. 500.

It will be seen from the map that the branch roads to Joppa and Jerusalem are designed to leave the main line at this place.

Joppa, or Jaffa, is one of the oldest cities in the world. Under its Hebrew name Jeppho it was assigned to Dan. Joshua xix. 46. The distances to Jerusalem is reckoned from thirty-two miles to thirty-five miles. The population of this city has been increasing rapidly during the last forty years, as the number of inhabitants was reckoned at 15,000 some years ago. It is said to be picturesquely situated on a rounded eminence, dipping on the west into the Mediterranean, and surrounded on the land side by extensive, flourishing, and profitable orchards of delicious fruits. The oranges are the finest produced in Syria. In March and April the lofty gardens are represented as perfectly enchanting. "Here can be seen in perfection fragrant blossoms encircling the golden fruit. The air is overloaded with the mingled spicery of orange, lemon, apple, apricot, quince, plum, and China trees in full blossom." The present ... acted upon of a ship of ... brief in the notice ... wide inclosed by a ... ridge shall be form a sort of breakwater, ... small vessels are secured to some extent, from the violence of the breakers. The harbor is inconvenient and insecure. Large vessels are compelled to anchor outside; hence landing is difficult and sometimes dangerous. Regular lines of Austrian, French, and Russian steamers ply between Jaffa and European and Turkish ports. Jaffa being the port of Nablus and Jerusalem and all the country south as far as Gaza is a place of commercial importance. As one branch of the intended railroad is designed to connect Ramleh with Jaffa, so another branch is purposed to connect Ramleh and Jerusalem.

Jerusalem, called by the Arabs El-Khuds, the holy, is to Jew and Christian the most renowned city in the world, and is one of the three holy cities of the Mohammedans ranking next in sanctity to Mecca and Medina. This capital of ancient Judea and modern Palestine is situated in Asiatic Turkey, 133 miles south southwest of Damascus, thirty-three miles east of the Mediterranean, eighteen miles from the Jordan, twenty miles from Hebron, and forty-six miles from Samaria. It is built upon a high plateau about two miles square, intersected by narrow and, in some places, precipitous ravines. The city occupies the southern termination of a table-land, which is cut off from the country on its west, south and east sides by ravines that are both deep and precipitous. These ravines leave the level of the table-land the one on the west, and the other on the northeast of the city, and fall rapidly until they unite at its southeast corner. These ravines, which almost skirt the city in their course, form a gorge that continues its course southeast in a still more rapid descent till lost in the basin of the Dead Sea. Out of these ravines, which entrench the city on the west, south and east, the rocky slopes rise almost like a fortress out of its ditches, and thus the city was almost impregnable on these sides to the warfare of former times. It is on the north and northwest sides that the city admits of expansion, as there is no material difference between the general level of the country outside the walls, and that of the highest parts of the city. It is for this reason that a railroad must approach the city on the

THE RESTITUTION.

H. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, SEPT. 1, 1880.

To Bro. Thomas Wilson, editor of Our Rest, we are under special obligations for the plate from which we print the outline map of the contemplated Palestine Railroad. This map, with an instructive article on the road, was given in the last number of Our Rest. This monthly is published at 108 Monroe Street, Chicago, Ill., at $1.00 a year. Each number contains an article on the Great Pyramid. In addition to THE RESTITUTION we commend this periodical to our readers. For an article copied from the Boston Advertiser, as well as for an original article on the Palestine Railroad, we are under equally special obligations to Bro. Joseph Wilkinson, editor of the Trumpet of Israel, five numbers of which have been published, and three of these have come to hand. The publication of this journal will probably be resumed at the commencement of the next year. From Bro. W. we also received a copy of the By-Laws and Railroad Enactments. Of the Trumpet of Israel we hope to give a fuller notice when the remaining numbers come to hand. We were highly pleased with the numbers that we have already received.

Church Practices.—That there are devoted Christians in our days we freely admit. Our position relative to the division of the household requires it: "Wise servant and faithful—giving meat in due season"—"That wicked servant, saying in his heart, my Lord delayeth his coming," clearly show such a class. The point intimated in the Savior's language is, that the class of evil servants will be in the majority; otherwise they could not beat their fellow servants. It must, at the time to which Christ refers, be the governing class in his household. It [illegible] and popular as in- [illegible] ion," "Eating [illegible] unkon." Such [illegible] ed, with propriety, be applied to a people, persecuted and down-trodden.

What do our popular denominations allow, in their buildings solemnly dedicated to the worship of God and his Son? What do they encourage, to draw the worldly crowd and rob them of their money? We say, rob, for there is no term in the English language more appropriate, since it is generally obtained through deception, and often with express disapprobation of the party defrauded.

These church feasts have various names, according to the main object in view; as sociables, tea-parties, Sunday evening pic-nics, fairs, Christmas trees and other forms to suit the tastes of various communities.

The managers are usually popular and active church members of both sexes. The aim is to enlist the wealthy so as to give them notoriety and success. The object is benevolent, on the principle, that the end sanctifies the means. It is to obtain money to liquidate church debts, aid the poor, or send the missionary to the heathen; sometimes to furnish the church with musical instruments and other fixtures.

It is not our purpose, at present, to quarrel with the motives; with the practices and their influence on Christian character, we are more particularly concerned, not whether good is intended, but what are their legitimate fruits? for by the fruits we are to know them.

Christ does not say why they eat and drink with the drunken. His words imply that they will do it; and, since they are all members of the same family, they would have an apology sufficient to justify their actions before the crowd, and these are such as propose to follow the crowd. It is not what a practice is intended to produce, but what it does produce, that fixes its character.

Samples of Church Practice.—It is not so much in the actions of the popular churches as in such a perversion of the apostolic taste as to take pleasure in these practices—find entertainment in them. It was not that Christ was crucified, but, that it was done with wicked hands; the perversion of the sinful taste of Christians constitutes the peculiar feature of our latter day church feasts; profession and practice being antipodes. We shall select a few samples out of many thousands: The samples we select are many years old. We select these of thirty-six years in the past, that all may see that the churches, in their social practices, are progressive. Those feasts had, at that time, many opposers. Now, in popular congregations, they have but few, if any.

"Tea Meeting at Lynn, Mass.—Given by the ladies of the South Street Methodist church, in the Town Hall, which was filled with a most interesting assembly, including six clergymen. Its sociability was unsurpassed." One of the speakers who had been acquainted with the saluted founders of Methodism in Lynn, remarked, emphatically, that he believed that their spirits were hovering with delight over this scene of Christian intercourse among their children. The tables were spread bountifully and elegantly. The hall was decorated with evergreens and portraits of our Bishops and distinguished ministers. Income, $76.00.

Grand festival, by the ladies of the 16th Street Baptist church, Wednesday, Jan. 24, 1844, (thirty-six years since), at the Tivoli Saloon, New York City; the proceeds to go for the liquidating of the church debt).

Unprecedented Entertainment.—At the United States Hotel, corner of Pearl and Fulton Streets, New York City, on Thursday evening, Jan. 25, 1844. The ladies of the Nassau Street congregation will commence their annual festival in the spacious saloons of the United States Hotel. The windows on Pearl and Water Streets will be brilliantly illuminated—entertained by Prof. Bronson, the Elocutionist, giving specimens of ventriloquism. Prof. Nash, whose vocal powers are unsurpassed, will be present. Tickets, 50cts and 25cts. Sold in various parts of the city.

Ladies' Fair—St. John's Church.—A rare supper at 8 o'clock this (Wednesday) evening. A splendid young deer, fresh from the Alleghanies, roasted whole, will be served up, with other delicacies. Tickets for supper, 50 cts. Admittance fee, 12½ cts. This was an Episcopal fair.

Ollo and Fair.—A social ollo and ladies' fair, for the benefit of the Sabbath school, will be held at the Congregational church in Webster, on the 10th of February, 1844, at 6 p. m. For the entertainment of the evening Messrs. Covert and Dodge, the celebrated Temperance Minstrels from New York, and John F. Cole, lecturer, from Boston, are engaged to instruct and amuse with their temperance songs, glees, anecdotes and speeches. Fruit, refreshments, etc., will be exposed for sale by the ladies of the society, and the social post-office will be in operation. Tickets for admittance, 25 cts.

There need be but little said of these specimens.

1. Feasting and fun are their attractive elements.

2. In these feasts, both families, the church and the world meet on a common platform, that of eating and drinking, and making merry. Social levity is expected of every one present.

3. No one can fail to see the contrast between the exercise of the social element as exhibited in the apostolic church and the popular churches of the 19th century.

4. These church festivals have grown in frequency, popularity, and in expedients to gather and fleece the crowd.

Even in those days of comparative innocence of church feasting, the "Boston Investigator," an infidel paper, thus speaks: "All their works they do to be seen of men; they make broad their phylacteries, and enlarge the borders of their garments, and love uppermost rooms at feasts, and the chief seats in the Synagogues—Jesus."

5. Bagging is often one of the exercises. To such an extent have these questionable expedients been carried that their conduct has come before grand juries as cases demanding civil action.

6. Within our own vicinity at a meeting house, in a small village, the exercises occupied two evenings, till near midnight on each evening. On the second evening they held an election; two young ladies being the rival candidates. It took the form of a political contest. Party feeling was so heated that money circulated freely. On both evenings, though the weather was very forbidding, there were crowded houses. On the evening following, a sermon, on the Coming and Kingdom of Jesus (their professed Master) was delivered in the same house to a few crowded around a couple of poorly prepared stoves. Nothing more, however, than the legitimate fruits of such a worldly spree.

7. "Lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of Godliness but denying the power thereof." 2 Tim. iii. 4, 5. Who can fail to see the fulfillment of this Scripture?

Miscellaneous Points.—1. Honorary Titles.—Another point of contrast between the apostolic and modern churches is in honorary titles: Such as Bishop (in its modern acceptation); Prelate, D. D. LL. D. Right Reverend, aside from those given to church members, in secret societies. Jesus said, "How can ye believe, who receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor that cometh from God only?" John v. 44. Proud man, his pretended servant says; these honors are useful and quite becoming. How would these titles sound, if associated with the names of the Prince of Peace and his apostles? "Simon Peter, D. D.; Right Reverend Paul, D. D., LL. D.; Right Reverend Bishop and Pope Jesus Christ, D. D., L. L. D. Lord Bishop and prelate of Jerusalem and Pope of the Church Catholic, instead of "Jesus of Nazareth!"

How would Paul, the tent-maker, have looked beside these august dignitaries of Christ's church of 1880? Should Paul be resurrected, and placed in the streets of London, hunting for a lodging place, by the old rule, "Enquiring who is worthy," think you that he would enter either of the "palaces" of the Bishop of London?

Pomp and Show of National Churches.—We call the Roman Catholic a national church, because of what it has been, and of what it would be should it ever have another opportunity. It has always claimed the right of ruling the nations. It has put forth every effort to obtain and hold the reins of civil power. Since 1798 she has had but little controling influence over the great powers of Europe. Her position now, is that of a dependent national church. These national churches are a union of two families—the state and the church. They are generally under the control of the political family, and they may, therefore, be called the religion, or church of that family. They lean directly upon the civil arm, and are sustained by it. The sovereign is usually their visible head. They are part of the Christian household, and must, therefore, come under notice.

"Lovest Thou Me More Than These?"

The question of our Lord to Peter came home to my heart this morning, "Lovest thou me more than these?" I love the disciples of Jesus, but do I love Jesus more? When discouraged with the waywardness and coldness of those who should be full of life and zeal, can I still "feed the lambs?" When others hang back, putting no hand to the work, can I still "feed the sheep?"

"Lord, thou knowest: all things; thou knowest that I love thee." The path that thou wouldst have me tread, grows more and more narrow. Closer and closer press the walls on either hand. Harder and fiercer grows the fight. Darker and more mysterious the trials. But, oh, I can see in it all my Father's hand! In all things, be is testing, proving me. Others may misunderstand and misjudge, but he knows! The world may hate, but he loves! How in these things can we rejoice!

The days are evil, but the morning comes apace. Few believe, yet he will reward all our patient toil for him. Others may hinder, but he upholds. He takes all props away, that we may lean upon him, trust him. Some sweet singer's voice is hushed, some dear face missed in the place of prayer and our hearts ache with the anguish we feel, but, oh, it is all that we may feel our own insufficiency and his strength; may turn more fully to him!

We love the lambs; we love the sheep with a depth and tenderness that words cannot tell, but we love Jesus more, and because of that love we would fain feed them and lead them to fountains of living water, where their feverish thirst may be quenched, their pain taken away forever.

A Mohammedan Holy War, or Crusade against Christian England, is likely to be proclaimed by the Sultan of Turkey as head of the Mohammedan faith, if England actively helps Greece to oppose Turkey. Acting under threats and pressure from the fanatical old Mussulman party and Softas, the Sultan may unfurl the banner of the Prophet, which is tantamount to declaring "a holy war" of extermination against all "dogs of Christians." The Great Sheriff of Mecca and the whole of the Mohammedan clerical class are said to be inciting the Sultan to declare a religious war. Such a step might lead the Mohammedan population of India to rise against the Anglo-Indian Government.

POETRY.

Be Thou With Me.

JULIA M. DUNN.

Be thou with me; the way is dark and dreary,
Vouchsafe, O God, to make the pathway clear!
Doubtful and devious still my way must be
If thou dost guide me not,—be thou with me.

Life's bitter draught to its dregs I sip,
Its fair fruits turn to ashes on my lip,
O thou who wept in dark Gethsemane,
I too have suffered,—oh, be thou with me!

Lonely, adrift upon a troubled sea,
The cold waves flutter, break over me:
O thou who stilled the waves at Galilee,
Still thou my troubled soul,—be thou with me!

O Cross to which I cling, illume the night;
O Lamp unto my feet, shed forth the light;
O Love divine that brightens Calvary,
Descend upon my heart,—be thou with me.

A Doomed Army.

"Tramp, tramp, tramp, the boys are marching!" How many of them? Sixty thousand! Sixty full regiments, every man of which will, before twelve months shall have completed their course, lie down in the grave of a drunkard! Every year during the past decade has witnessed the same sacrifice; and sixty regiments stand behind this army ready to take its place. It is to be recruited from our children and our children's children. Tramp, tramp, tramp!—the sounds come to us in the echoes of the footsteps of the army just expired. Tramp, tramp, tramp!—the earth shakes with the tread of the host now passing. Tramp, tramp, tramp! comes to us from the camps of the recruits.

A great tide of life flows resistlessly to its death. What are they fighting for? The privilege of pleasing an appetite, of conforming to a social usage, of filling sixty thousand homes with shame and sorrow, of loading the public with the burden of pauperism, of crowding our prison-houses with felons, of detracting from the productive industries of the country, of ruining fortunes and breaking hopes, of breeding disease and wretchedness, of destroying both body and soul in hell before their time. Meantime, the tramp, tramp, tramp! sounds on—the tramp of sixty thousand yearly victims. Some are besotted and stupid, some are wild with hilarity and dance along the dusty way, some reel along in pitiful weakness, some wreak their mad and murderous impulses on one another or on the helpless women and children whose destinies are united to theirs. Some stop in wayside debaucheries and infamies for a moment, some go bound in chains from which they seek in vain to wrench their bleeding wrists, and all are poisoned in body and soul, and all are doomed to death.

Wherever they move, crime, poverty, shame, wretchedness, and despair hover in awful shadows. There is no bright side to the picture. We forget—there is just one. The men who make this army get rich. Their children are robed in purple and fine linen and live upon dainties. Some of them are regarded as respectable members of society, and they hold conventions to protect their interests! Still the tramp, tramp, tramp! goes on, and before this article can see the light, five thousand more of our poisoned army will have hidden their shame and disgrace in the grave.

Turkish Troubles.

The new identic note has been submitted to the Porte, which for once seems to be willing to comply with the wishes of the Powers. So many troubles lie before Turkey in her relations to Greece and Bulgaria that she might possibly feel it a relief to be rid of the Montenegrin difficulty. It does not however, appear that the Albanians intend to submit to her will. They are desirous of being made an independent nation, and are resolved not to comply with the wish of the Powers. If war breaks out, it is probable that there will be a rising on behalf of the union of Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia; and the Greeks will determine to take their "cause" in their own hands, trusting to the help of England in the event of their being defeated. Turkey sees all these contingencies, and makes ready for a conflict in which it may be necessary to fight for her very existence. The crash, which is sure to come, may be postponed; but the tendency of events indicates a speedy downfall. Above all, the renewed activity of Russia is ominous. She does not conceal that her ultimate aim is the break-up of the Turkish Empire, and there are many indications that she thinks the conditions of the present time unusually favorable to her designs.

LETTER DRAWER.

Editor Restitution:—I am still a pilgrim, joyfully wending my way through this vale of sorrow to the highlands of glory. Never did fair Bulah's blissful plains look so glorious! By faith, I can view the blood-washed throngs walking amid its beautiful groves, all clad in white, bearing in their hands the victor's palm, and shouting their loud alelulias to "Him that hath loved them, and washed them from their sins in his own blood, and hath made them kings and priests unto God the Father, to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever, amen." Glorious day when the redeemed of all ages shall in harmony meets each other to greet upon the plains of Eden restored! O, what a thrill of joy will fill each heart, as they walk beside those crystal waters, and reach forth their immortal hands, and pluck fruit from life's fair tree, which will then grow in the midst of the Paradise of God! View them as they repose themselves among those vine-clad hills of Eden, dressed up by a hand that is all Divine! and to make their happiness the more complete, listen to those sweet notes that now fall from Eden's feathered tribes, born along on zephyr's seamless wing, and saluting the ears of the redeemed throng! Glory be to God! Eden's beautiful city, with its jasper walls, its pearly gates, and streets of gold, is full in my view! Its glories beam upon my mind—its odors are wafted to me—its sound salutes mine ear—its spirit I inhale! O my Father, shall I be gathered with the ransomed host within those jasper walls? For this I labor! Reader, shall I meet you there?

RESTITUTION FUND.

Editor Restitution.—With your permission I will make an appeal to the brotherhood for help to support THE RESTITUTION for the year 1880 and insure its weekly visits.

Now, dear brethren, I call upon one and all who feel the ties able, to give to the cause of Christ the small amount of $3.00 between this and the first of January.

To my brethren, we could do this, with a few exceptions, if we just thought so. I am well aware that some brethren have contributed nobly, but I make this appeal in a special manner to those who have heretofore done nothing as a free-will offering.

Dear brother, do not say, I am too poor! Perhaps you are using that dreadful weed, tobacco, in some form. Consider for one moment: are we children to be the cheers of God as poverty stricken that we cannot support a weekly paper.

We do hope that everyone will respond to this appeal. Please let us hear from all those who cannot or will not pay the $3.00, and will they please give us their reasons. I am also a poor man. My home is Abraham Pantoon. I am 70 years old and have a large family to support. I have a small farm of 8 acres. I farm and work at the carpenter's trade to support my family. I use neither tobacco nor intoxicating drinks.

And, dear Editor, I will endow $100 to commence on. I read THE RESTITUTION, and the Bible, and I hope to meet you all in that coming kingdom. So, farewell. ABRAHAM PANTOON.

HYMNS OF THE ADVENT

In the name of a new Hymn Book, just out, compiled by Chas. C. Baker—author of the "Hymns of the Morning"—and published by W. N. Pile, Springfield, Mass.

Mr Baker considers in this new work the "Hymns of the Morning" not a fresh and rare selection of music. As an appendix he adds a selection of "Favorite Hymns" (words only) whose tunes are familiar as a household word. These of our brethren who have been using for "Hymns of the Morning" for some time, can now be supplied with this new book, which it expects to be of use in that it omits all of its old and many new and beautiful songs. There having the "Christian Psalmist" and no music book will find this exactly what they want.

THE PALESTINE RAILROAD.

north, and it is on the north of the city, at or near the Damascus gate, that the Jerusalem branch of the contemplated railroad is expected to terminate. The great route for traffic with the grand maritime plains of Philistia and Sharon is by a road leaving the city on the north. But our limits forbid anything more than a rough sketch of the ground-plot of the "city of the Great King." It is as a railroad city that we now are briefly describing it. So we must return to Ramleh, and follow the line north.

Bethel. Of this place we are not prepared to give any information unless it be identical with that fortress that Bar-cochebas elevated to be the seat of his kingdom when the Jews revolted against the Romans A. D. 131. Hadrian stormed and took possession of Bethar, A. D. 135, expelled the Jews from Jerusalem, and made a wilderness of Palestine. In the large volume of maps that accompanies Zell's Encyclopedia, we find the place laid down a little below the confluence of the Musan and Wady Esh-Shair, in the same local relation to other towns as it occupies on the outline map printed in this number of THE RESTITUTION. It will be seen that it is from this place that a line branches off to Shechem.

Shechem, the modern Nablus or Nabulus, is also a town of Palestine thirty miles north of Jerusalem, and about eight miles southeast of Samaria; population estimated from 10,000 to 20,000, of whom there are 1,000 Christians. It also is a place of remote antiquity as Abraham, in his migration found an inhabited town in this very locality. Gen. xii. 6. The situation of this town is described as one of surpassing beauty and loveliness. Mohammed is quoted as saying, "The land of Syria is beloved by Allah beyond all lands, and the part of Syria which he loveth most is the district of Jerusalem, and the place he loveth most in the district of Jerusalem is the mountain of Nablus." It is located in a valley having Mount Gerezim on the south and Mount Ebal on the north. Streams flow down from the opposite slopes of the valley, spreading verdure and fertility in every direction. Says Dr. Clarke: "There is nothing finer in all Palestine than a view of Nablus from the heights around it. As the traveler descends towards it from the hills, it appears luxuriantly embosomed in the most delightful and fragrant bowers, half concealed by rich gardens and by stately trees collected into groves, all around the bold and beautiful valley in which it stands." Such were the attractions of this place, resulting from the beauty of its scenery, that it became a favorite resort of the patriarchs of old. Jacob's well and Joseph's tomb are present memento of those olden times. Its favored location makes it the gateway of the trade between the Mediterranean ports Jaffa and Beirut on the one side, and the trans-Jordanic districts on the other. It is in the center also of an exceedingly productive province, and as Nablus or Shechem is now the seat of an active commerce, which would be greatly enlarged by giving this inland city railroad facilities. Returning now to Bethar to follow the main line we find the next noted place is Megiddo.

Megiddo, the modern Lejjun, is situated on the south edge of the great plain of Esdraelon, and commands an important pass, where once was the unsubdued Canaanitish fortress Megiddo, and afterwards a station of a Roman "Legion," whence its present name Lejjun. The plain has been the battle-field of nations. Says Thompson: "The Canaanites and Philistines, Jews and Egyptians, Chaldeans and Persians, Greeks and Romans, Moslems and Christians, of almost every age and nation have encamped around Megiddo, because of its commanding position and rich pastures." It was here that "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera," Judg. v. 19, 20; and it was here that King Josiah met his death. 2 Kings xxiii. 29.

The great caravan route from Damascus to Egypt passes across this plain and the nation that holds Megiddo will command the most important point in the great internal channel of commerce between Asia and Africa, as it is now the great gateway between the South and the North, and the power that holds the key, should the railroad become an accomplished fact, must of necessity possess a point both of military and commercial importance. It will be seen that two lines of railroad are planned to diverge from Megiddo, one following the sea coast and the other leading off to Damascus and the Euphrates Valley. So that we are next to give some account of the oldest city in the world as it is the first important place on the line to Mosul. This city is seen on the map to be Damascus.

Damascus, according to Josephus, was founded by Uz, the great grandson of Noah, and is regarded by many as being the oldest city in the world. It is situated 136 miles north northeast from Jerusalem, 180 south by west from Aleppo, and forty-five miles east from the Mediterranean. Its population is estimated at 150,000. This city is remarkable for the picturesque beauty of its location, being situated in a fertile plain of vast extent and of extreme fertility; so remarkable indeed for its beauty as to be termed in oriental description as one of the four earthly paradises. Damascus is essentially a commercial emporium, and always has been a great centre of trade. The traffic between Egypt and Northern Syria has been turned out of the direct route near the sea, through the circuitous route by Damascus, on account of the dangers and difficulties that the Lebanon ranges of mountains interpose in taking the straiter course. A modern traveler thus describes the city and plain from a mountain eminence:

"From the edge of the mountain you look down on the plain of Damascus. It is here seen in its widest and fullest perfection, with the visible explanation of the whole secret of its great and enduring charm, that which it must have had when it was the solitary seat of civilization in Syria, and which it will have while the world lasts. The river is visible at the bottom, with its green banks, rushing through the cleft; it bursts forth, and as if in a moment scatters over the plain, through a circle of thirty miles, the same verdure which had been confined to its channel. Far and wide in front extends the level plain, its horizon bare, its lines of surrounding hills bare, all bare far away on the road to Palmyra, and Bagdad. In the midst of this plain lies at your feet the vast lake or island of deep verdure, walnuts and apricots waving above, corn and grass below; and in the midst of this mass of foliage rise, striking out its white arms of streets hither and thither, and its white minarets above the trees which embosom them, the city of Damascus."

In 1859, a French company commenced building a macadamized road between Damascus and Beyrout, and diligences now run daily between the two cities.

To see the route from Damascus to the Euphrates, and thence to Mosul our readers will be compelled to have recourse to a large map.

Mosul is a town of Asiatic Turkey situated on the right bank of the Tigris, with a population of about 40,000. In the middle ages it was noted for the manufacture of muslin, which was taken quite largely to Europe, and this article of manufacture derived its name from the place. It once had considerable commerce, and still is an important point in the trade between Bagdad, a city 220 miles down the river, and Syria and Constantinople. Should it become connected with the inland cities north of it, and also with some port on the Black Sea, it will become once more a place of commercial importance; even more so, perhaps, than the town that may be at the intersection of this line of railroad, with the Euphrates valley line. Across the Tigris opposite Mosul are the ruins of Nineveh—the tomb of the Metropolis of this world's first great empire. Returning to Megiddo to follow up the sea-shore line we find the name Tyre the first to occur.

Tyre was one of the most famous cities of antiquity as a queen of commerce. From her the rich wares and products of Persia, India, Arabia, and Africa were distributed to the marts of the western parts of the world. To know something of the extent of the trade and consequent wealth of her merchant princes we refer our readers to Ezek. xxvi. 3-25. Tyre was a city of extraordinary magnificence and beauty, while its great wealth made it the envy of all surrounding nations. In Josh. xix. 29, Tyre is mentioned as "the strong city." Speaking of the former commerce of Tyre a late writer says: "From Abyssinia and Arabia on the south, to Armenia and Georgia on the north, and from the frontiers of India to the utmost islands of Greece, and, indeed, from far beyond both, came to this little spot—the caravans by land and the ships by sea—a commerce rarely exceeded in extent and variety—a concentration of wealth and luxury which few cities of any age or country could boast." So heavy has the burden of prophecy weighed down upon Tyre that her glories have sunk into the dust; and we doubt her commercial or political resurrection even were some great line of international communication to pass the entombed city. The only real harbor she has is so shallow as to admit only the smallest class of vessels and a number of miserable huts sheltering about 3,000 impoverished inhabitants destitute alike of energy, enterprise and education is the Tyre of to-day. Some efforts have been made to revive the place of late years but without marked success. A grand vizier planted 50,000 mulberry trees besides olives and other fruit trees, which flourish well, but the site is unhealthy and the peasants refuse to reside there on this account. The people are also impressed with the discouraging feeling that God has doomed Tyre, and that Ezekiel's expression, chap. xxviii. 19, "Never shalt thou be any more," is being literally fulfilled. This once grand mistress of the world's commerce, Thompson says "it is so utterly that not even a village of any size can be established there, and, should the plain become again densely peopled, the villages will be built at a distance from this fatal spot." Tyre then has no prospects. She is a thing of the past, and we follow the line up to Sidon.

Sidon, now Saida, is celebrated as being the most ancient of the Phœnician cities. It is mentioned Gen. x. 15. It is twenty-three miles north of Tyre, and eighteen miles south of Beyrout. Its population is estimated at near 10,000, mostly Moslems, the remaining inhabitants being Maronites, Greeks, and Jews. The once magnificent harbor, composed of vast moles and stretching far out into the sea has been entirely destroyed, as it was filled up with earth and stones as a protection against the Turks, and a ledge of rocks that once protected the sea-ward side has been so quarried away for building stone that the sea breaks over into the present harbor in every storm. The town shows some sign of former wealth, and many of the houses are built of stone. The environs of this city abound in beautiful gardens and orchards. The trade is considerable though it is being diverted away to other places, particularly to Beyrout. As Beyrout is the next and last place laid down on the outline map we pass to give a short description of this place.

Beyrout, or Beirut, is now the chief seaport of Syria, and is situated on the south side of an extensive bay which forms a side of a triangular promontory on which the city is built. It is a place of great antiquity according to the best evidences attainable, although its origin is shrouded in obscurity. The latest authority places the population at 70,000, one-third of whom are Moslems, and the rest Christians, Jews, Druses, and foreign residents. The situation is singularly beautiful, and the climate mild and healthy—one author says "decidedly the most beautiful and healthy locality at the head of the Mediterranean." The older part is densely built along narrow streets on the shore, while the suburbs spread out into a broad margin of picturesque villas where the streets are wide and passable for carriages, and where the houses are built of stone, and are spacious. In 1830, the population was not more than 5,000, and the city was dependent on Sidon for its supplies, but now this is changed and Sidon has become entirely dependent on Beirut. At that time the population resided almost entirely within the walls; but now by far the largest share reside in the suburbs, and hundreds of convenient dwellings, with many large and noble mansions, have been built and occupied in the beautiful outskirts. We have already noticed that a French company has constructed a macadamized road from this place to Damascus. A large number of Europeans reside here, which has, of late years, given new force and vitality to commerce. An extract from the author of "The Land and the Book," will best set forth the present prosperous growth of this seaport. He says, "No city in Syria, perhaps none in the Turkish Empire, has had so rapid an expansion. And it must continue to grow and prosper, with but one proviso to cast a shade upon her bright future. Should a railroad ever connect the head of this sea with the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf, that will infallibly dictate where the emporium of Syria is to be. If Beirut can attract this mighty line of trade and travel to her door, she will quickly rank among the great cities of the world; if she will not, or cannot then must she wane before some other rising queen of the East."

Although the map only extends far enough to show the location of this city yet we call attention to some more places that will be greatly affected by building the contemplated railroad.

Tripoli, or Tarabulus, forty miles north northeast of Beirut, and seventy miles northwest of Damascus, is a place of considerable note. Its population is placed at 15,000, of whom one-half are Greek Catholics. It is built at the foot of an offset of Mt. Lebanon, on a small triangular plain, and is traversed by a small river named Nahr Kadisha. It is described as one of the neatest towns in Syria, being surrounded by many fine gardens and groves of orange, mulberry, and other fruit trees, which cover the entire plain. French steamers touch here four times a month. Following the coast northerly the next town of much note is Latakia.

Latakia ninety-six miles southwest of Aleppo, 120 miles north of Beyrout, and seventy-four miles south of Iskenderoon, is a town of Syria built on a rocky promontory, from 100 to 200 feet high, which extends nearly two miles into the sea. At the northwest angle of the promontory is a deep cove almost surrounded by rocky banks which is the harbor of the city. Like other towns that we have briefly described, it is surrounded by groves of myrtle, pomegranate, mulberry, orange, and lemon trees. It has a population of about 7,000. Much of the trade of Aleppo passes through this place.

Antioch next demands some notice. This city is now known under the name of Antikia, and is situated on the south bank of the Orontes, fifty-seven miles west of Aleppo, and twenty-three miles south of Iskenderoon. It is surrounded by walls enclosing a space of several miles in circumference. The buildings are of stone and have sloping roofs,—an unusual thing in the East. Much of the space within the walls is occupied as gardens, while the fertile plains outside are quite uncultivated, because exposed to the raids of Turcomen robbers; but on the surrounding hills figs, olives, and vines are cultivated. The river Orontes is, at this place, about 120 feet wide. The population numbers probably 12,000.

The city once had the proud title of "Queen of the East," and was once richer and grander than proud Rome itself. It was the capital of the kings of Syria, and subsequently the residence of the Roman governors. No city except Jerusalem, was so intimately connected with the history of the Apostolic church. Here the first Gentile church was founded; Acts xi. 20, 21; and here the disciples of Jesus Christ were first called Christians.

The situation was remarkably advantageous for the maritime trade of the Mediterranean, and for the caravan trade from the interior. Its free population was once computed at 200,000, and it is claimed that the Christians at one time numbered 100,000. It has been nearly ruined several times by earthquakes. One that occurred in 526 was the most destructive of life of any on record, as 250,000 persons are said to have perished. As late as 1872, heavy shocks occurred, which overthrew a part of the walls, destroyed a great number of houses in the city and in the surrounding villages and several thousand lives. It is possible that this city may become an important place, as it is likely that a good harbor might be constructed at the mouth of the river for shipping.

Iskenderoon, or Alexandretta, is a Turkish seaport on the northeast of Syria, and on the east side of a bay of the same name. Its population is upwards of 1,000. It has the advantage of many other towns on the Mediterranean in Syria in having a capacious harbor. From its situation it commands the trade of Northern Syria and Mesopotamia. European capitalists have projected a railroad from this port down the valley of the Euphrates to the Persian Gulf, to be ultimately extended northwest through Asia Minor, to Constantinople. It is at this point that the Palestine railroad will meet the Euphrates line.

This town was founded by Alexander the Great to commemorate his victory over Darius III. on the neighboring plains of Issus. Should all these railroads be built, we should be inclined to surmise that here might be the site of the great city of Syria—the Chicago, perhaps, of western Asia. The well-watered, fertile, and extensive plains of the ancient Cilicia are near by, and railroads would divert, not only the trade of the upper countries on the Euphrates and Tigris to this place, but also, a large share of the East India commerce. We here close our brief description of the most important towns which will be affected by building this line. We have traced both branches to their intersection with the great Euphrates Valley line.

To some of our readers building this road, and the great Euphrates line may seem works of insuperable difficulties. To remove all such apprehensions we will merely add that already 1,063 miles of railroad, and 5,500 miles of telegraph lines were in operation in Egypt in 1877. A railroad is also being built far up the Nile from Wadi Halfa to Dongola, of which the first section had been opened for traffic as early as 1877. This railroad is to be built out of the surplus revenues of that inland country of Africa, Soudan, without asserting Egyptian finances, and is expected, when completed, to give an immense impetus to the commerce of Central Africa. In India, in 1875, there were 7,551¼ miles of railroad in operation. Surely, if so many miles have been built in more distant parts, these roads can be built in the more accessible countries.

Railroad Enactments.

The following act was passed by the Legislature of Massachusetts authorizing the formation of companies to build and equip foreign railroads. The Company incorporated to build the Palestine Railroad was organized under the provisions of this legislation. We also give three Articles from the By-Laws of the Company.

CHAPTER 274.

An Act in addition to the "General Railroad Act" of the year eighteen hundred and seventy-four, to authorize the formation of corporations to construct railroads in foreign countries.

SECTION 1. Any number of persons, not less than fifteen, a majority of them being inhabitants of this state, may associate themselves together by articles in writing, with the intention of forming a corporation with authority to construct and operate a railroad, or railroad and telegraph, in any foreign country, but in accordance with the laws of the country in which they may be located; and, upon complying with the provisions of section three of this act, shall, with their associates and successors, be and remain a corporation for the purpose aforesaid, with the powers necessary and incident thereto, and with such powers and privileges, and such duties, liabilities and restrictions, as may be fixed by the country in which the same may be located, as to the location, construction, maintenance and operation of its railroad and telegraph, and the transfer of its property by mortgage, lease, or otherwise.

SEC. 2. The articles of association shall set forth the name of the corporation, and, as far as may be practicable, the termini of the railroad and telegraph to be built, and the names of at least nine persons to act as a board of directors until others are chosen, and the amount of its capital stock. Each associate shall subscribe to the articles his name, residence, postoffice address, and the number of shares of stock which he agrees to take; but no subscriber shall be bound to pay beyond ten per centum of the amount of his subscription, unless a corporation is duly established.

SEC. 3. Whenever it is shown to the satisfaction of the board of railroad commissioners that the requirements of this act have been complied with, the clerk of said board, upon their order, shall indorse upon the articles of association or annex thereto a certificate, setting forth the fact that the requirements of the law appear to have been complied with. The directors shall thereupon file the articles of association, with the certificate indorsed thereon or annexed thereto, in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth, who, upon the payment to him of a fee of fifty dollars (to be included in his return of fees, and paid into the treasury), shall record the said articles of association, and certificate indorsed thereon, in a book to be kept for that purpose, and shall issue a certificate substantially in the following form:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Be it known, that whereas [names of the subscribers to the articles of association] have associated themselves with the intention of forming a corporation, under the [name of the corporation], for the purpose of locating, constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad or railroad and telegraph [description of the road as in the articles of association], and have complied with the statutes of this commonwealth in such cases made and provided: Now, therefore, I [name of the secretary], secretary of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, do hereby certify that the persons aforesaid, their associates and successors, are legally established as a corporation under the name of the [name of the corporation], with all the powers and privileges, and subject to all the duties, liabilities and restrictions, set forth in chapter ———— of the acts of the year eighteen hundred and seventy-nine.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my official signature, and affixed the seal of said commonwealth, this ———— day of ————, in the year [day, month and year].

The certificate so executed shall be recorded with the articles of association; and the original certificate, or a duly certified copy of the record thereof, shall be conclusive evidence of the establishment of the corporation at the date of such certificate.

SEC. 4. The corporation may from time to time, at a meeting of directors called for the purpose, reduce the amount of capital stock or increase it for the purpose of constructing and equipping its road and any extensions or branches thereof. If any such increase or reduction is made, a certificate of the fact, signed by the president of the corporation, shall, within thirty days thereafter, be filed in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth.

SEC. 5. Such corporation shall be subject to the provisions of sections forty, forty-three, forty-four, forty-five, fifty-four, and the first division of section thirty, of the General Railroad Act.

SEC. 6. For purposes of taxation, such corporation shall be subject to the provisions of section eight of chapter two hundred and eighty-three of the acts of the year eighteen hundred and sixty-five; but no other provisions of said act relating to the assessment of taxes upon corporations or the shareholders therein shall apply thereto. Such corporation shall annually, between the first and tenth day of May, return to the tax commissioner, under the oath of its treasurer, a complete list of the shareholders, with their places of residence, the number of shares belonging to each on the first day of May, the amount of the capital stock of the corporation, and the par value and the market value of the shares on said first day of May. Such corporation shall be relieved from making the returns required by chapter two hundred and one of the acts of the year eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

SEC. 7. This act shall take effect upon its passage. [April 28, 1879.]

By-Laws of Palestine Railroad.

ARTICLE I.

The annual meeting of the stockholders of the Palestine railroad shall be holden in Boston, Massachusetts, on the first Wednesday in February in each year. If from any cause the annual meeting should not be holden on the day provided above, the directors shall call it at the earliest practicable day thereafter.

ARTICLE II.

A special meeting of the corporation may be called at any time by a vote of the directors. It shall be their duty to call such meetings when a petition for that purpose, signed by not less than a majority of the stockholders, is presented to the president, or, in his absence, to the vice-president.

At any meeting of the corporation the subject-matter to be acted upon shall be stated in brief in the notice calling the same, which notice shall be signed by the clerk, and published in two or more newspapers printed in the city of Boston at least ten days before the day appointed for the meeting.

ARTICLE III.

The board of directors of this corporation shall consist of nine persons, who shall be chosen at the annual meeting. No person shall be qualified to be elected or to act as a director, unless he be a stockholder.

Directors, before entering upon the duties of the office, shall signify their acceptance in writing to the clerk, and the same shall be placed on the records of the corporation. Any director notified of his election and failing during the next ten days after such notice to accept the office, shall be considered to have declined the trust. Any vacancy in said board may be filled at a special meeting of the stockholders called for that purpose. If, from any cause, the board shall be reduced to a number less than a quorum, the clerk shall forthwith notify a special meeting of the stockholders to be held in the city of Boston to fill such vacancies.

The first meeting of every new board shall be appointed by the clerk, and shall be as soon after the election as the members can conveniently be notified. A majority of the directors shall constitute a quorum.

The Arch of Titus.

The article in the last RESTITUTION with this heading reminded me of the time, just a year ago, when I stood beneath that arch, and thought of the wondrous story it would tell if it could speak. I keenly scanned its sculptured figures, wonderfully corroborating history of 2000 years ago. Rome is full of wonders—its ruins of the palace of the Cæsars, its pantheon, its forum, its colosseum, its temple of fortune, its tombs of pagan emperors, its Egyptian obelisks, etc., etc.

There the power of Papacy is felt, but not in measure as of yore. Now I espied a neat little American chapel where each week a Protestant dares to speak the religious truths, as he understands them, on the very spot where but a few short years ago it would have cost a life to have dared even to think that there was any truth outside of the Apostate church of Rome. How has the mighty fallen! Yet a little while and her power will be completely broken. Truth will triumph and peace will reign in the ages of glory soon to dawn on this earth.

[The World's Crisis.]

Faith's Visions.

C. HILL.

There's a time just along in the future, we're told,
When the children of faith shall be free
From mortality's ills which in bondage now hold
And them compass like waves of the sea;
And the land where e'er they go forall wonders they say,
In glory and beauty sublime,
There no night ever comes to obscure one glad ray,
For the glory of God is the light of that day,
Though th' unnumbered hours of all time.

O! the rivers majestic bear life in their waves
And the trees droop in beauty and grace,
With their all-healing burdens, the nations to save,
A joy and delight to the place.
There visions of beauty the eye ever sees,
And melody dwells in the air;
There sweet notes of praise by zephyr and breeze
Are heard as they swing through the tall forest trees,
And bowers of loveliness rare.

And there with its mansions prepared for the blest,
Coming down out of heaven from God,
Is a city of transcendent glory, of rest,
The saint's own regal abode;
From star will the nations behold its splendor,
And thither with joy them repair:
For its walls are Salvation, its gates are named Praise,
Its temple the Lamb and the Ancient of Days,
Its high name, "Jehovah is there."

And forms that now languish in sorrow untold,
Or sleep in the cold silent tomb,
Shall tread with glad measure its pathway of gold,
All radiant with life's during bloom.
O! the rapturous joy in the shouts that they raise,
As they greet whom their warfare is o'er!
O, the crowns and the palms! O, the heavenly lays!
O, the harps that they bear, and the high notes of praise,
To God and the Lamb evermore!

And to welcome them, lo! the heavenly hosts there,
Winging down from the regions of light,
A dazzling throng again filling the air.
As they came on redemption's birth-night,
Ah! the heavens bend lovingly over, I ween,
And wonder at visions so fair;
And new lustre take from the transcendent scene,
With which to adorn their own flowing sheen,
That the glory of God doth declare.

O! the hour is at hand; now the Orient beams,
With tokens of fast coming day,
When earth's pestilent vapors, its mists and rain streams,
And darkness, shall all flee away;
And Thou, whom our souls wait in deep agony,
O! haste Thou thy coming again;
Roll away time and space, and bring us to see
Thy glorious face, and join us to thee
In union eternal, Amen.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MENDON, Mich., June 27, 1880.

Brother Chaplin:—At our recent Conference at Hammond, the enclosed article on the Resurrection and Judgment of the Wicked was read to a company of brethren at Brother McCroden's house, who, without dissent, voted a resolution requesting Brother Chaplin to give it a place in THE RESTITUTION. We should like to have it appear, if, in your judgment, it would, on the whole, be best; act freely. This vote of request may help to excuse you for introducing new matter on a subject so recently dropped out; but don't feel that you must insert it or give offence. No offence will be taken.

Yours in the hope,
E. MILLER.

WHY SHOULD THE WICKED BE RAISED FROM THE DEAD?

The object contemplated in the resurrection of the two classes is briefly stated in Job v. 29: "Those having done good things, to a resurrection of life; and those having done evil things, to a resurrection of judgment."—Diaglott.

As a rule, we find no special difference in the lives or deaths of the righteous and the wicked. God makes the sun to shine and the rain to fall on both alike. Both are alike liable to the casualties of life. Sickness and health come alike to each, according to their regard or disregard of the laws governing health and disease; and death comes earlier or later for the same reason. Neither is the manner of their deaths different. Of each class some are suddenly cut off while others suffer with lingering disease. In each case death reduces them to the same unconsciousness and resends them back to dust. Then, if the wicked are to be punished for their misdeeds, it must be like the reward of the righteous in a future age—in the JUDGMENT.

Judgments have been executed upon transgressors at various times in the past; but "the judgment,"—"the judgment of the great day"—"the day of judgment," etc., belongs to a coming age as appears from the following: "I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and kingdom." 2 Tim. iv. 1. "The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished." 2 Pet. ii. 9. "For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment unto the great white throne, and him that sat on it from whose face the earth and heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened; and another book was opened, which the book of life; and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books according to their works. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it, and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were judged, every man according to their works. And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire." Rev. xx. 12-15.

"The next age, introduced by the coming of the Lord, and closed by the complete restoration of the world to its primeval condition, when there "shall be no more curse," is a judgment age. At its commencement extensive judgments will be executed upon the living wicked; so much so that "the slain of the Lord shall be from one end of the earth to the other end of the earth," Jer. xxv. 33; as well as at different times during its progress, but it closes with a judgment of the dead, and an extermination of all not found written in the book of life.

Leaving out of the argument all those who have been destroyed in the past by special judgment for their personal sins, who having been condemned and executed, can hardly be expected to suffer judgment, and leaving also the heathen, the imbecile and uninstructed among every people; there has been, in all ages, a class of positively wicked who have lived and died without judgment for their own wickedness. Such only are contemplated in this argument.

I suggest that they are not made to appear in the judgment for an investigation of character; for this is already determined, or else the resurrection of the righteous could not be the first act in the judgment, 1 Thess. iv. 12; but rather to hear their sentence of condemnation, and the reasons therefor, as drawn from the record of their doings found "in the books," to their ineffable shame, and the everlasting contempt of all righteous beings, and to suffer that destruction which they have merited.

To appreciate the propriety and importance of so exposing their folly and wickedness, it is expedient to glance at the conditions and influences under which character is formed. God is "taking out of the nations a people for his name." Acts xv. 14. This people are to be "made partakers of the divine nature," (2 Pet. i. 4,) and be "the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty," (2 Cor. vi. 18); are to be "kings and priests unto God," (Rev. i. 6); having suffered with Christ they are to "reign with him," (2 Tim. ii. 12); are to have power over the nations as Christ has. Rev. ii. 26. Being Christ's, they are with him "the seed of Abraham," (Gal. iii. 29), who are to bless "all the nations of the earth," (Gen. xxii. 18,) and are to "reign forever and ever." Rev. xxii. 5. This people are the agency which God is preparing by which the restitution of all things is to be wrought out. They are not the race, but are taken out of the race; are not the nations, but are to have power over the nations. The exceeding great and precious promises of the word have begotten in them the hope of sharing with Christ the honor of restoring the kingdom to Israel, of subduing, converting and blessing the nations; and of governing and guiding the restored world throughout the endless succession of ages that await it. Enlightened by the word to understand this scheme of God for restoring the world to its primeval pure and sinless state; and contemplating the glorious state promised to those who should, by obedience to the word, fit themselves for doing this work; thousands upon thousands have been induced to enroll themselves in the body of Christ to be trained for the work. They have covenanted with God to do his will—to be wholly for him and his work, and through baptism for the remission of past sins have taken places in the body.

Of these thus entering upon this high calling, multitudes fail to fulfill its requirements. Large numbers prove themselves to have been, either "stony ground" or thorny ground hearers, and thus, "after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, they are entangled and overcome," of whom the apostle says, "the latter end is worse than the beginning." 2 Pet. ii. 20.

Other thousands have been enlightened—have come to appreciate, more or less fully, the blessedness to which they were invited—have been, like Agippa, almost persuaded to be Christians, but by surrounding influences, have been kept back from committing themselves to the enterprise. In view of these facts, I suggest that those who, regardless alike of their advanced knowledge of God and his scheme of redemption, of the solemn covenant—as respects a part of them—to do his will, and their happy commencement of the divine service; and of their thrilling hopes of exaltation, glory, honor and endless life; become wicked or unjust; become doers of evil instead of good, are worthy of future judgment. Does it seem fitting that they shall die quietly in their beds or by accident while prosecuting their business or in travel as do their faithful brothers, and no further notice be taken of them? Concerning such as have entered upon the Christian service, the apostle asks: "Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy than those who died without mercy" for despising Moses' law? Heb. x. 29. If there is no appearance of these in the judgment, then the one who gathered sticks on the Sabbath; (Num. xv. 32-36). Korah, Dathan, Abiram and their company, (Num. xvi.), Achan and his household for the trespass in the Babylonish garment and the wedge of gold; (Joshua vii.,) and numerous other cases, suffered altogether the sorer punishment. Men are guilty in proportion to the light sinned against. Also their guilt is enhanced in proportion as the motives presented to induce action were weighty or otherwise; and whether the surrounding influences are favorable or otherwise. This scheme of God enlightens those invited to aid in its execution, with the clearest rays of divine revelation. It addresses to their minds the strongest possible motives; and those embracing it are thrown into association with the best and purest of men, and are put in personal intercourse with our heavenly Father himself, "whose eyes are upon them, and whose ears are open to their cries," and who promises every needed grace in their conflict with sin and self.

I ask, is there not good reason why men shutting their eyes to such light, resisting such motives, and disregarding such holy surroundings and exalted privileges, should be brought up in the judgment to have their doings exhibited; to realize their loss; to experience that shame and contempt that such a life deserves, and to vindicate God in their destruction? If this shall be so; if they are to be brought up from the dead and standing before God in the judgment to have their sin and folly proclaimed, and then burning with shame and realizing the contempt that all virtuous being must feel toward such, suffer extermination of being in the lake of fire we can appreciate the apostle's idea of "a sorer punishment."

But what good can result from it?

Is it not simple vindictiveness that prompts it? I answer, no. The examples of judgments in past ages are examples to them that after should live ungodly. These judgments were designed to deter others from sin. So also in civil judicature, one object of punishing the guilty is to deter others from like crimes. Are we not justified in believing that the judgments executed in the past have helped to promote virtue? Who can say that the judgment of the living and the dead "at his (Christ's) appearing and kingdom," in which a complete extermination, under the wrath of God of all evil doers will be made, will have no influence in maintaining the moral purity of the universe? That the saints are "to judge angels," (1 Cor. vi. 3), and that "the angels that sinned are reserved under chains of darkness unto the judgment of the great day." Jude 6, shows that this "judgment to come" has a wider range than simply the disposal of our race. Therefore may we not infer that the influence of the judgment, as showing God's abhorence of sin, may be felt beyond our planet?

But as regards man. After the restitution—after the Edenic state is brought back, the race will still be earthly as Adam was, and will perpetuate their lives by eating of the tree of life as Adam should have done, and will be under law as he was, and of course will be governed by motives addressed to the mind. By the experience of the race in its long conflict with sin, together with the suffering caused by disobedience, supplemented by the then established moral surroundings in favor of virtue, the sinless and deathless state of the race will be secured. But will not such an exhibition of God's consuming wrath—such an exhibition of the inevitable end of sin, serve as a motive to help on this end? It must be so.

The lesson designed to be taught to the universe by allowing sin to be introduced into, and prevail so long in the world, will be incomplete without this closing judgment.

Job said "That the wicked is reserved to the day of destruction? they shall be brought to the day of wrath." Job xxi. 30. In the Psalms it is said "The ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous." Psa. i. 5. Shall not stand approved or acquitted. "Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest; this shall be the portion of their cup." ii. 6. Solomon said, "God will bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or evil." Eccl. xii. 14. And very frequently the prophets warned the people of a future retribution. The New Testament especially abounds in expressions of this kind, and that too in language that will not allow the idea that only the destruction of the then living wicked is all that is contemplated. Note the following:

"But after thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God; who will render to every man according to his deeds. To them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life. But unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile .... In the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my Gospel." Rom. ii. 5-16. Surely this language is not justified if the majority of evil doers for six thousand years, after lives of no more suffering than their pious neighbors have endured, are to die without any manifestation of God's displeasure and be no more noticed. "But whosoever shall offend one of these little ones that believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were drowned in the depths of the sea." Matt. xviii. 6. How is it better to be violently drowned, if after a life of prosperity he dies like other men, and is never brought up for judgment? "For if after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning." 2 Pet. ii. 20. How is it worse except through the retributions of a fearful judgment? Had they not known the way of life they would have died; and they have died now; perhaps with as little evidence of God's displeasure as their righteous neighbor. No! It is this fearfully looked for judgment "that shall devour the adversaries," (Heb. x. 27) that makes it worse for them.

These passages, and very many more like them, show that this long conflict with sin has been waged under the influence of hope on the one hand, of promised life and blessedness to the obedient, and the fear of threatened retribution to the disobedient on the other. Are God's threatenings as reliable as his promises?

Judgments from time to time have swept off vast numbers of people for their wickedness; still larger numbers, equally wicked, have died quietly in their beds just as have the devoted ones who have lived cross bearing, self-sacrificing and suffering lives. As yet there has been no exhibition of wrath, tribulation or anguish towards them. If they are to remain undisturbed in death what becomes of these threatenings of a terrible judgment upon every soul of the evil doers? If "it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation," (2 Thess. i. 6) to the living wicked when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed, is it not imperative that those who have died be visited in like manner?

This calling up for judgment of all the wicked who have not already suffered for their own sins, is necessary in order to show that God is impartial in his execution of vengeance, which he claims is his prerogative. Heb. x. 30. Besides this, the judgments executed in the past have been—with some exceptions—so much like common occurrences in the world that the fact that they were the execution of judgments of God, and by his direction has been, to a great extent overlooked, and during all this period God's government of the world has been extensively ignored. God must appear as the antagonist of evil doing as well as the approver and rewarder of right doing; and in no way can his character in this respect be so fittingly exhibited as by closing up the long drama of sin and death by calling up all of the unpunished wicked, exposing their selfishness, folly and wickedness in neglecting the great salvation to which they were invited, and subjecting them to exterminating wrath in the lake of fire.

E. MILLER.

The foregoing is inserted at the request of several brethren in Michigan. There is another very good reason for its insertion; Bro. Miller has occupied but little space in our paper for some years past and should be accorded the privilege of expressing his conclusions on a subject that some others have so fully written upon, both pro and con. For these reasons we give place to this article.—ED.

An Open Letter to Dr. Seiss.

A. C. MACRIDER.

Dr. Joseph Seiss, Philadelphia:—

DEAR SIR:—I have recently read with satisfaction your lucid and conclusive demonstration of the personal coming and reign of the Lord Jesus Christ on earth and over all nations as contained in your little tract called "The Kingdom of Messiah," followed by your warm and earnest exhortation to the readers "to bow with meek submission to the yoke that Jesus has provided," etc.

Will you pardon me, though a stranger personally to you, but for more than thirty years striving to be an earnest "disciple of Christ," for suggesting for your candid consideration that in your exposition of the subject an important omission is plainly manifest—a defect which robs the argument of much of its practical use and value for our personal salvation; that is, your failure to discern that this doctrine of the personal reign of Messiah is the subject matter—the faith and hope of "the Gospel of our salvation."

Nowhere in what you have written, do you recognize or recite any connection between this coming universal empire and "the Gospel of the kingdom"—"the glad tidings of great joy which shall be to all people"—in which all the nations of the earth shall be blessed," etc. Yet it is always in this inseparable connection that the prophets, the Lord himself, and his apostles preached the Gospel and taught the Word of the kingdom. The proof of this is easily supplied by the following text-references: Matt. iv. 23; Mark i. 14; Luke iv. 43; Ib. viii. 1; Matt ix. 35; Ib. xxiv. 14; Mark xvi. 15; Luke ix. 60, 60; Ib. 2nd verse, etc.

From this we see the kingdom and the Gospel were preached inseparably. They both involved the means and the conditions of attaining the great salvation. This conclusion is further sustained by the "Acts" throughout, especially in the eighth chapter where we read that "the Gospel"—"Christ"—"Jesus"—were all preached in Philip's proclamation of "the things concerning the kingdom of God and of the name of Jesus Christ." Verse 12.

May we not say therefore that "What God has joined together let not man put asunder." To preach the coming and kingdom of Messiah, however ably and eloquently, as a curious and interesting doctrine and to say nothing of it as the Gospel of our salvation, when believed and obeyed, by baptism, is to divorce the doctrine from the faith and hope of the Christian and to preach "another Gospel." Gal. i. It is to leave the people in the dark or only half-instructed in "the whole counsel of God." One might believe all that your essay contains and yet be ignorant or faithless of the Gospel which St. Paul declares in Romans 1st chapter to be "The power of God for salvation." Thus apprehended and believed, the Gospel must be obeyed in the act of baptism, for is it not written that it should be "preached to all nations for the obedience of faith"—that, we "purify our souls in obeying the truth"—that "baptism doth also now save us," etc.

It seems pretty clear from these premises, and with your pamphlet before us, that although having faith in the coming kingdom of Christ you may be not a believer—probably not informed as to the Gospel of the kingdom of God, without which faith your hope, if not vain, may be at least without any promise of future salvation.

In respect to baptism: I need not cite to one of your known intelligence the meaning of the term in the original or the plain language in Scripture in many passages to prove that the "one baptism" of the Bible is by immersion—dipping, etc., but in no case, meaning sprinkling or pouring water. It is an action commanded to be done by one having faith, even "that faith without which it is impossible to please God." It is commanded by divine authority in the plain words "Believe and be baptized." None, therefore, incapable of faith, are proper subjects for this ordinance, for it is an act of faith.

Pray pardon me for pointing you to the strange inconsistency of insisting as you do so earnestly on the plain literal interpretation of the Divine word as to the kingdom, etc., and yet of discarding utterly that safe rule of construction when you come to consider the same Divine word as to baptism. Here, in your practice and, I presume in order to conform to your particular church usage, you reverse your reasoning and adopt the illogical and arbitrary rule of figurative interpretation. This leads you to discard the Bible baptism and substitute something for it which God has never required at your hands. Surely the same reasoning that make you a literalist in the one case, should constrain you to be so in the other; and St. Paul enjoins, "Let God be true though every man a liar," —that our faith may stand in the Word of God, and not in the wisdom of man.

I should be glad to learn that this reaches your hand, safely and is received in the same spirit of honest love of and zeal for the truth as it is in Jesus and the faith once delivered to the saints, which inspired it.

Prophecies Concerning Israel. Their Land and King, not yet Fulfilled.

(Conclusion of letter in last issue.)

Sir,—The 47th chapter of Ezekiel, from the 1st to the 12th verse, contains a description of waters, which the prophet saw, in vision, issuing from under the threshold of the house of the Lord. At first a shallow stream, they rapidly increase in volume until, at a distance of four thousand cubits from their source, they become "waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed over," that is, forded. Verse 9 speaks of "rivers," (Hebrew, two rivers: see marginal reading,) w'. h agrees with Zech. xiv. 8, which reads thus: "And it shall be in that day, that living waters shall go out from Jerusalem; half of them toward the former (or eastern) sea, and half of them toward the hinder sea: in summer and in winter shall it be." There can be no doubt that the waters of both texts are identical. One-half of those which Zechariah prophesies of flows toward the east or Dead Sea; so, also, one of the rivers seen by Ezekiel goes into the same sea, and heals its waters, so that they abound with fish, "as the fish of the great sea," the Mediterranean. Verse 10 speaks of certain localities, which shall be a place for the fishermen "to spread forth nets." Certain "miry places and marshes" (verse 11) are to be "given to salt."

This "healing" of waters is not unprecedented. In 2 Kings ii. 19-22, we have an account of the healing of the waters of Jericho by divine power. Elisha cast salt into the spring, saying, "Thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters; there shall not be from thence any more death or barren land." Thence forward, doubtless, the waters from that spring were wholesome and fertilizing. So, from the time that the waters out of the sanctuary shall enter the Dead Sea, its waters shall be in like manner "healed," and be a blessing to both the land and people of Israel.

Another miraculous result of the waters out of the sanctuary, is stated in verse 12: "By the river upon the bank thereof, on this side and on that side, shall grow all trees for meat, whose leaf shall not fade, neither shall the fruit thereof be consumed; it shall bring forth new fruit according to his months, because their waters they issued out of the sanctuary; and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine."

We may fairly presume that these trees will be peculiar to that river, and that to the medicinal qualities of their leaves may be, in part, at least, attributed Israel's immunity from sickness, (Isa. xxxiii. 24) and their days being "as the days of a tree." Isv. 22. If they are not identical with the tree of life in the garden of Eden, by the eating of which Adam could have evaded the death penalty, they must have something of the same virtue, and will, no doubt, be one of the chief attractions of the holy land.

The river and trees of Ezekiel xlvii, are as literal as the land, whose geographical boundaries are given in the concluding verses of the same chapter; and all attempts to understand them otherwise than literally must fail. The more literally Ezekiel's nine last chapters are understood, the simpler they become. But to people who have no faith in Israel's becoming a nation again, with their land as the garden of Eden, and having God's sanctuary or holy house in their midst, these chapters must remain as inexplicable as the prophecies concerning Messiah's crucifixion, death, resurrection and ascension, are to the blinded Jews. My conviction is that the land and nation of Israel will, in "the times of restitution," (Acts iii. 21) witness the accomplishment of every jot and tittle of God's Word, recorded in those nine chapters of unfulfilled prophecy.

The sacrifices Ezekiel speaks of will be noticed in my next letter. Enough,

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Coming Age—Its Proximity—Supplementary Remarks on the Signs—Its Length—Generation—Objections Answered—"Many Shall Run to and Fro."—No. 88.

J. P. WEETHEE.

In Exodus xii. 40, 41, it is said, "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel, who dwell in Egypt, (was) four hundred and thirty years. (430 yrs.) And it came to pass at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the self same day it came to pass, that all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt." But they were to go out in the fourth generation. Here, then, a generation is one-fourth of four hundred and thirty years, or about one hundred and eight years. The Jews were divided into generations. Exodus xii. 42.

When he comes forth to shake terribly the earth and its inhabitants (Isa. xxvi. 20, 21,) He will shake terribly the heavens also. Heb. xii. 26.

Let it be distinctly understood, that the signs are not in the tribulation of those days, "But in those days, after that tribulation." Mark xii. 24.

Are the saints living on the earth during the signs? They are, if the signs precede the advent; for Paul says, "The Lord himself (second advent) shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall arise first; then we (the living saints) that are alive (and) remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17. Here is the advent and the rapture, also. Who is prepared to reverse Christ's order of six events given to his disciples in Matt. xxiv. 29, 30? If Christ has given the true order, the saints must be on the earth during the display of the signs, and the signs be given to herald the approach of his Son.

Matthew says, "So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it (he) is near, (even) at the doors." Matt. xxiv. 33. This shows that the signs precede the advent, and, "the that generation" sees them while living on the earth.

How, then, is Christ's coming to resurrect his saints and to carry them away with the righteous living; if he descends with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God? Paul has declared it and we must believe what he says.

1. The saints are not with him at this coming; for they are in their graves and alive on the earth.

2. The time of his coming is like that of a thief in the night. "If thou shalt not watch I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee." Rev. iii. 3. The work which Christ performs on his return, is not like that of a thief, nor in his manner secret: the time is.

Every eye shall see him; but passing into the heavens with his bride the event soon passes out of the minds of the wicked, and the world moves on amid terrible judgments, and its nations gather to battle, till the meet they Son of God upon the mountains of Israel.

One remarks. "I believe, therefore, that at about the beginning of the signs referred, the Bride will be gathered to her Lord; then the signs will appear one after another, resulting in a time of trouble such as the world never experienced; but that the church—the "accounted worthy" ones—will be absent with the Lord during this distressful season; then a great crisis in Israel's affairs, Jesus and his bride will descend in great power and glory, and be seen by every eye."

These are the words of an able and beloved brother, in great kindness and sincerity, presented to the public for their criticism, their adoption or rejection. We are searching after Bible truth; if these views are sustained by the Scriptures let us receive and proclaim them freely; if not according to God's word, let us in Christian kindness, show our objections, and their variations from the Divine record. One thing is sure; they are quite contrary to what we have written.

We have before us, what Jesus said to his four disciples in Hebrew, Greek, and English. We have carefully weighed the record of Jesus' words, and have failed to find in those words, the general ideas above stated.

List of objections.—1. The signs, named by Christ, would not, according to this view, fill their usual office. They are usually design to forecast coming events that due preparation might be made for the events themselves. They are warnings, and always, in the nature of things, go before the event signified.

2. This view would not fill the demand of the disciples—Tell us, when shall these things be? And what the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world (age)? Matt. xxiv. 3. They asked to know the sign of Christ's coming, not the signs that would transpire after his return and their resurrection and translation.

3. It does violence to the intention of our Savior in his private address.—Christ evidently intended to satisfy the request of his four beloved disciples; but if the signs follow his coming, what sign did he give them of his Advent? and that he comes for his Bride is certain. As if Christ had said, I will give no sign of my coming; but when you are resurrected, translated, and are with me as the beloved Bride, I will give you any amount of signs: I will fill the heavens, the earth and the ocean with signs; the heavens shall be shaken, which will cause the sun to be darkened, the moon to be turned into blood, and the stars to fall, and terrible commotions on sea and land, and among the nations.

4. It does violence to the language of his address.—a. He is anxious that they should not be deceived as to his return,—Take heed that no man deceive you. For many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ; and shall deceive many. Matt. xxiv. 4, 5. "Behold, I have told you before." Verse 25. "Wherefore if they shall say unto you, Behold, he is in the desert; go not forth: Behold, (he is) in the secret chamber, believe it not. For as the lightning (bright shining of the light) cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall the coming of the Son of man be." Verses 26, 27. The record of Luke says, "For these be the days of vengeance that all things which are written may be fulfilled: there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people. And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Luke xxi. 22, 24. We are now brought down to that part of those days that follow the signs. "In those days, after the tribulation." Mark xiii. 24. Christ has given his disciples all necessary caution to prevent them from being deceived by false Christs during the tribulation and wrath; that he would appear in the heavens, and not from the desert or from secret chambers, enters upon the narration of what we call the signs. Taking the language of his discourse to this point, and the language clearly shows that the instructions were for his disciples, that the should be forewarned, and consequently, forearmed.

b. Is his language, relative to the Signs any less personal and explicit? The order of Christ's narration, as given by Matthew is,

1. Sun darkened.
2. Moon not give her light.
3. Stars fall from heaven.
4. Powers of heaven shaken.
5. Sign of the Son of Man in heaven.
6. All the tribes of the earth mourn.
7. Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven.
8. Angels with a great sound of a trumpet sent forth.
9. Elect gathered.

Have we any right to reverse this order, or say that this is not the true order?

c. Christ gives them the parable of the fig-tree to illustrate the signs: "When its branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that the summer is nigh. So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that he is near, (even) at the doors." Matt. xxiv. 29-33. Mark's order is the same, only that No. 6 is omitted. Luke names some signs not stated by the other two. He commences with the same, and states the first three as in Matthew and Mark.

Luke's 4th is distress of nations, with perplexity.

5. Sea and the waves roaring.
6. Men's hearts failing.
7. Powers of heaven shaken.
8. Son of man coming in a cloud.
9. See these things come to pass know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand.

6. That the saints are on the earth at that coming further appears from the following language: "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and the cares of this life, and (so) that day come on you unawares. For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth."

6. That they remain together till Christ comes, will appear from the statement of the "faithful and wise servant and the evil servant; the parable of the ten virgins; and that of the wheat and tares; and also from Paul's description of Christ's return in 1 Thess. iv. 15-17.

But, if Christ comes in so public a manner as with a shout, with the voice of an archangel and with the trump of God, how does he come as a thief? The time and unexpectedness, will be as a thief. How, then, will the nations fight against Christ, as they will when he comes to reign, after such a public display of his power and majesty? To this we reply, How could the Jews forget God in forty days, after they heard on the morning of the third day, thunders, and the voice of a trumpet, exceeding loud; so that all the people that (was) in the camp trembled (?) saw the mountain (Sinai) on fire; forget God while Moses was talking with him? How could the Jews crucify the Son of God after seeing his miracles? The saints and Christ disappearing in the heavens; the ripple made by his coming, would soon be lost, and the nations, being relieved from the saints their former monitors would move on as in former days till Christ's feet are again planted on the Mount of Olives, and all the saints (his Bride) with him.

7. The signs do not cause the trouble and distress among the nations. The world's mode of living produces the trouble and perplexity. The signs are God's visible epistles to his people, to teach them what are coming, and what preparation is necessary. The saints will see the signs from the earth, and not from the secret pavilion.

8. Christ will descend from heaven in a public manner and his bride will be taken away publicly and boldly. Such is the manner in which we read the signs. We do not crowd 1800 years' tribulation into seven years.

2. "Many shall run to and fro." Dan. xii. 4.—We have named this sign before, but did not give it that attention evidently demanded. Some passages contain a volume in but few words. The one that forms our theme is of that kind. The time of the end is brought to view. The time when "sealed books" were to be opened. We are evidently living in the age of sealbreaking; not by any miraculous power, but by an extraordinary movement of Divine agency upon the human understanding and passions.

Christ, when about to leave the earth, after his resurrection, calling his disciples around him, "opened their understanding that they might understand the Scriptures:" that is all Scriptures not sealed to some distant period. Here is a prophecy, "shut up and sealed until the time of the end." How was it to be unsealed? By many running to and fro, and thus increasing Scripture knowledge. But Scripture prophecy draws on the sciences for illustrations. The mind is strengthened by its varied sources of human knowledge. Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.

In what sense does this prediction remain unaccomplished? Is it not an age of running to and fro, after all kinds of knowledge human and Divine? Our theme gives us the widest the most ample range. It does not confine us to the Scriptures. Our field is the universe, whatever the telescope or the microscope brings within the range of human thought.

When was there ever such an age of investigation? Since the first dawn of light, to the present era, no such a period can be found. Where are such monuments of human thought, even among those whose lives extended beyond nine centuries?

God once operated on a few minds and produced wonders; now he moves on the minds of the masses and wonders are daily evolved. Since the art of printing was invented, knowledge has been as diffusive as the rays of light. Man, by searching, has attempted to solve all mysteries visible and invisible. He is running to and fro, and with his little sea-craft launching out into the great unknown. Scientists are putting forth extraordinary efforts to do away with the idea of a Creator. Infidels think that they have completed the task, and have reared a monument, with an inscription; not like that at proud Athens, to the "unknown God;" but to the "No God." Psa. xiv., the conclusion of the Bible fool. But it matters not what are the conclusions of earth's wise men, so that their running to and fro continues, our subject is still in process of accomplishment.

SELECTIONS.

(Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.)

The End of the 6000 Years From the Creation, in 1890.

The 6000 years from the creation of man are on good grounds understood to terminate in the second coming of Christ and the Millenium. It is a belief of great antiquity that the six days of creation foreshadowed the six periods of a thousand years each, during the Patriarchal, Jewish, and Christian dispensations, and that the seventh day of rest typified the seventh period of a thousand years of the millennial dispensation. This idea was entertained among the Jews long before the birth of Christ; and Scripture warrant for it has been afforded by the statement that "one day is with the Lord as a thousand years" (2 Pet. iii. 8), and that "there remaineth therefore a rest (sabbatismos, a keeping of the Sabbath, a Sabbatical septenary) to the people of God" (Heb. iv. 9). This seventh period of a thousand years—the Millennium—is shown in the nineteenth and twentieth chapters of Revelation to commence with the resurrection of the righteous, the advent of Christ, the chaining of Satan, etc.; and after its termination the battle of Gog and Magog, the resurrection of the wicked, and the burning of the earth take place.

Bishop Rossel says on this subject: "The tradition that the earth, as well as the religious state of its inhabitants, is to undergo a great change at the end of 6000 years, has been found in the writings of Pagans, Jews, and Christians; because six days were employed by Almighty God in the creation of the globe, after which he rested on the seventh; and, as with him one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day, it was concluded by the Cabalists and Jews that the world was to continue 6000 years; and on the conclusion of this period there would succeed a Sabbath of a thousand years of corresponding length, a Millennium of rest and of peace. This idea has been traced in the Sibylline oracles, in the poems of Hesiod, in Plato, and prevailed long before the birth of Christ, relative to a momentous change which is supposed to await the earth after a period not exceeding 6000 years. We find this expectation expressed by the Chaldeans, the Persians, the Egyptians, the Greeks, the Romans—orators, poets, philosophers; and the only difficulty we experience in the examination of the records collected from the literature of ages is to account for so great unanimity of sentiment where we cannot discover any source of information, or any authority which so many different writers would consent to acknowledge for a conclusion so remarkable."

The infidel historian, Gibbon, testifies to the prevalence of this opinion during the first four centuries of the Christian era. He says (chap. 15): "The ancient and popular doctrine of the millennium was intimately connected with the second coming of Christ. As the works of the creation had been finished in six days, their duration in the present state, according to a tradition which was attributed to the prophet Elijah, was fixed to six thousand years. By the same analogy it was inferred that this long period of labor and contention, which was now almost elapsed, would be succeeded by a joyful Sabbath of a thousand years; and that Christ, with the triumphant band of the saints and the elect who had escaped death, or who had been miraculously revived, would reign upon earth till the time appointed for the last and general resurrection. So pleasing was this hope to the mind of believers that the New Jerusalem, the seat of this blissful kingdom, was adorned with all the gayest colors of the imagination. A felicity consisting only of pure and spiritual pleasures would have appeared too refined for its inhabitants, who were still supposed to possess their human nature and senses. A city was therefore erected of gold and precious stones, and a supernatural plenty of corn and wine was bestowed on the adjacent territory. The assurance of such a Millennial was carefully inculcated by a succession of fathers, from Justin Martyr and Irenæus, who conversed with the immediate disciples of the Apostles, down to Lactantius. Though it might not be universally received, it appears to have been the reigning sentiment of the orthodox believers."

Gibbon further states that after the fourth century this view began to decline, the Papal corruptions completely obscured it; but since the great revival of religion at the time of the revolutions of 1703, increased attention has been given to the prophecies regarding the millennium, and the views of the Primitive Church respecting it have again become prevalent.

There is another striking type meriting observation in this connection. As God concluded the six days of creation by forming the literal body of the first Adam out of the dust of the earth, and breathing into it the spirit of life, so, at the conclusion of the 6000 years, at the second coming of Christ, God will, by his resurrection power, raise to life and form the mortal dust of his deceased saints into the mystical body of the second Adam—the glorified Church of Christ—and breathe upon them the Holy Spirit in immeasurable abundance.

This expectation of the advent of Christ at the end of 6000 years acquires additional importance from the fact that they appear from the chronological data of the Bible to terminate somewhere about 1890, and thus the birth of Christ was about 4110 years from the creation. All the periods that make up this 4110 years are explicitly stated in Scripture, excepting one interval of seventy-nine years, from Cyrus' first year, B. C. 536-5, until Artaxerxes' seventh year, 456 B. C., and the exact length of this interval is decided by Ptolemy's Canon, and the histories of Herodotus, Xenophon, Prideaux, etc.

The commonly received Chronology of Usher, which has been adopted in the marginal references of Bibles, places Christ's Nativity about the year 4004, but the recent researches of Clinton and others show that Usher missed out at least 100 years out of the whole period of the judges, making that period to be about 350 instead of 450 years, as stated in Acts xiii. 20.

Usher gives B. C. 1444 in Joshua xiv., as the date of the dividing of the land of Canaan and the beginning of the period of the judges, and B. C. 1094-5 in 1 Samuel xii., as the date when the era of the judges ended, and Saul was made king. Now, this gives only 350 years as the period of the reigns of the judges, whereas Paul said, in Acts xiii. 20, "He divided their land to them by lot, and after that he gave them judges about the space of 450 years, until Samuel the prophet; and afterward they desired a king, and God gave them Saul by the space of forty years," etc. Later chronologers, avoiding the errors of Usher, and basing their computations upon the statements of Scripture, arrive at the period of 1870 to 1880 as the end of the 6000 years.

Thus, the 6000 years have been computed by the subjoined writers, who have carefully traced and examined each link in the chronological chain, to terminate at the following points of time: about 1870, by Rev. Dr. Seiss, in his valuable lectures on the "Last Times," and by Rev. Dr. Mahan in his "Palmoni"; about 1872, by Rev. C. Bowen, whose tables were published in 1851 in Elliott's "Horæ Apocalypticæ," and by Rev. James Scott, in his "Millennium Vindicated," and also by Edward Flower, in his "Wonders of Divine Arithmetic," and by P. H. Gosse, in "The 6000 Years"; about 1875, by Rev. W. Thurman, in his "Sealed Book of Daniel Opened"; about 1881, by R. Brothers, in his "True Ages of the World" (published in 1794), and by Sylvester Bliss, in his able "Sacred Chronology."

The subjoined table of the Scripture period shows, however, that the 6000 years terminate about 1890; and that we have, in fact, almost arrived at the Saturday midnight of the world's week of 7,000 years. The six days are nearly ended, and the seventh day of 1000 years is about to commence. The correctness of the following chronological table can be verified in a few hours by any person who will refer to the Scripture passages quoted.

THE OLD FORESTS UNDER THE SEA.

In many districts, says an English scientific paper, where our shores are shelving—as near the mouths of the Tay, the Humber and the Severn—after a more than ordinarily tempestuous day, we see quantities of a peaty-looking matter cast up by the sea, and the entire beach blackened with its triturated fragments. If we examine any of the larger pieces of this black-looking matter, we find that it is made up of dark clay filled with peat, pieces of wood, mosses, equisetums and the like, the characteristic vegetation of cold, moist ground. This is washed up by the sea from old forest beds, now submerged below the level of the waters. In excavations for docks and bridges these ancient floors are cut into by the workmen. Everywhere we find them to be composed of some thickness of peaty matter, in which lie the prostrate trunks of the oak, the fir and our common forest trees, the old roots of the monarchs of the forest still in place, and scattered on the old forest floors lie the acorns and hazel-nuts that dropped from the trees of the wood in its prime, and the subfossil antlers of the deer and elk that roamed the forest glades. The whole is usually buried under a much later accumulation of sand and clay, full of our commonest sea-shells, laid down by the sea waters that have overspread the site of the old forest since its submergence.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, OCT. 20, 1880.

IN order to give place to articles from our correspondents we defer our proposed examination of what Paul has said on the Sabbath. There are several topics on which we would write were time and space at our disposal. Our paper is full and we let it go to press.

COMMUNICATIONS.

"The Lord's Day."

It is not for the sake of controversy, brethren, that I resume my humble pen after so long a time, but my attention is called to an article by Brother Nordyke, in THE RESTITUTION of October 6th, which appears to be a criticism on an article from the pen of Brother Churchill, who, in that article, contends, that "the Lord's day" of Rev. i. 10, has not yet been introduced, of which, of course, our good Brother Nordyke, attempts to prove the fallacy. Now, what we want to get at, is the truth of this matter, as well as all other truths that go to make up the whole sum and total through this, as well as each separate one of itself. To know, or not to know in every minutest particular, may neither damn nor save any of us, yet it will not hurt us to know all we possibly can, so long as we have grace sufficient to keep us humble, so that we do not become puffed up, as this is the tendency of knowledge when we lack grace. 2 Cor. viii. 1.

The Lord's Day, here, has not the remotest reference to either Sunday,—"the First Day of the week,"—or the Jewish Sabbath. To apply it to either one of these would be like whittling down the great Pyramid of Egypt into a little ant mound, or, literally reducing a thousand years into one solar day. Do you ask why? We answer, because the phrase, the "Lord's Day," is precisely synonymous with those expressions so often found, both in the Old and New Testaments, such as "the Day of the Lord," "the great and terrible day of the Lord," "the day of God," "the day of Christ," "his day," "the day of judgment," "God hath appointed a day wherein he will judge (or rule) the world," etc. These varied expressions all point to one and the same period of time in the divine purpose, and John's day perfectly synchronizes with them, "The Lord's day" simply being a transposition of "the Day of the Lord" in another place, and when we find what wonderful things are to be accomplished in the period here designated and set apart, when we notice how much is to be done, and what amount of glory is to be revealed, and what magnificent displays of divine grace and grandeur are to fill in this allotted space, how absurd to confine it to one little point of time—a day of twenty-four hours. So Brother C. is right when he says that it is "the day of the reign of Jesus and his bride, who will then be exalted to the throne," etc.

Now, it is a mere assumption on the part of our Brother N. to say, as he does, "that this is the day now called Sunday," and the same which we, by Scriptural authority and apostolic usage, call the First Day of the week, (referring us to Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2,) and by other kindreds it is called the Sabbath, etc. He seems to take the common translation, as most all do, as correct, never stopping to think for a moment, whether there may not be quite a different reading got out of this passage, and that, without the least wresting to our own destruction, which would alter the sense of it very materially, and that would be by merely changing the Greek preposition in, which we are fully warranted to do. Thus, instead of "I was in the spirit on" "I was in the spirit of the Lord's Day." Or, again, "I was in the spirit in reference to or concerning the Lord's day." So that John was not immersed or filled with the spirit during any one particular day of the seven, called the Sabbath or Sunday, while on the Isle called Patmos. John knew but little there, while in the lonely banishment, about our so-called Sundays or Sabbaths, and, doubtless, cared less. He had something of more importance, of more grandeur and glory, to occupy his mind there and then. He was carried away in the spirit of the Lord's day, (see Rev. xvii. 3,) and the sublime wonders that are to be exhibited to the world in that day, passed before him, both in panoramic and chronological review; and he was told by the revealing angel, who bears the name and speaks in the place of him "which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty," "What thou seest write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches," etc. It was these sublime visions which he was instructed to record as they passed before him consecutively, for the benefit both of the church and world, and to which the attention of all mankind is solemnly called that they should read, that they should hear the words of this prophecy, (concerning this great day) and keep those things that are written therein, for the time (of their accomplishment) is at hand;" and John was certainly in the spirit, or inspired with the Holy Spirit from God, when he penned this truly sublime production concerning the future, both of the church and the world. And I would just say here that, if we had no other revelation from God than what is contained in this divine Apocalypse, we should have full enough to carry us through this wilderness of woe, and land us safely within the bright portals of the Holy City of the New Jerusalem, amid the triumphant shout of saints and angels. And why? Because a special benediction is pronounced upon all who read, who hear it, and who keep the things therein recorded. Rev. i. 3. "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have a right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." Rev. xxii. 14. Let it be our purpose to strictly adhere to those things that are written therein that we may enter in upon that rest and joy that may obtain on the Lord's Day,—"the day which the Lord hath made for himself." Psa. cxviii. 24. "His day," "his times" when "he shall shew who is the blessed and only Potentate; the King of kings, and Lord of lords." 1 Tim. vi. 15.

For further proof that the above is a correct view of the case, I refer to Ezekiel. He, we find, was also carried away in the spirit, and saw visions of God, etc.; and while he abode "in the plain," secluded as John from the world, God says to him, "I will there talk with thee;" and here the glory of the Lord appeared to him, and the wonderful revelations were made of the future, both of the desolations of Jerusalem, Judah and Israel, and the splendor and the glory that should obtain in "the latter days." Ezek. iii. So it was with the great Apostle. He was "caught up (or rather away) to the third heaven," (i. e., the third heaven that Peter speaks, "wherein dwelleth righteousness," 2 Pet. iii.,) or, as he says in another place, "caught up (or rather away) into Paradise," (i. e., Paradise restored, which is the same as the third heaven); he was carried away in the spirit and had the sublime glories of that new state of things—that new age—when Christ shall reign from sea to sea,—and from the rivers unto the ends of the earth; hence the Christian age or era. He saw the ineffable glory that will then cover the earth as the waters cover the sea, and "heard unspeakable words which it is not lawful for a man to utter." He seemed to be forbid to write what he saw concerning that day; John being the one assigned to do that work.

One word in reference to the Jewish Sabbath and I am done. It appears to me that it is one of those things that went down with the Jewish ritual in the overthrow of Jerusalem, and the dispersion of the Jews. It is a purely local institution; it belongs to a people, and its proper sphere and keeping is circumscribed within the limits of the Holy Land. I will not say that it has gone down so deep but what it may have a resurrection. I will not say but what it may be included in the things that are to be restored. There is to be a "restitution of all things that God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Amen. I know that, among these things spoken favorably of to that end, is Jerusalem, Mount Zion, Judah, Israel, and the throne of David, and the land to its pristine beauty and fruitfulness; and more, the temple and sacrifices, to some extent, at least, with the judges counsellors of Zion; and the feasts—"the feast of tabernacles," at least. Isa. i. 26; Zech. xiv. 16—and I think the Sabbath, also, though I believe that it is not expressly mentioned in so many words; but there is a strong inference which may be drawn from the fact that, as it was one of those things that went down with Jerusalem, that it will, therefore, come up with Jerusalem in the times of the restitution, when the lost will be found again, and the shattered and scattered fragments of all anterior ages shall be gathered up that nothing be lost.

In conclusion, may we not feel assured that those times are not far distant when the restoration will begin, that great Babylon must soon go down and Zion rise and shine, and the glory of the Lord be seen upon her. So shall we hope and pray. Amen.

WILLIAM SHEPHERD.

Newark, N. J.

The man whose honor cannot be treated in a business transaction is an infidel, though he superintends a dozen evangelical Sunday schools, presides at the noonday prayer-meetings, and is accounted the most polished pillar of the church.

First Principles.

Great error has occasionally arisen, and discussion has ensued, the primary cause of which has been misconception of the first principles of the faith and religion of Jesus the Christ. Not that these have been desired, but minor matters are elevated to a prominence that distorts the harmonious aspect of Christianity as it were. I would therefore call attention briefly to what I consider the bottom facts and dogmas of our faith and religion.

1. And principal in every respect is God. Frail, sick, dying man, craves help and begs for life. "The name of the Lord is a strong tower, the righteous fleeth into it and are safe." It is to be hoped that in every nation some fear God and work righteousness, and it is written "whoso honoreth him, he will honor," that God is, and is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him is a fact and a dogma that cannot be too strongly adhered to or too firmly emphasized, all must be in subservience to it.

2. Acceptance of the Word of God both in its primary meaning relating to his revealed will, the Bible and in its secondary but superior sense its manifestation in the flesh, Jesus of Nazareth, the Savior and deliverer of men. The embodied generosity of his Father. The revealer of the kind feelings our great Creator has toward us. The reservoir of eternal life. The hope of man. "Whoso loveth him loveth his Father also."

3. The practice of the spirit of Christ as manifested in his life and sayings, "Whoso loveth him keepeth his sayings." "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy soul, thy mind, and strength, and thy neighbor as thyself; on these two commandments hang all the law and prophets." Our Lord himself seems to have considered this the sum and substance of his doctrine, a synopsis of the whole duty of man. The church of Christ is founded on, and built of these principles.

Now there are errors and absurdities abroad, that though not openly waring against these doctrines, and truths, yet, so obscure them as to render much of the Scriptures comparatively meaningless to the disciple. Prominent among such are the souls (immortality, trinity, etc. But I opine that absurdities such as these ought not to be dignified to the prominence of first principles, they are open absurdities, what more can be said? And are we authorized to pass judgment on men that have absurd notions? Were there not "fools" in the church at Corinth who practically, if not actually denied the resurrection? Yet Paul never "excommunicated" them, only argued with them. Were there not those that believed strange things concerning idols? Were there not those at Galatia who departed from Paul's gospel to another and yet the "brethren" are addressed kindly there? Did not the disciples themselves believe in "ghosts" when they saw the Master on the sea? Be merciful, brethren, "for with what judgment we judge, we shall be judged, with what measure we mete, it will be measured to us again." Let's leave a margin for ourselves.

Also there are minor truths that are exalted to absurd prominence sometimes. I heard of a case in Scotland of a man who was baptized into a clearer understanding of the doctrine concerning the devil. I hear and know of many cases where men discover some new light concerning Scriptural truth and straightway are rebaptized. There are others that hold that a certain formula is necessary at baptism or we are heathen men and infidels. Some require that before recognizing Christ in baptism the sinner should be instructed in all Scriptural truth and traditional error. In fact, some "draw the line" somewhere and others somewhere else. Some at total abstinence and some at the colored population, which last though provocative of a smile is an actual fact to which I testify. I think we ought not to be so ready with our chalk to "draw the line." God has already "drawn the line" and he has drawn it somewhere round his Son. Christians! Rally there! "Come unto him all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and he will give you rest; take his yoke upon you and learn of him." "Whosoever will let him come" get out of his way and clear the road.

"The Old Bell Clapper."

To All to Whom it May Concern:

Isn't there somebody in your church that is always talking about the coldness of the brethren,—the divisions that abound, the cold state of piety, the conformity to the world, the want of love among the brethren and sisters;—in other words who is continually confessing other people's sins instead of their own? My word for it that man is the cause of much of the evil that he complains of; and magnifies it by his complaining. The fable of the Old Bell Clapper will apply to such. The bell in which the clapper hung was cracked—and the clapper was always complaining of its sad fate in being hung in such a bell. A good many unsophisticated people pitied the clapper and condoled with its sad lot. At length the spirit of Diogenes, the old Cynic, who could not endure shams of any kind came along; he heard the clapper's complaint and said; Before you make any more fuss about the bell, remember two things,—first, you cracked it and "second," nobody would know that it was cracked if you did not tell them.

The moral is obvious—those who are captious and faultfinding are generally the ones who are the most faulty.

SELECTIONS.

The Deluge.

Lenormant, a man of vast learning, has recently discussed the question of a Universal Deluge. He shows that the tradition prevails in various forms, and with astonishing resemblances, in Babylonish and Assyrian history, in the writings of the ancient races of India, China, Greece, Scandinavia, and even among the aborigines of America. President Bartlett of Dartmouth, drawing largely upon Lenormant, thus condenses the various traditions:

Many of these traditions enter quite extensively into details, more or less tinged by the locality, but often remarkably co-incident with the biblical narrative. Thus, the ancient Chaldean legend, by Berosus, mentions the previous warning of Xisuthrus, the command to take his family and nearest relatives, with animals and birds, into an immense ship (five furlongs in length), and to provide them food; his obedience; the coming of the flood; the sending out of birds three times successively; the landing on a mountain in Armenia; the disembarkation; the praying; the building of the altar and the offering of sacrifices. The Aztecs of Mexico (in their paintings) represented Coxcox and his wife in a boat on the waters at the foot of a mountain; and a dove, with the emblem of languages in its mouth. The tradition of the neighboring people of Michuacan described the boat as filled with various kinds of animals; but substituted the vulture and the humming-bird for the raven and the dove—although the Cuban tradition retains these last mentioned birds. The closest approximation to the Scriptures narrative is found, strangely enough, in the Greek of Lucian. He relates that the former race of men were destroyed for their great wickedness; that the earth sent forth water, great rains fell, the rivers and sea rose, till all things became water and all men perished, except Deucalian (with his family), who was saved for his piety. He built a great ark, into which he conveyed his wife and children together with animals in pairs, and remained with them in a divinely established friendship as long as the flood prevailed. A Polynesian tradition mentions eight persons saved in a canoe. The Vedas of India gave a statement very similar to Lucian's, but more brief, concerning Manu, who, with seven other holy sages, entered the ark, was saved from the flood which destroyed the race, and was landed on a mountain, where he offered sacrifice, and went forth to re-people the world. In short, as Kalisch has well said, "there is scarcely a single feature in the biblical account which is not discovered in one or several of the heathen traditions;" while "the coincidence extends also to the whole outlines—the very spirit and tenor of the narrative." And, as most of these traditions are manifestly independent of each other, "with differences as striking as their analogies," they carry us back to an historical event which "really happened in the ages of the childhood of mankind"—an event which has been branded into the memory of the nations, in all their dispersions from their common origin. The conclusion is inevitable.

But it is also remarkable how the ancient central narrative in the Bible gathers up the coincident features of all these traditions; and how sober and self-consistent is its story in contrast with the wildness and incompatibilities of these scattering traditions. Thus the Chaldean legend ascribes to the ark the impossible length of five furlongs. The Scripture narrative gives a vessel not quite so large as the Great Eastern, and in breadth and height almost exactly coincident with it. If we reckon the cubit at twenty-one inches (which is but three-tenths of an inch more than the Egyptian cubit), we get the breadth of eighty-seven and a half feet and the height fifty-two and a half; those of the Great Eastern being respectively eighty-three and fifty-eight feet. The length of the ark would be 525 feet; of the Great Eastern, 680—a difference which would be of importance in navigation), while making the ark the stronger vessel. This correspondence in structure to the best results of modern naval architecture is sufficiently remarkable. The narrative gives the height of the water above the mountains at the very moderate amount of fifteen cubits; while the Babylonish tale carries it "to heaven," so that "the gods sought refuge, they ascended to the heaven—thus gods, like dogs, fixed in droves prostrate."

The Scripture narrative assigns the consistent time of a whole year for the stupendous transaction, tracing its steady progress, culmination, and decline by stages, with the wise precautions and delays of Noah till all was ready for his departure. The Babylonian account completes the work of the flood in seven days, and the restitution in seven more. The sacred narrative mentions not only the obvious attendant phenomenon of the prodigious storm; but the more effective cause, the breaking up of the foundations of "the mighty deep." The Babylonian gives only a storm or tempest.

There is nothing against, but much in favor of the view advanced by Kurz, and adopted by Tayler, Lewis and others, that the narrative has come directly down from the time of Noah, and is far older than Moses. Kurtz judiciously remarks that "that the account of the flood bears all the marks of a carefully kept diary," and we may add, of an optical description. This is sufficiently obvious even in the translation, but still more so in the original. Observe the exactness, sometimes emphatic, of all the dates and numbers. Not only the precise dimensions of the ark and the depth of the water; but year, day and month constantly given. "The six hundreth year, second month, seventeenth day of the month, the same day," the very day, or, literally, "the bone of that day;" then forty days and one hundred and fifty days; "the seventh month and seventeenth day of the month;" "the tenth month on the first day of the month;" "forty days;" "seven days" and "seven days;" "the six hundred and first year, first month, first day of the month;" "the second month, and seven and twentieth day of the month"—all these precise statements are the natural records only of a participant. Look again at the description, and see how optical. One almost sees the long procession in the third and fourteenth verses (ch. vi.) winding into the ark. Then the gradual rise of the flood (vs. 17–19) as the "waters increased, and bare up the ark, and (at length) it was lift up above the earth." And still "the waters prevailed and were greatly increased," and "the ark went (literally "walked") upon the face of the waters." And still "the waters prevailed exceedingly," till at length "all the high hills under the whole heaven were covered"—out of sight. There is a scene of death (v. 21.) and a waste of waters prevailing a hundred and fifty days (v. 24.)

Then comes a reaction; "the waters returning from off the earth continually ("going and returning;") the ark grounding; and, thirteen days later, "were the tops of the mountains seen." Could anything be more strikingly vivid? Noah opens his window; but cannot see satisfactorily—perhaps by reason of dense mists—and when the dove returns, "puts forth his hand" and takes her in. The second time she returns: "Lo! an olive leaf, fresh plucked." Again (ii. 13): "He looked, and behold the face of the ground was dry." To one who carefully follows the Hebrew, the whole narrative seems like the vivid description of a looker-on. And why not? A scene that has so sunk into the memory of the nations, in all their wanderings, why should it not come down the line of the chosen seed, from the very transaction, in all its freshness and vivid accuracy?

NEWS ITEMS.

CONSTANTINOPLE, October 16.—An Austrian dragoman has been assassinated at Priesrend, Albania. Baron Calice, the Austrian Ambassador here, consequently declared that he will hold the Porte responsible for the safety of the Austrian Consul at that place.

LONDON, Oct. 18.—A dispatch from Castil Moro says Admiral Seymour has informed all the Admirals that the Turks are concentrating a large number of Troops in Smyrna. The British Ambassador has made representations to the Porte concerning the matter.

The Spanish Minister of Justice has informed the Papal Nuncio that any priest who alludes to politics in his sermons will be expelled from Spain. The interference of clergymen in political matters seems to be resented equally in France, Ireland and Spain.

THE SOUTH AMERICAN WAR.

LIMA, Peru, Sept. 22.—The Chilians have begun the bombardment of Callao and Chorrellos. The diplomatic body agreed they could do nothing to protect the threatened towns. The Chilian authorities claim the invading army will consist of 30,000 men, divided into four divisions, each consisting of two brigades. The divisions are to number from 6,000 to 7,000 men, and to be accompanied by 500 cavalry and twenty-five Krupp cannon, giving a total cavalry force of 2,000 sabers and [illegible] guns as their artillery. They hope to destroy the flourishing Kimic valley.

LA CROSSE, Wis., Oct. 17.—The storm all along the line of the Southern Minnesota Railway was the severest known in years. Passenger and freight trains all along the line were blockaded in snow-drifts from ten to twelve feet deep, and teams with provisions have been despatched to their relief from several points. The train which left La Crosse Friday had not been heard from since leaving Fulda that night. All the cuts west of Fairmount were filled with snow, packed hard. Reports of cattle, horses, etc., having perished are constantly received, but no loss of human life is yet reported. It is the worst storm ever known in Southern Minnesota and Eastern Dakota.

A EUROPEAN WAR PREDICTED.

Mr. Louis J. Jennings, the London correspondent of the New York World, telegraphs his paper as follows:

I hear on very good authority that Germany, France and Austria entered into a private engagement not to exert any further pressure upon the Porte, provided that it consented to give up Dulcigno, and that consequently if Mr. Gladstone now persists in his policy, it will be in alliance with Russia only. The leading supporters of the Gladstone administration now admit—privately of course—that war is almost inevitable at a very early date, probably in the spring of 1881, and some financiers in the city usually reckoned on as shrewd and far-seeing men are already planning extensive operations with the outbreak taken for granted. The Greeks are determined to obtain possession of Janina at all hazards and cost, and Mr. Gladstone is as resolute in his determination to help them, while Turkey will yield no more—indeed, can yield no more. The ministerial papers, therefore, are gradually preparing the public mind for the apparently unavoidable issue of war.

LETTER DRAWER.

Editor Restitution:—We are still wayfaring our journey through this state of trouble and toil, still hoping to see the dawning of a better day through the return of our absent Lord. We have no preaching or organized church of the Church of God in Oregon that I know of. The S. D. Adventists have their organization, and are zealous; also the Christadelphians have their churches, but the gospel of the kingdom and the doctrine of the restitution of all things spoken by the prophets is still unpopular with Cæsar and the world. Editor Restitution:—I write these lines under very distressing circumstances. I am here in the Territory with friends, to be sure, but several hundred miles from home and family. I have been taking care of Brother Henry Peck and two sons, who were sick with typhoid fever; one son died; the others are convalescent; and now, I am down and out of money, far from home. I thought I would write to you, and if you thought proper to present my case through THE RESTITUTION to the brethren, there might be some one who wished to lend the Lord a mite, "Give to the poor," etc. Could send to my address either at Floyd, Iowa, or De Smet, Kenyon county, D. T., to help me in my distress. Do as you think proper about inserting an item. No doubt there are many who would respond. I am just able to sit for my bed to be made.

Editor Restitution:—It is some time since you heard from me, notwithstanding I am still a watchman in the world, although not of it. Here I endeavor to give meat in due season to the hungering and thirsting ones, and to sinners, bringing Christ's brilliancy to reprove as the light that shineth in darkness, trusting, hoping, and praying that, peradventure, our God will open "the way, the truth, and the life," to some lost, ignorant, dead brethren of the flesh natural; as sowers, planting, watering; this is all; God holds the power of increase. The dear RESTITUTION comes weekly. It is appreciated, as in weariness I have to rest, this weekly visitor aids a servant of God in recuperation.

POETRY.

[Christian Register.]

Alone.

Alone! no voice to cheer me on,
No feet to tread with me
The shadowed path that, stretching on,
Ends in eternity.

Alone! my sad heart fainter grows,
My feet begin to tire;
Yet still the thorny way I tread
Through bramble and through mire.

Alone! alone! no footprint seals
Its impress on the sand;
I hear no step,—the wave of death
Has swept the barren strand.

Before my face, I dare not look;
Behind, O grass-green graves!
Your stand between me and the past,
And slim those golden days.

Your shadow hides those joyous hours,
And that unbroken ring;
Dark falls between me and those days
The veil of suffering.

Why must the oil of bitter woe
Be poured upon my head?
Why must some joy in living love,
And I bemoan my dead?

O Christ, the path that thou hast trod
Shall I refuse to tread?
Through thorny ways and shadowed paths,
I go where thou hast led.

The eye of faith can dimly see
Thy foot-print on the shore;
I cannot tread the way alone
Where thou hast passed before.

So, taking up my heavy cross,
Onward with joy I press;
I see no more the shadowed path,
But count it only bliss,

With Him to wear the thorny crown,
And press the cup of woe;
With Him, with bleeding hand and feet,
The weary way to go.

Through Him to thread new blessings on
My sad life's broken string;
By Him and heaven, and then for Him
Perfect the broken ring.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Editor Restitution:—I consider it a great pleasure as well as a duty to record the spread and advancement of the truth as it is in our blessed Lord and Savior, Jesus the Christ. Therefore with your permission I will give you and your readers a brief account of the visit of Brethren Magruder and Jones to our County of Henderson, in the southern part of Kentucky. It had never been my privilege, prior to the visit of the above named brethren, to listen to a preacher of the gospel, and you can imagine with what feelings I repaired to the house of Bro. F. A. Blackwell, where Brothers Magruder and Jones were stopping immediately after their arrival, and where I was to meet them for the first time. I shall never forget the first night I spent with these beloved brethren, now how happily I looked forward to the morning (Sunday), when I was to hear them proclaim the precious tidings of salvation. But truly "man proposes, and God disposes;" for before the morning's sun Brother Magruder was taken suddenly and painfully ill, and although, through the mercy of God he was permitted to deliver one most excellent and instructive discourse, as an answer to the momentous questions, Whence came I? What am I? Whither am I going? Yet for about two weeks he was confined to his room at Brother Paul Blackwell's, where every kindness and hospitality was shown him. When convalescent, fearing the effects of the hot weather, and the exertion of speaking might bring a recurrence of his disease, Brother Magruder left for home. It has never been my lot to be thrown with one more patient in suffering, lovable in disposition, and noble in conversation; and surely the prayers of all God's people should be offered up to him that he will spare our brother until the coming of the Lord, which cannot be far off.

In the meantime, while Brother Magruder was sick, and after his departure for Virginia, Brother Jones was laboring most faithfully and successfully in the Master's vineyard. Some thirty-five were added to the church which now numbers about 105 members. Bro. Jones while with us, besides preaching the gospel to hundreds, he met in debate two clerical orthodox foes and completely routed them. The first debate was with one Mr. Miller who is a perfect exemplification of one who "is wiser in his own conceit, than seven more who can render a reason." The propositions discussed were.

1, At death man ceases to be conscious till the resurrection. (Jones affirmed).

2. The punishment of the wicked will consist in the extinction of their being. (Jones affirmed.)

You may notice that the affirmative of both propositions placed the burden of proof on Bro. Jones, and thus gave the discussion the appearance of unfairness. But the truth is mighty and must prevail, so Brother Jones had no difficulty in disposing of the few arguments that eked through our clerical friend's rant and roar. Absurd anecdotes and pointless jokes characterized his speeches, which seemed constructed the rather to catch the floating laugh, than to unfathom the deep things of God. Bro. Jones went right on with the testimony in a masterly way, and unswerving in his aim, struck the whole fabric built upon the serpent's lie to the ground. The debate lasted two days and was largely attended by the most intelligent people in Henderson county. After the debate Brother Jones delivered several excellent lectures on the soul, spirit, etc., which I think did good in placing before the community a clear and Biblical idea of the nature of man.

The second debate was with Mr. Needham, a Methodist. This gentleman undertook to prove that Jesus our Lord will never return to earth to establish his kingdom, and that a person to be saved must not believe the gospel of that kingdom. Instead of proving this he proved himself utterly ignorant of the Bible teaching. Bro. Jones had no trouble at all in upsetting the fanciful theories of this disciple of Wesley, and in a two days discussion completely demolished him. Bro. Jones' visit to us was productive of much good, and he carries with him the heartfelt blessings of the brethren of Henderson county.

The Lord has given us a "season of refreshing" this summer, and though our dear Brother Magruder was not permitted to enjoy it with us, yet I hope through the goodness of our heavenly father, he may again visit us, and speak to us of that "eternal inheritance" which the blessed Savior has promised, we shall share if by continuance in well-doing, we seek for glory, honor and immortality.

Believe me, your brother, in the one glorious hope of our calling.

Editor Restitution—Enclosed please find one dollar for subscription for RESTITUTION for balance of year, hoping that Jesus, the prince of the kings of the earth, will soon come to take possession of his kingdom. All power is given unto Jesus in heaven and in earth. Matt. xxviii. 19. The name of Jesus is above every name. That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow of (things) in heaven, and (things) in earth, and (things) under the earth. Phil. ii. 9-10. For in Jesus dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and ye are complete in him (Jesus) which is the head of all principality and power; in whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ; buried with him, viz: Jesus, not the Father and the Holy Ghost, for the Father never died nor ever was he buried; and baptism being in the likeness of a death and burial, we know that Jesus died and was buried, and hence, we have the apostles explicitly saying," be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ," &c. Acts ii. 37. Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death, &c. Rom. vi. 3. Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you, or were ye baptized in the name of Paul (mark, Paul does not use names, in the plural). 1 Cor. i. 13.

For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ (not Father, Son and Holy Ghost, for therein the name of Jesus does not occur, "Son" being his (viz; Jesus) relationship to the Father, but not his name; but as the angel said his name shall be called Jesus; (Luke i. 31,) and so we believed it,) Gal. iii. 27.

And whatsoever ye do in word or deed, (do) all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him (not through him). Col. iii. 17. See Heb. i. 6: . . . . And let all the angels of God worship him. Again, For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulders; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Isa. ix. 6.

Hence, we believe God the Father made Christ everything to us. Christ is our Counsellor and Wisdom, our Father, our God, (see Heb. i. 8,) our Righteousness and our Eternal Life (for the record of God is that he gave the Son life, and the life is in the Son). Finally, when Christ delivers up the kingdom to God even the Father, he (Christ) will then be the Prince of Peace, because there will be no more to subdue, the last enemy which is death being destroyed. 1 Cor. xv. 22-26.

God is well pleased with this son and says, "hear ye him," Matt. xvii. 5, and the declaration is . . . every soul which will not hear that prophet shall be destroyed from among the people. Deut. xviii. 18; Acts. iii. 23.

Yours in hope of eternal life when Jesus comes.

HENRY DAUTERICH.

Editor Restitution:—We are informed in 2 Corinthians—we all with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord are changed into the same image from glory to glory as by the spirit of the Lord. For God who commanded the light to shine out of the darkness has shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. For says John, we know that the Son of God has come and hath given us an understanding that we may know him that is true in his Son Jesus Christ,—thus we see that truth has its subsistance in Deity and its exemplification in the person of Jesus of Nazareth. God is in Christ and we in him through the Christ. By being in Christ we are in God in experience and faith—but truth is not the only element developed; for grace and truth subsist together in Deity as also mercy and truth meet together in the Divine mind; all which are embraced in the person of Jesus Christ. Truth springs eternally in the mind of God;—through Jesus of Nazareth it was unfolded to Israel: through the written word it has its outlet into the world of humanity and is therefore destined to become universal in its reign and to exert salutary influence on the condition of mankind,—hence the Master in praying for his disciples said, Sanctify them through thy truth. The truth which is after godliness was the great concern of Paul in opening of his Epistle to Titus: this form of the truth is of practical bearing and which Paul tells us to think upon, as the outgrowth of the knowledge we have of the true God and eternal life through the mediation of Jesus of Nazareth. To know the only true God and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent is therefore necessary to eternal life. Thus we ascend upon the scale of moral excellence from partial to universal good. It is ordo rerum ecclesiam. The order of heavenly things. As first, God is seen in his works: second, in the person of his son: and third, through the written word. We thus have a large scope spread out before us in which we ascertain what God has done: what he requires: what he has taught:—the law of faith: charity to the poor and an unspotted life as an embodiment of the truth of God which is according to and after the manner and fashion, practice, temper and spirit of a Godlikeness as also of practical godliness. God illuminated the universe,—Jesus of Nazareth reflected the light from his person, and the written word as a medium shed the same light upon the world. As Jesus said, I come a light into the world. The law is light whether expressed in the starry heavens, or manifested in the word of life; All we mean to say is that Jesus of Nazareth hath filled out all legal demands and become a polished reflector of the truth of a godlikeness as well as the medium of Divine intercourse between God and man.

CHRISTADELPHIAN.

G. W. MINOR, Amanuensis.

P. S.—When justice is awarded among men the whole truth is required to be given upon testimony: God requires the same extending his requisition to the intents of the heart as it is said in the 15th Psalm: But the outward action in the life is required also as it is said avoiding the very least appearances of evil and whatsoever loveth and maketh a lie;—as John says no lie is of the truth, and in either theory or practice leaning to self must be left to Ananias and Saphiras.

How important the prayer, Lead us not into temptation!

We should cultivate a love for the truth, morally and physically; morally, to qualify us for God's service in the world:—physically, to give us skill in the arts of common life. Both are useful and ornamental and divinely required in the co-operation imperitive under which we are placed by the Scriptures, which saith, work out your salvation: and be helpers together for the truth's sake. This was the joy of the matrons who loved to see their children walk in the truth. Second Epistle of John to the Elect Lady and her children, whom I love in the truth.

CHRISTADELPHIAN.

Editor Restitution:—Permit me to answer a few letters of inquiry. I have had a number of letters from the different states from the different brethren to pay them a visit and preach for them, so I thought I would make a proposal to all the dear brethren if they would pay my expenses, that I would make a trip this fall east so far as Ohio, and farther, if the brethren would say so. Quite a number have already responded, and say that they will do liberally. Others, on the account of an enemy who a few years ago advertised me in THE RESTITUTION as being a Universalist, have frightened some brethren, and they write to me to know what I am, a Universalist, or what are you? Now, my dear brethren, as I do not wish to take the advantage of any one, I will give my belief in a short article, and then these brethren that have already responded to me and declared their intention of paying so much, can have an equal chance to withdraw their pledges with the rest, if, what I believe, has anything to do with your helping to defray my expenses. Now, for the faith: I believe that man is wholly mortal, and that man lost natural life in the violating of God's law in the garden—that is, Adam lost life—all his children have nothing more than Adam had, but Christ, the seed of the woman, will heal that bite, unconditionally; he will restore all of the first Adam's children back to natural life—that is a restitution. That restitution is unconditional, and Jesus, as the second Adam, will just as much restore Adam's oldest son as he will restore his youngest son. As the Son of Man, he is a kinsman to the whole human family, and, as such, will redeem all out of the death-state; and so long as one of Adam's children will stay in the death-state because of Adam's sins, just that long Christ has not destroyed death. Here, now, comes eternal life or immortality: this belongs to the second Adam's family; this is conditional, and, in order that men may obtain this gift, they must develop a character.

1. They must hear the gospel—that is, good news, or glad tidings of a coming kingdom.

2. They must believe the things concerning this kingdom and the name of Jesus Christ.

3. They must reform their life or be converted to this faith.

4. They then must be baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus for the remission of sins.

5. Now, the seven Christian graces must be added to the faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, charity. Now they have the promise of the life that now is, and that which is to come. Now, remember to give a man something that he never had, is no part of a restitution. Man never had eternal life, neither immortality; so it is a gift from God to man.

6. Now, when that man sins, there remains no more sacrifice for sins; he is gone when he dies; he dies for his own sins, and there is just where the non-resurrection of the wicked comes in which the brethren have so long talked about.

7. I can't believe that God will destroy one of his creatures that he has made, without the true light is made known unto him first. And when that true light is once made known to a man, and he then rejects that true light, there remains no more sacrifice for him.

8. I believe that the world, before the flood, there were only a few persons selected for to fill a certain station in the world to come.

9. And the world that now is, was divided into three different ages—the Patriarch, Jewish, and Gospel. The first promise on this side of the flood was to Abraham. Gen. xii. The second one, Gen. xxii: "Then God swares with an oath to Abraham, that in him should all nations be blessed." In Gen. xxvi. the same thing was confirmed to Isaac. In Gen. xxviii. the same thing to Jacob. Well, in the next place, we see that, in the Jewish age, there shall be the same promise kept up. That this same seed should, at some future time, take the rein of government into his hand. Isa. ix. 6, 7, 8.

10. To make this article short, I am compelled to believe that the world, before the flood, and the world that now is, are just designed to select out of the nations a people, for a blessing to the nations in the next world, which world will be divided up into different ages, which the millennial or thousand years will be the first age in the world to come. And, in these ages the gospel in its purity will be preached to all of the earthy Adam's children—that is, to those who have never had an opportunity to hear the gospel—for the gospel must be preached, the gospel must be believed, and men must be baptized before they can be saved; and those who never heard the gospel cannot neither be saved nor damned by the gospel. Now, last, do you understand me, when this gospel has been preached—that is, to save men and women—to all, and those having heard it and rejected it, they are lost? So you see I am no Universalist, but I believe that God don't intend to destroy any man without one chance for their life.

This is a subject I would like to write on in some paper, but I guess there will no paper be opened as yet to present the true character of God in all of its features. Now, I will say, brethren, we had enough of first principles; let us go on to perfection, especially those of us claiming to be teachers. Let us investigate these Bible subjects with a Christian spirit, not trying to come out victorious; but let us see what the spirit teaches, not what a certain theory says. A word more to these brethren desiring to aid me on this trip: Let me hear from you soon; and those wishing to withdraw, you might do so immediately. You can judge from what you see in this short article, that I believe in a progression or a forward march. May the good Lord bless our aged editor and all its contributors to the paper; and may the day speedily come when the watchmen shall see eye to eye.

Editor Restitution:—In Bro. Weethee's excellent analysis of the Great Pyramid, 4th inst., he twice refers the Pyramid to the "Stone Age" of modern science. We think this an error. The stone age precedes the ideograph or the pleonegrammatic literature of Assyria—if there ever were a stone age. The retrogressive theory, and the immense development of the Pleistocene skulls (together with the translation of the Acthiote MSS. of Pharetah) have brought the modern etymologists to their marrow bones. It is more than probable that Moses knew what he was about when he wrote of the "artificers in metal" as antediluvians. The reaction among the modern philosophers—towards a specific theism—is very marked, and with the return to conservatism will come the overthrow of a stone age, and the "evolution of association."

Yours truly,

EVERETT W. FISH.

Chicago, Ill.

[We noticed the expression referred to, but concluded that Bro. Weethee was speaking in regard to the peculiarity of recording in stone as contrasted with the methods in later times. Job, of the patriarchal age, alludes to the rock-records. Chap. xix. 24. The Moabite Stone is also an example. The difference is—the records are built into the Pyramid, instead of being carved or engraved, as Egypt's manner was, on pillars.—ED.]

Editor Restitution:—Elder J. M. Stephenson was here on the 4th and 5th of September, and on Sunday preached two rousing gospel sermons that much astonished the majority who, I think, had never heard that interpretation of the Bible from a pulpit before. He baptized four at Richmond in the afternoon, and, while waiting for some to come from Genoa Junction, he gave a long discourse on baptism with a fervor and conviction that made a gray-haired Baptist brother claim him as a hard-shell Baptist. The sound of the gospel has gone out at least once here.

Respectfully, S. J. WILSON.

POETRY.

A Word of Kindness.

How softly on the bruised heart
A word of kindness falls,
And to the dry and parched soul
The melt'ring tear-drop calls!
Oh! if they knew who walked the earth
'Mid sorrow, grief and pain
The power a word of kindness hath,
'Twere Paradise again.

The weakest and the poorest may
The simple pittance give,
And bid delight to withered hearts,
Return again and live.
Oh! what is life if love be lost,
If man's unkind to man?
Or what the heaven that waits beyond
This brief and mortal span?

As stars beyond the tranquil sea
In mimic glory shine,
So words of kindness in the heart
Reflect the soul-re.Divine.
Oh! then, be kind, whoe'er thou art
That breathest mortal breath,
And it will brighten all thy life,
And sweeten even death.

COMMUNICATIONS.

The Reason of Our Hope as to the Reigning of Christ with His Saints to Bless.—Psa. lxxii. 17.

Sanctify the Lord God in your hearts, and be ready always to give * * A reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear. 1 Pet. iii. 15.

1. The first and last reason for believing his word of promise lies in the love of God. "God is love," and love delights in dispensing blessing, as light must shine, as love must, from its nature, go out after its object. "Perfect love" must seek perfection in that which is beloved, hence divine love to the world and to man, made in his image, can never fail to consummate his loving will, answering his own inspired prayer, fulfilling his promise and verifying his heavenly vision. "His glory will cover the heavens, and the earth be full of his praise."

Such is his object, and his way to it is by Jesus, the resurrection and reign with his saints, through the restitution of all things spoken. Gen. xxii. 17, 18; Acts iii. 21; Eph. i. 10; Psa. lxxii.; Rev. xx. to xxi. 1-5.

2. Jesus, in the long line of promise from Abel to John the Baptist, is the radiant centre of all the gracious words that sustained human hope. Jesus' name and his earthly life embody and unfold his mission, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus (Savior) because he shall save his people from their sins." Matt. i. 21. Then, blindness, deafness, disease and death, and the grave, yield to the power of his name. Hence, "the gospel is the glad tidings" of his coming kingdom and heavenly administration of our world's affairs. Psa. xxii. 27, 28. All his official titles confirm his gospel. We note them—"Savior, Deliverer, Redeemer, Restorer, the blessed and only Potentate, King of righteousness and Prince of peace,"—to give peace to our waring world. Then, we should recall to our minds the blessed terms chosen to set forth his divine dominion in harmony with his imperial titles. As the Savior, his work will be salvation; as Deliverer, he will achieve deliverance; and as Redeemer, he assures the foretold redemption; and so of all his titles. "On the throne of David to order it and establish it, with judgment and justice—forever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." Isa. ix. 67.

3. Beyond all these terms and titles glowing with "peace on earth and good will to men," we read this comprehensive call of mercy to both Jew and Gentile: "Rejoice, O ye nations, with his people—(the Gentiles with his chosen people, Israel)—for he will avenge the blood of his servants, and be merciful to his land and his people." Deut. xxxii. 43; Rom. xv. 8-13; Psa. lxxii. 11-17; Luke i. 69-73; ii. 32; Rev. xv. 4; xx. 4-6; Israel's blessing.

The longest period of Israel's affliction—"the seven times"—ends with covenanted mercy to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and the land. Lev. xxvi. 28-42. This is confirmed by the cleansing of "the sanctuary" at the appointed time. Dan. viii. 11-19; Ezek. xxxvii. "The heathen (nation) shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel, when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them forevermore."

4. "The great and appearing day of the Lord"—as a thousand years seems the period for this mighty revolution; "the times of restitution; the times of the blessed and only potentate; the King of kings and Lord of lords." Its beginning, progress and crowning close in the new heavens and earth, is noted, Acts ii. 20, and iii. 21; 2 Pet. iii. 8-10; 1 Tim. vi. 15; Rev. xx. to xxi. 5.

Thus, having sketched the Lord Messiah, in "the law, the prophets and the Psalms," and his honored royalty, as set forth in the New Testament, over Israel and the nations, we reach the climax and crown of all this wide range of revelation. This comes out in the unchanging truth of the unmistakable symbols of God's covenanted mercy to Noah in favor of man and earth.

These symbols, however familiar and delightful in themselves, seem unobserved in their proper relations to the exceeding great and precious promises of the kingdom to which they belong. For God's thoughts and ways are high as heaven above ours—except as our faith embraces them. But, alas! such faith is seldom found. Luke xviii. 8.

Among the oath-confirmed covenants is one to David and his seed—like that to Abraham—where "justice and judgment are the habitation of (his) throne; mercy and truth go before (his) face. Hence, blessed are the people that know the joyful sound." Psa. lxxxix. 1-36. For "in mercy shall the throne be established; and he shall sit upon it in truth in the tabernacle of David, judging and seeking judgment, and hasting righteousness." Isa. ix. 6, 7; xvi. 5.

5. "The covenants and their symbols, and the service of God and the promises to the fathers, of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came." All belong to the one great plan of redemption. They embrace man as its special object, and "the whole creation" as its sphere. Rom. viii. 22; ix. 4, 5; Rev. v. 9-14; xxi. 1-5.

6. Of all the verbal and visible symbols that shed light around and beyond the judgment throne, with its radiant beams of mercy to man and earth, none are more welcome and binding to the human heart than the rainbow. God teaches to profit. His goodness leadeth to repentance. But nothing in nature appeals with more fervor to the heart than sunshine and shower; the cloud and the rainbow—the seat of mercy to man and earth. Gen. ix. 8-17. God said to Noah: "Behold, I establish my covenant with you and your seed; and every living creature of all flesh, and the earth. I do set my bow in the cloud for a token of a covenant between me and the earth. The bow shall be in the cloud and I will look upon it, that I may remember the everlasting covenant between God and all flesh upon the earth."

7. This everlasting covenant assures (insures) man and the earth against another flood. Now, when brought forward into the New Testament, it insures, also, all the "glory to God and good will to men" that the gospel contains.

Again, when the rainbow is made the investiture of the herald angel, in announcing the close of "the times of the Gentiles," and the resurrection and reign of Christ with his saints; and, still further, when we find the same symbol—the rainbow seal of mercy to earth and man—round about the throne, with the elders and four living ones, we may see how "mercy rejoiceth against (glorifieth over) judgment." James ii. 13; Rev. iv. 3; x. 1-7. Hence, all this heavenly heraldry, the drapery of the herald-angel, and "the rainbow round about the throne," demonstrates to us that, "in mercy the throne shall be established." Isa. xvi. 5. This assurance that "the throne" is not a "throne of wrath" to creation, is made "more sure" by the grouping of the most glorious of all symbols. "The cloud" was the seat of the presence of God. Exod. xix. 9-16. "The sun, the greater light to rule the day," pre-figures "the sun of righteousness" and his supreme sovereignty, and "the rainbow" is the pledge that, as sunshine and shower are dispensed in mercy to sustain the life of the world, so it foreshadows the benign administration of the coming King. 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4; Psa. lxxii. 6-Mal. iv. 2; Matt. vi. 10; Rom. viii. 19-21. Then all such Scripture concurs with the sealing and triumphant grace to "the twelve tribes and Gentile nations." Chapters vii. 1-17; xv. 1-4; xx. to xxi. 5. It follows, of course, that all objections based on 2 Pet. iii., etc., read with the rest that remaineth, Heb. iv. 1-9, and the six-fold assertion of the 1000 years, Rev. xx. 3-7, seem like arraying "the morning star" against the orb of day, for both and all belong to him who enlightens and is about to save, deliver and bless the world. Amen. John xii. 47; Rom xi. 26-36; Psa. xxii. 27, 28.

The motives to faith and gospel obedience are infinite. The ending of rebellion by overcoming and destroying rebellious men and nations in, that the wisdom and virtue, glory and honor, righteousness and peace of promise, may prevail in their ever-enlarging amplitude through the age of ages. Amen.

"Divide the Word Aright."

I think, with Brother Moyer, that we ought to speak the same things; but how is this to be done? I say, as did Paul, divide the word of truth aright. Yes, says one, we are all trying to do that. Are you, when you are continually quoting from the life of Christ, as recorded by Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, to prove doctrinal points? Jesus taught by parables that none could understand; only to the apostles did he, while here, (before his death) explain a part of his sayings. John xvi. 12, 13. He told them to wait until they were endowed with power from on high, (Luke xxiv. 49,) then would be fulfilled John xvi. 13. In his lifetime was not the time to explain. John xvi. 25.

Many of the sayings of Christ while on earth, were given in germ form—prophecy clothed in symbolic form—to be developed from time to time, as the circumstances of the ages would require.

We have people advocating feet-washing from the example of Christ. After Pentecost, did Jesus or the spirit order the apostles to institute feet-washing, as a church ordinance? So, also, his saying, "tell it unto the church," is quoted as proof for turning brother men out of the church, as if one servant could put out his fellow servant! When did the apostles ever teach, "tell it unto the church?"

Again, we see numberless articles on "Born of Water and of the Spirit," (no two alike,) as if they all knew all about it. This text is taken to preach baptism from when there is not a word said about baptism in the conversation with Nicodemus. Where did the apostles teach that you must be born of water and of the spirit, as teaching baptism? The apostles taught water baptism, but they did not say that that constituted a birth of water—"burying" a person, as Paul calls it, Rom. vi. 4,—does not look much like a birth, but it looks more like the end of one's existence instead of the beginning.

Let us cease building on the dark sayings of Jesus while in the flesh; who did not come to any but to the Jews; and to them he did not see fit to explain, which is, also, proven by his prayer on the cross,—"Forgive them; they know not what they do." Luke xxiii. 34. This proves that he did not teach them plainly. See Matt. xiii. 34, also verses 10 and 11. What is there, then, that we cannot see alike (I am speaking of those of the One Faith) in the apostolic writings? Read Romans xii. The Acts of the Apostles is the only place to go to, to learn what the Jesus Glorified taught, what it was necessary to do to become one of the heirs (not the subjects) of the kingdom. The Epistles, or letters, are written to the heirs, (and to no one else) teaching them how to be of "one mind."

The life of Christ, commonly and incorrectly called the four gospels, were written that we might know that Jesus was the Christ that was prophesied of by the prophets. John xx. 31. Preach from the first four books and show that Jesus was the Messiah,—his beautiful life, his sufferings, death, burial and resurrection, and ascension.

Now, preach the gospel of glad tidings, of the narrow way, from the Acts of the Apostles, and call out men and women (not babies) from the world, to enter the race for the crown, to be joint rulers with Jesus when he returns to set up the tabernacle of David, to complete the restitution of all things, and then, when you have the alien enlightened (Matt. xiii. 23) baptize him into the one body, and then teach him what the apostles taught the heirs of salvation (in the Epistles) how to reform, and how to do it, and how to live, how to keep himself unspotted from the world, holding out faithful to the end, and then he would be one of those who would say, "The spirit and the bride say, come."

In love this is submitted,

The Inauguration.

Editor Restitution: — Could you spare room for me to call attention of those who are now very properly intensely interested in tracing out all the lineaments of the grand impending crisis of the ages, and who may have better access to helps than I, to the above topic?

I propose for inquiry:

I. That Num. ii.; Ezek. i.; Dan. vii. 13, 14; and Rev. iv. and v. are parallels, the first (Num. ii.) being typical,

II. That they describe, in part, Jesus' inauguration, his Father's giving him the kingdom in presence of all the redeemed saints and of all the angels.

III. That the scene is in transit, in the air. He has come thus far, in his glory, in his Father's glory, and with all the holy angels, and the saints have met him.

IV. Jesus is not yet enthroned. His Father's throne is central and pre-eminent. Jesus' regin and that of his saints is yet prospective, and to it this act is preparatory. He is proposed by his Father, accepts, (takes the book,) and is approved in songs of homage and praise (1) by all the saints, (2) by all the angels, and (3) by all the saints and all the angels in grand chorus. His government is arrayed, its order adjusted.

V. Details.—(1). "Four beasts" should read "four living creatures," as in Ezek. i.—lion, calf or ox, man, eagle. These are the same in Ezekiel and Revelation; and the Rabbis say these devices were on the four standards under which the Israelites encamped and marched in the wilderness.

Dr. Adam Clarke, on Rev. iv. 7, says:

"The first living creature was like a lion; this was, says the rabbins, the standard of Judah to the east, with the two tribes of Issachar and Zabulon. The second, like a calf, or ox, which was the emblem of Ephraim, who pitched on the west, with the two tribes of Manasseh and Benjamin. The third, with the face of a man, which, according to the rabbins, was the standard of Reuben, who pitched on the south, with the two tribes of Simeon and Gad. The fourth, which was like a flying (prend) eagle, was, according to the same writers, the emblem on the ensign of Dan, who pitched on the north, with the two tribes of Asher and Naphtalia. This traditionary description agrees with the four faces of the cherub in Ezekiel's vision.—See my notes and diagrams on Num. ii."

These four standards did, and the four living creatures do represent nationality, first of the Jews and second of Jesus and his saints.

(2). "Four and twenty elders," the twelve patriarchs or heads of tribes, and the twelve apostles. These are the official representatives of all the redeemed saints; while the four living creatures stand for the mass or body of the saints—all rulers and symbolized by zoa, as therta symbolizes Gentile rulers.

(3). The angels are outside, "round about," and the saints inside as more immediately interested.

VI. Then the seventh trumpet: "The kingdoms of this world are become (our Lord's and his Christ's)."

Then the taking the kingdom, the conquest, the breaking of Gentile power, the peaceful sway of David's Son and Abraham's seed, fruitful in blessing to the nations left.

This is more to solicit, than to give, light.

Translations From Martin Luther's German Letters.

"Sleep is nothing else than a death, and death a sleep. What is our death but a night's sleep? For as, through sleep all weariness and faintness pass away and cease, and the powers of the Spirit come back again, so that in the morning we arise fresh, and strong, and joyous; so at the Last Day we shall rise again, as if we had only slept a night, and shall be fresh and strong." When we shall live in that Day we shall look with wonder on one another, and say, "Shame! that we were not of better cheer, braver and stronger, and more joyful to trust Christ, and to endure the cross, and all tribulations and persecutions, since this glory is so great. At Easter-tide, in April, when there was least fear of rain, Pharaoh perished in the Red Sea and Israel was led out of Egypt. At the same season the world was created. At that season the year changes! and then Christ arose again and renewed the world. So, perhaps, at the same season will dawn the Last Day. I have a thought that this Day will come about Easter-tide, when the year is pleasantest and most fair; and early, when the sun ariseth, as with Sodom and Gomorrah. The heavens will become troubled, and there will be thunders and earthquakes, perhaps for an hour or longer. Then the people who see it will say, "See! see! you foolish creatures! Did you never hear thunder before!" And suddenly the whole world will fall together, and many a debt will remain unpaid.

SELECTIONS.

Assassination and Intolerance in Mexico.

ZACATECAS, Aug. 24, 1890.—I have just received a paper from Guadalajara, capital of adjoining state of Jalisco, which brings news of another horrible massacre. Our brethren at Guadalajara a short time since opened a place of worship at Salatillan, a town some five or six miles distant. The day previous to the assassination the priest of the place called his people together and told them that Protestants had done as they pleased with former priests, but they would not do so with him. On Sabbath morning, the 1st inst., three small groups of Protestants went out from Guadalajara to this place. Two of these companies reached the place of worship and were at once assaulted in a savage manner by a mob hurling stones against the house. About this time the priest said something to the crowd, and it at once started, followed by the priest and one or two of his accomplices, to meet the third group, which had not yet made its appearance. On the edge of the town they met it. It consisted of the native preacher, Antonio Reyes, his son, eight years of age, and two other men. These defenceless ones were set upon by the crowd, with clubs, pontrels, etc. The preacher was the first to receive mortal wounds. While he was on the ground helpless, one man made several attemps to cut off his head with his machete, and when the whole back part of his head was cleft open, the infamous, inhuman priest offered him absolution, and not being accepted, he fired two shots over him and left him. One of the other men and the little boy escaped, but the third man was seriously wounded, and, although the authorities had him taken to the hospital he was most shamefully neglected there. Six or seven of the assassins have been arrested, but the chief of them, the priest, Pagula, was still at liberty at last accounts. The priests are evidently growing bolder and more bitter in their opposition to Protestants. They trample upon the constitution and laws in very many places now with impunity, and it is a pretty general impression that the civil authorities, from the highest to the lowest, are coming more and more of late under the influence of the clergy.

Only a few weeks since two families connected with our congregation at San Luis Potosi, but living at a small town a short distance from the city, were attacked by a fanatical mob at night while in their homes. Their houses were broken open, and their escape seemed almost miraculous. The civil authority of the place is in sympathy with the priest and mob, so that our brethren have been compelled to leave the place. A little more than two months since, after preaching several times in a town some hundred miles south of Zacatecas, the house where I was lodging, which was that of the highest authority of the town, was assaulted in the night by a mob of twenty-five or thirty who stoned the house and fired several shots into it. About the same time last year, while preaching at a large town in the northern part of the state, a mob of two hundred or more came upon us with fiendish yells and showers of stones, and we barely escaped through tardy interference of the authorities, who made no effort to arrest the offenders. In former cases a number of the mob were arrested and punished, but this was because the chief officer of the town is a Protestant.

In all these cases we know that the people were incited to these acts of violence by the priests. The poor, ignorant people are not, perhaps, altogether innocent; but the real assassins are the priests who incite them and urge them on to commit these crimes.

BREVITIES.

A new inscription in Phœnician characters has been discovered at Jerusalem. The letters yod, mem, samech and ain in the form of highest antiquity are distinctly recognized. The discoverer of the inscription writes that the characters on the stone are small and bear much resemblance to those of the Mesha stone.

The lines of railways in the five divisions of the earth coat, in round numbers, $10,000,000,000, and would, according to Baron Kolb, reach eight times round the globe, although it is but little over half a century since the first railway worked by steam was opened between Darlington and Stockton, Sept. 27, 1825, and between Manchester and Liverpool, Sept. 15, 1830. It is shown that in France, previous to the existence of railways, there was one passenger in every 336,000 killed, and one out of every 30,000 wounded, whereas between 1835 and 1875 there were but one in 5,178,600 killed, and one in 580,450 wounded, so that we may infer that the tendency to accidents is yearly diminishing. Railway traveling in England is attended with greater risk than in any other country in Europe. A French statistician observes that if a person were to live continually in a railway carriage and spend all his time in railway traveling, the chances in favor of his dying from a railway accident would not occur till he was 950 years old.

THE THUNDERBOLT.

The name thunderbolt, which is still in use, even by good writers, seems to have been introduced in consequence of the singular effects produced when lightning strikes a sandhill or sandy soil. It bores a hole often many feet in length, which is found lined throughout with vitrified sand. The old notion was that an intensely hot, solid mass, whose path was the flash of lightning, had buried itself out of sight, melting the sand as it went down. It is quite possible that this notion may have been strengthened by the occasional observation of the fall of the aerolites, which are sometimes found in the holes they have made, still exceedingly hot. And at least many of the cases in; which lightning is said to have been seen in a perfectly clear sky are to be explained in the same way. Every one knows Horace's lines:

"Diespiter
Igni corusco nubila dividens
Plerumque, per purem tonantes
Egit equos volucremque currum."*

But Virgil's remark is not so commonly known. He is speaking of prodigies of various kinds, and goes on:

"Non alias celo cecidere plura serena
Fulgura; nec diri toties arsere cometæ."†

It is very singular that he should thus have associated comets and meteorites, which quite recent astronomical discovery has shown to have a common origin. Another remarkable peculiarity, long ago observed, is the characteristic smell produced when lightning strikes a building or a ship. In old times it was supposed to be sulphurous; nowadays we know it to be mainly due to ozone. In fact, all the ready modes of forming ozone which are as yet at the disposal of the chemist depend upon applications of electricity. But, besides ozone, which is formed from the oxygen of the air, there are often produced nitric acid, ammonia, and other compounds derived from the constituents of air and of aqueous vapor. All these results can be produced on a small scale in the laboratory.—Professor Tait, in Nature.

[* The Lord of Day sometimes rifts the clouds with the lightning's dazzling blaze; sometimes with ferred wheels, and thunder-steeds, he whirls athwart the serenest blue.

† As when from the cleared skies the bright lightnings glance; or as the comet's flame of dire portent there burns above.—Ed.]

SENTENTIOUS PARAGRAPHS.

Conscience is half of religion.

Unmerited honors never wear well.

Proud hearts and lofty mountains are always barren.

Traits of character which you seek to conceal you had better seek to reform.

The sublimity of wisdom is to do those things living which are desired to be when dying.

Happiness is like a sunbeam, which the least shadow intercepts, while adversity is often as the rain of spring.

Do that which is right. The respect of mankind will follow; or, if it do not, you will be able to do without it.

"The book to read," says Dr. McCosh, "is not the one which thinks for you, but the one which makes you think."

Earth, whose Sabbath glories rise,
Crowned with more than Paradise;
Sacred be the impending veil!
Mortal sense and thoughts must fail,
Yet the awful hour is nigh,
We shall see Thee eye to eye.

The truth cannot be burned, beheaded, or crucified. A lie on the throne is a lie still, and truth in a dungeon is truth still; and the lie on the throne is on the way to defeat, and the truth in the dungeon is on the way to victory. No accidents of position can change the essential nature of things, or the eternal laws which determine their destinies.—Wm. McKinley.

Be our souls in peace possessed,
While we seek our promised rest,
And from every hearth and home
Breathe the prayer "O Jesus, come!"
Haste to set the captives free,
All creation groans for Thee.

LIVING FOR OTHERS.

It is ten thousand times harder to live right than to die right. It is not difficult for a man to give his life up through the chamber of death. But to give your life while you hold it, yes, and to use it so that it is a perpetual benefaction all through—that is hard, and that is the special Christian duty. To live in such a way that, as from the moon by night and the sun by day, light and guidance are issuing, so from you shall proceed an influence that comforts, cheers, instructs and alleviates the troubles and sufferings of life—this is the true following of the Lord Jesus Christ.—Ex.

Come, Self-Devotion, high and pure,
Thoughts that in thankfulness endure,
Though dearest hopes are faithless found,
And dearest hearts are bursting round.
Come, Resignation, spirit meek,
And let me kiss thy placid cheek,
And read in thy pale eye serene
Their blessing, who by faith can wean
Their hearts from sense, and learn to love
God only, and the joys above. —Keble.

The trials and the temptations of this life are all making us fit for the life to come—building up a character for eternity. You have been in a piano manufactory, did you ever go there for the sake of music? Go into the tuning-room, and you will say, "This is a dreadful place to be in, I cannot bear it. I thought you made music here." They say, "No, we do not produce music here; we make the instruments and tune them here, and in the process much discord is forthcoming." Such is the church of God on earth. The Lord makes the instruments down here, and tunes them, and a great deal of discord is easily perceptible, but it is all necessary to prepare us for the everlasting harmonies up yonder.—Spurgeon.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Coming Age—Its Proximity—Supplementary Remarks on the Signs Continued..."Many Shall Run To and Fro"—Age of Action—"Lovers of Pleasures More Than Lovers of God"—Tastes of the Age.—No. 30.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Developments of Science.—Examine the fields of science: What field is not alive with its armies of explorers? Till recently much of the earth's surface was marked on our maps. Terra incog—earth unknown. Place side by side, two systems of Geography, the one, 1880, the other, 1830. Compare the maps of Africa and America. See what has been done, and what discoveries have been made. Look at Southern Africa. Mark the variations of its river systems. Compare their Arctic maps. What has caused such onward movements? Men, inspired with the Spirit of discovery, are running to and fro, and searching deserts; and lands covered with stagnant pools, and deadly marshes, as well as the ice-bound poles. Compare works on Chemistry, Natural Philosophy, Mineralogy, Geology, Botany, of fifty years ago with those of our present times. The contrast is very great, showing very marked progress. So with all the natural sciences,—indicating an increase of mental activity. This age is one of inventions, in all mechanical departments. It is an age of remarkable facilities for the diffusion of knowledge. By the press and by lectures information is carried to every household. Compare the press of 1830 with the printing establishments of 1880;—see what an advancement in modes of travel—the means of carrying intelligence. By utilizing the power of steam and electricity, the world has been brought into one family, of five races.

These improvements are known to all; yet the cause is revealed to those only, who investigate, and believe God's holy book; such persons as study to understand what was revealed to the ancient prophets; the wise, shall understand. The world, absorbed in the desire of riches and honors, sees not the hand of God in these movements. The wise understand, but none of the wicked shall understand.

Progress in Christian Knowledge.—We are safe in saying that this expression, when uttered to Daniel, by the angel, had reference principally to the prophecies. "But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, (even) to the time of the end: many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." Knowledge on these prophecies that are now (B. C. 534) sealed.

Efforts to Understand the Prophecies.—This age has given birth to a school of prophetic expositors. Something has given rise to such desires. Many chains of prophecy, given to Daniel, are long. They extend to the close of human domination. In tracing those lines expositors cannot follow them beyond our lines. Events have so far unsealed them, as to produce a conviction that their end is near. Such a discovery has produced intense interest among the lovers of prophecy.

Within the last half century, this class has grown into a body of considerable magnitude. By the aid of the press, and by public lectures, information on these prophecies, has been widely circulated. Many have run to and fro; and knowledge on these subjects, is on the increase. This increase of knowledge, has opened the seal.

Who can doubt the character of this age? It is the time of the end; since its chief characteristic is the running to and fro and the increase of knowledge. This state is progressive; and this likeness is becoming more distinct. We look upon this prophecy as properly classed among the fulfilling and fulfilled.

2. Lovers of Pleasures More than Lovers of God.—This feature of our age demands more notice than we have yet given it. In a former number we defined the terms, with the promise, that we would give it further attention.

What do we understand by pleasure? Pleasure, in its widest sense, means, an emotion arising from the gratification of the senses or of the mind. Here it includes the senses principally—the gratification of the five senses, seeing, hearing, feeling, tasting, and smelling. What shall I see? What shall I hear? What shall I eat? What shall I drink? What shall I put on? If these five senses are fully satisfied, a kind of pleasure, is the result. What we design to show is, that we are now living in that pleasure loving age spoken of by Paul, when he said they would be lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God. This we desire to make clear, should it, in so doing, occupy us till winter. We are living in an age of wrong,—terrible wrong;—wrong in theory, and terribly wrong in practice; wrong in intellect, wrong in passion; unsound in everything. Religion is a mere fashion, and he that does not dress in the popular style, as to his Christian thoughts and modes of worship, might as well be out of the world. He must love the world, or be prepared to suffer the consequences of its hatred.

Christ, when speaking, evidently, of this age, compares it to the days of Noah; and also, to the days of Lot. In what particular? In pleasure-loving;—eating and drinking and marrying.

Peter and Paul express the same views. Pleasure loving, is the grand feature; it is much in little;—in two words—lovers of pleasure.

We shall now attempt to prove that ours is the pleasure-loving age. Christ said, Ye shall know them by their fruits.

The Fruits of this Age.—In naming the fruits, we confine ourselves to such as have a form of Godliness—passing by all such as make no profession of religion. Our theme has to do with professors only. We are to show, that the church—Christ's professed household, are pleasure-loving—fond of the gratification of the senses; and that they love these animal pleasures more than they love God.

The inquiry is not, Lord, how can I best serve thee, no matter what the cross; but how can I act to bring me the most enjoyment—the greatest animal pleasures? I want my fill of the world. I want to see everything that is worth seeing, hear everything that is worth hearing. I want to eat the products of all climes, to drink everything that will afford pleasure; I want to gratify every sense fully. What were these things made for, if not to use and enjoy? Let us eat and drink, and make the most of the things of this life.

That such was to be the condition of a part, and the ruling part of the Christian church of the last days is evident from Christ's own words, "Say in his heart, My Lord delayeth his coming, and shall begin to eat and drink with the drunken."

There is a great wrong in theory; and it is increased ten fold in practice. What is truth? was a question once propounded, by a person in high authority. Is truth, now, the object of pursuit, by the masses of the Christian household? Are they seeking after Bible truth? Bible truth is disposed of in a very summary manner. They are weighed in the Divine scales, this is correct. The fault is not in the scales. Bible truths should be weighed by God's holy book. The fault—the cheat is in the weighing. How do they use the Divine Scales? In one scale they put what they have previously decided to be truth; in the other scale they place what has been decided to be error. This previous weighing has been in human scales. Suppose that it is found that the human and Divine scales do not agree, that what in human scales, or balances, they denominated an error, a heresy, is about to out-weigh their pronounced truth, (for they admit that error has in itself no weight). What course is to be pursued to reverse the scales? By adding human authority to the error. In this manner is humanism made to out-weigh Divine revelation, both in theory and practice.

Let us handle the human and Divine balances for the purpose of ascertaining what we are to believe and do as Christians; for all admit that it is the duty of a Christian to believe what God says, and obey what he commands—believe every doctrine of God, and carry out fully his injunctions—believe and obey every truth, and reject every error. Watch the labeled doctrines as they are cast into the balances of Orthodoxy, and of Divine truth. They are unlike on nearly every topic weighed. How are they made to agree? Adding great names to the errors. What weight has human against Divine authority? Let us suppose a case. The bread used in the Lord's Supper: error—the real body of Christ, converted into flesh by the prayer of the priest. Truth—real bread, broken as a memorial of the breaking of Christ's body. How many names will it require to convert the error so as to make it out-weigh the truth? Cast in the names of the cardinals, the popes, the entire Roman Church; does it change error into truth, or cause it to out-weigh the truth?

Weigh in the Divine scales, the whole catalogue of human errors. Can they out-weigh one Divine truth? They may in man's estimation; but not in the judgment of Jehovah.

See those scales of Divine truth, suspended by the hand of God. Cast into one of the scales a Bible truth; how soon it makes the opposite scale kick the beam. Throw into the other scale a human, yet corresponding error, what effect has it? None. Cast in another error;—no effect. Put the authority of one great man upon the errors, and watch the scales. Light as the dust. Cast in an entire denomination. No effect still. Put in the mass of human Orthodoxy. They weigh nothing, in the eyes of Jehovah, against one of his truths. Weigh human practices in the same way, and the result is the same.

Thus it should be, if our theory and practice were correct. Is it so? Are Divine truths weighed upon the Divine scales? Have we their true weight? Do men embrace the truth at any cost? Or do they weigh and estimate truth according to number? How many human errors, borne down by the popular Christian world, will it require to convert any one of them into a Divine truth, or out-weigh it?

Truth is now weighed by numbers, wealth, and standing. When any new idea, or thought is presented, it is immediately asked, Have any of the rulers believed it? Is it sanctioned by the voice of the church? In practices, it is the same.

We have now explained the manner in which doctrines and practices become popular. It is accomplished simply by human authority. The practices are popularized by the masses; what the masses believe I believe, and what the masses do I can do. It is safe, say they, to believe and do as the masses. Hence a pleasure-loving church is the result. If they loved God supremely they would go by his weights and measures; but loving the world supremely, they follow its standard of Christian deportment. Christ saw such a church and described it. Paul and Peter had before them such a church, and gave its photograph.

Loving the pleasures of the world is one of the marked features of the apostacy: since it is directly opposite to the apostolic church, and in the face of Christ's Commands.

We believe, as it is written, If any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him. His tastes are totally perverted. The spirit of the world is so unlike the spirit of Christ, that the two cannot dwell together; we hate the one and love the other; or we cleave to the one and despise the other. When we love, and take pleasure in worldly things, in worldly occupations, and "worldly amusements, we have the evidence that our tastes are perverted.

This age of Christianity exhibits such a perversion of tastes in various ways; in no particular more strikingly is it manifested, than in its taste for information—its literature.

She is professedly the Bride of Christ. Her betrothed went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return, when the nuptials are to be consummated. In the life and glories and honors of that kingdom she expects to share. Where, then, would reason tell us her affections would be, if she is a loving spouse? On her absent Lord in that far country, waiting for, desiring, and talking about her beloved husband. Is that the state of popular Christianity of the nineteenth century? Does his world-loving bride speak of his coming, talk of it, desire it? Does she read about his return? or does she say, My Lord delayeth his coming? What is her reading—her literature? Do not the popular churches command the wealth of the world? Is she not the great sustainer of our public literaries? Does she not sustain by her wealth the great periodicals of the day? Has she not ample means to suit her own taste in books and periodicals? Is she not free, in her reading, to suit her fancy and gratify her taste? This, no one will deny. She also gratifies her taste in reading matter. What reading does she stint; and what reading does she fully patronize? For by this her affections will be tested.

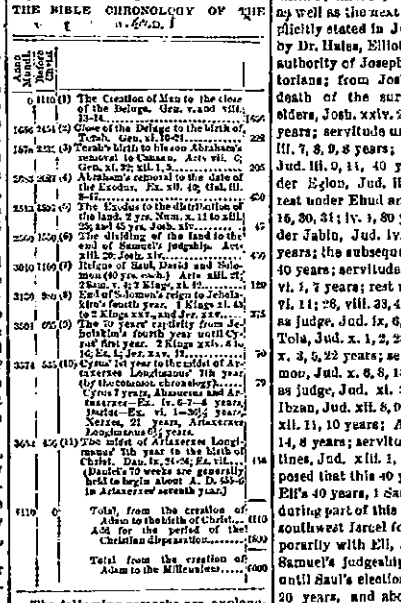
The End of the 6000 Years From The Creation, in 1800.

[Concluded From last Week.]

We reproduce again this week the table of the seperate periods which compose the whole period of 6000 years, and append explanations regarding those separate periods.

THE BIBLE CHRONOLOGY OF THE [illegible].



The following remarks are explanatory of the eleven component periods which make up the 6000 years in the foregoing chronological table:

1. The 1656 years consist of the generations from Adam to the close of the flood which are given in Gen. v. viii. 13, 14, as follows: Adam to Seth, 130 years; Seth to Enos, 105 years; Enos to Cainan, 90 years; Cainan to Mahalaleel, 70 years; Mahalaleel to Jared, 65 years; Jared to Enoch, 162 years; Enoch to Methuselah, 65 years; Methuselah to Lamech, 187 years; Lamech to Noah, 182 years; Noah to the close of the flood, Gen. viii. 13, 14, 600 years. These intervals altogether amount to 1656 years.

2. The period of 222 years between the flood and the Terah's birth is given in Gen. xi. 10-23, as here subjoined. The flood to Arphaxad, 2 years; Arphaxad to Salah, 35 years; Salah to Eber, 30 years; Eber to Peleg, 34 years; Peleg to Reu, 30 years; Reu to Serug, 32 years; Serug to Nahor, 30 years; Nahor to Terah, 29 years. Total amount 222 years.

3. Terah did not beget Abraham until he was 130 years old, as is shown by Gen. xi. 32; xii. 4, for when he died at the age of 205 years, Abraham, who then migrated to Canaan, was 75 years old. Gen. xi. 26 might seem to contradict this: "Terah lived 70 years, and begat Abram, Nahor, and Haran," but the first mention of Abram among the three does not imply his being the eldest, any more than the mention of Shem before Ham and Japhet implied Shem to be the eldest of Noah's sons, for Japhet is expressly called the eldest, Gen. x. 21. Thus, although Terah was 70 years old at the birth of his eldest son (probably Haran, as his daughter was old enough to marry Nahor, Gen. xi. 29), yet he was 130 years old at the birth of Abraham.

4. The 430 years' sojourning, Ex. xii. 40, of Abraham and his posterity commenced with Abraham's going forth to Canaan, Gen. xii. 1-5, 2048 B. C., when God made a covenant with him, Gal. iii. 17, and ended with the Exodus, after which the law was given at Sinai, Ex. xix. 1. Dr. Hales renders Ex. xii. 40, according to the Masorite, Samaritan, and Septuagint versions, "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel and of their fathers while they sojourned in the land of Egypt and in the land of Canaan was 430 years.

5. In Acts xiii. 20 we read, "He gave unto them judges about the space of 450 years until Samuel the prophet," including, of course, Samuel's judgeship: and this approximately corresponds with the periods mentioned in the Book of Judges, and is held to be the correct account by Clinton, Hales, Cunninghame, Bliss, Bowen, Shimeall, etc. It is noticeable that there is thus exactly 480 years from the Exodus to the 4th year of Solomon, when the temple began to be built, and any definition of this period as being 480 years must be a mistake for 580 years.

Thus the component parts of the 450 years given in the Book of Judges are as follows: From the dividing of the land to the death of Joshua, Josh. xxiii. 1; xxiv. 29, 30 years, this period as well as the next 11 years, is not explicitly stated in Judges, but is given by Dr. Hales, Elliott, Bliss, etc., on the authority of Josephus, and other historians; from Joshua's death to the death of the surviving Egypt-born elders, Josh. xxiv. 31; Jud. ii. 10, 11, 11 years; servitude under Chushan, Jud. iii. 7, 8, 9, 8 years; rest under Othniel, Jud. iii. 9, 11, 40 years; servitude under Eglon, Jud. iii. 13, 14, 18 years; rest under Ehud and Shamgar, Jud. iii. 15, 30, 31; iv. 1, 80 years; servitude under Jabin, Jud. iv. 2, 3-23; v. 31, 20 years; the subsequent rest, Jud. v. 31, 40 years; servitude under Midian, Jud. vi. 1, 7 years; rest under Gideon, Jud. vi. 11; viii. 28, viii. 33, 40 years; Abimelech, as judge, Jud. ix. 6, 22, 23, 54, 3 years; Tola, Jud. x. 1, 2, 23 years; Jair, Jud. x. 3, 5, 22 years; servitude under Ammon, Jud. x. 6, 8, 18 years; Jephthah, as judge, Jud. xi. 32; xii. 7, 6 years; Ibzan, Jud. xii. 8, 9, 7 years; Elon, Jud. xii. 11, 10 years; Abdon, Jud. xii. 13, 14, 8 years; servitude under the Philistines, Jud. xiii. 1, 40 years; it is supposed that this 40 years is the same as Eli's 40 years, 1 Sam. iv. 18, and that during part of this time Samson judged southwest Israel for 20 years contemporarily with Eli, Jud. xiii. to xvi. 31; Samuel's judgeship after Eli's death until Saul's election, 1 Sam. vii. 2 gives 20 years, and about ten years more seem to have elapsed, 1 Sam. vii. to ix., 30 years. These brief periods altogether amount to 450 years, which is expressly mentioned in Acts xiii. 20, while in Judges the first 30 and the last 10 years are not definitely stated, and have to be estimated approximately.

6. This period of 376 years consists of the reigns of the kings from Rehoboam to Jehoiakim's 4th year, which are given in Kings and Chronicles as follows: Rehoboam, 17 years and a few months, 1 Kings xiv. 31; xv. 1; 2 Chron. xii. 13—Abijam, 3 years, 1 Kings xv. 1, 2—Asa, 41 years, 1 Kings xv. 9, 10—Jehoshaphat, 25 years, 1 Kings xxii. 42—Jehoram, 8 years, 2 Kings viii. 17—Ahaziah, 1 year, 2 Kings viii. 24, 26—Athaliah, 6 years, 2 Kings xi. 1, 2, 3, 20, 21—Jehoash, 40 years, 2 Kings xii. 1—Amaziah, 29 years, 2 Kings xii. 21; xiv. 1, 2—Azariah (called Uzziah), 52 years, 2 Kings xv. 1, 2; 2 Chron. xxvi. 1, 3—Jotham, 16 years, 2 Kings xv. 32, 33—Ahaz, 16 years, 2 Kings xvi. 1, 2—Hezekiah, 29 years, 2 Kings xvi. 20; xviii. 1, 2—Manasseh, 55 years, 2 Kings xx. 21; xxi 1—Amon, 2 years, 2 Kings xxi. 18, 19—Josiah, 31 years, 2 Kings xi. 20; xxii. 1—Jehoahaz, 3 months, 2 Kings xxiii. 31—Jehoiakim, 4 years and a few months, 2 Kings xxiii. 36. These reigns altogether amount to 376 years.

9. The 70 years' captivity is here commenced in Jehoiakim's fourth year, Dan. i. 1-11, Jer. xxv. 1; xlvi. 2, when the King of Babylon defeated the King of Egypt, and Jehoiakim became subject to Babylon instead of Egypt, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6. This is the date at which these 70 years are also commenced by Bliss, Birks, Browne, Chapin, Clinton, Cunninghame, Habershon, Hales, Jarvis, Usher, and the Duke of Manchester. Zedekiah, who afterward reigned 11 years, was the mere deputy and vassal of Nebuchadnezzar, being left to rule over the few Jews that remained at Jerusalem. It is universally allowed that Cyrus' first year was the end of the 70 years, as intimated in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21, 23, and Ezra i.

10. This 70 years is the only link in the chronological chain of 4110 years from Adam to Christ that is not precisely defined in Scripture. The deficiency is, however, supplied by historical authorities, such as Herodotus, Xenophon, Josephus, Petavius, Prideaux, etc., and by Ptolemy's Canon, which is confirmed by the most careful astronomical observations, and by more than twenty eclipses. From these sources it appears that Cyrus, Ez. i. 1, after the death of Darius the Mede, reigned as sole monarch for 7 years. Then Cambyses or Ahasuerus, Ez. iv. 6, reigned 7 years and 5 months; and Smerdis or Artaxerxes, Ez. iv. 7, reigned 7 months.

Then Darius Hystaspes, Ez. vi. 1, reigned 36 years 6 months; and Xerxes continued on the throne for 21 years; being succeeded by Artaxerxes Longimanus, Ez. vii. 7, from whose seventh year to 457 B. C., the 70 weeks, Dan. ix. 24, or 490 years, are dated by the general concurrence of commentators. All standard chronologers agree as to Cyrus' first year, the end of the 70 years' captivity, being about 535-6 B. C., and the commencement of the 70 weeks or 490 years being about 456 B. C., leaving about 79 years from Cyrus' first year of Artaxerxes' seventh year.

11. The 70 weeks, Dan. ix. 24, have been generally understood since the earliest ages of the Christian church to signify 490 years, a day being sometimes put for a year—Gen. xxix. 27; Numb. xiv. 34; Ezek. iv. 6, and to have commenced their fulfilment about 457 B. C., Ez. vii. 9, when Ezra went up in the midst of Artaxerxes' seventh year "to restore and build Jerusalem." As respects its subdivisions of 7 weeks, 62 weeks, and 1 week, the 7 and 62 weeks were to reach "unto Messiah the Prince," Dan. ix. 25, when Christ was first offered to Israel by the Baptist's preaching and by the commencement of his public ministry about A. D. 26, and afterward "Messiah was cut off, but not for himself," at the period A. D. 27-33, and in A. D. 70 Jerusalem was destroyed (verse 26). Then the last week will follow at the close of the Gentile dispensation with "the Prince that shall come," the Antichrist, Napoleon, making a 7 years covenant with the Jews, and breaking it in the midst of the 7 years, and being himself destroyed at their termination. Thus the year-day fulfillment of the prophetic period of Daniel's 69 weeks of years, or 483 years from Kleg Artaxerxes' seventh year, until the public presentation of Christ to Israel as their Messiah in A. D. 26-7, furnishes the last link in the chronological chain—viz., 490 years from Artaxerxes' seventh year to the birth of Christ.

"Be Ready."

Now bear the word of exhortation, and be assured, that whatever delusions the world may supply, and however deceitful your hearts may be, in arguing upon the distance and the uncertainty of the event of Christ's coming—be assured that to us, individually, the day must be fast approaching: the time is short—the world is fading from you at every step—death is on every side—and there is but one ground, one hope of safety—be ready. Jesus is the way.—Rev. H. McNeile.

The flame of sorrow burns up some hearts, while others it purifies.

Always act as if you believe God is present, and that you must give an account to him.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, OCT. 27, 1880.

Do not fail to read the article on the fourth page communicated for our paper by the author.

THERE has been quite a falling off in our receipts for a few weeks past. Money is poured out for political purposes, and for electing worldly candidates to office. We have only a short time to act for our coming king. Let us improve our opportunity.

WE give an able article on the Sabbath from Messiah's Herald, written by Dr. Litch, the acting editor for the time being. Absence from home, to fill our appointments, has compelled a further delay of our contemplated articles on this question. It may be a week or two more before we resume this subject. Though disagreeing with Dr Litch in one or two particulars we give his article in full.

WE have letters for publication from Josiah M. Fike and Daniel Fike, of Kansas. These letters are an appeal to the brotherhood for financial aid, as the writers claim to be in very destitute circumstances. Are our brethren in Kansas acquainted with the authors of these letters and aware of their destitution? If they are worthy, which we presume is the case, can they not aid these two families? We have had no means of knowing these brethren. As our paper is nearly full this is all we can say this week.

OWING to an important error in this article, as printed in THE RESTITUTION for Sept. 22, we reprint it in the present issue;

SONSHIP OF CHRIST.

"To the Son he saith, Thy throne O God is for ever and ever."

The Son saith that he thought it not robbery to be equal with God. The word was with God, and the word was God. The same became flesh, his mother a woman, his Father God. I and the Father are one, glorify thou me with the glory which I had with thee before the world was.

I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty the first and the last, whose goings forth are from everlasting, whose name is Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God. Lo! this is our God, we will wait for him.

O. T. HOMAS.

Cases of Heresy.

On the 11th of Oct. Dr. H. W. Thomas preached a sermon in Chicago, in which, among other peculiarities, he took occasion to express his convictions on the subject of eternal torture in hell-fire, in a very decided manner. For this expression of his sentiments, the Methodist Rock River conference, just closed, preferred a charge of heresy against him, and requested him to withdraw from the church. Upon his declining to sever his connection by a voluntary withdrawal, the case was given into the hands of a committee of five persons. On the subject of endless torture we give the following extract from a speech, at conference, in his own defense:

"If I believed such a doctrine of future punishment; if I believed that millions who once lived here were in such torments and must stay there forever—if I believed that, I should never smile again. If I believed it I could wish I had never been born; I could wish the world had never been made, that mankind had never been created. If I believed that, I could wish that the race might perish from the earth: that star after star might fade out till all the heavens were only blackness. If I believed that, I could wish that the universe might sink into nothingness, and that God himself might be annihilated. I don't believe it; and I don't see how any sensible man who believes in God can believe it. To teach future punishment in any such severe and terrible literality and endlessness, is to make infidels and atheists of the people, or to drive sensible men away from the church in disgust. If it is said that God teaches it in the Bible, then so much the worse for God and the Bible."

A Wisconsin conference has also a similar case to dispose of in the person of another minister belonging to the same denomination for a lack of faith in an endless hell, as may be seen from the following:

MILWAUKEE, October 10.—"Rev. Dr. Thomas, of Chicago, is not the only Methodist preacher in hot water. Rev. A. A. Hoskins, of this city, is to be tried for heresy by the conference now in session at Appleton, as soon as the Carhart and Haddock cases are off its hands. Mr. Hoskins was settled here over a Methodist Church some years ago, but his health failing he resigned his charge and took a long rest. When he got better he saw in his neighborhood a large number of bright people who had been educated in the different religious denominations that had no church home, and he conceived the idea of gathering all these strangers together and making a religious home for them, free from all creeds and dogmas. He built a house of worship and called it the "Union Gospel Church," and has been preaching in it ever since. His congregation is made up of railroad men, machinists, mechanics, and well-to-do citizens of the better class. He has been teaching his people that character is of more consequence than creeds, and is charged with ignoring some of the principal tenets of Methodism. Among other wicked things, it is said Mr. Hoskins doubts about there being a supply of brimstone sufficient to run the bad place for ages, and if there is, whether it is a fit kindergarten for the souls of infants "not a span long." The case will attract considerable attention, because it will put upon the conference the arduous duty of defining what heresy consists of and in order its present polity."—Chicago Evening Journal.

SELECTIONS.

Why we do not Hold and Teach the Observance of the Jewish Sabbath.

Bro. R. McKee says, "We are having meetings at Chapel Corner, by the Borden brothers, on time and new light, the Sabbath and the moral law of God. Question. Why have not you, and Revs. J. M. Orrock, Osler, Pearson and others of the old stand-bys of Adventism embraced the doctrine of the Sabbath and the law? Please answer through the Herald."

Answer. I will only answer for myself.

1. Because "the ten commandments" were the "old covenant," made with the Jews when they came out of Egypt. Deut. iv. 13; v. 2-7. "And he declared unto you his covenant, which he commanded you to perform, even ten commandments; and he wrote them upon two tables of stone." "The Lord our God made a covenant with us in Horeb. The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day. The Lord talked with you face to face in the mount, out of the midst of the fire, (I stood between the Lord and you at that time, to show you the word of the Lord; for ye were afraid by reason of the fire, and went not up into the mount,) saying, I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. Thou shalt have none other gods before me," etc.

2. These ten commandments being the covenant which God made with the Israelites and with nobody else, they were never binding on Christians. All that Christ made obligatory on his followers under the "new covenant," of which he is the "mediator," he quoted and reinforced in the gospel. And that is the substance of all the commandments, except the fourth; and that he never enjoined on them.

3. There is no record in the New Testament that the Apostles or early Church ever held religious service on the Jewish Sabbath, except as they for convenience went into Jewish meetings as Sabbatarians go into the congregations of Sunday keepers in our own day.

4. The Jerusalem Council decided the question, as they declared "it seemed good to them and the Holy Ghost to lay on believing Gentiles, as follows: Acts xv. 23, 24, "And they wrote letters by them after this manner; The Apostles, and elders, and brethren, send greeting unto the brethren which are of the Gentiles in Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia; forasmuch as we have heard, that certain which went out from us have troubled you with words, subverting your souls, saying, ye must be circumcised, and keep the law; to whom we gave no such commandment." In all their deliberations they said not one word about keeping the Sabbath.

5. Paul wrote to the Romans thus: "Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law by the body of Christ; that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that we should bring forth fruit unto God. . . . But now we are delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we are held, that we should serve in newness of spirit and not in the oldness of the letter." Rom. vii. 4, 6.

But it is claimed that Paul referred to the ceremonial law, not to the moral, i. e., ten commandments. Let us see how this is. 2 Cor. iii. 7. "But if the ministration of death, written and engraven on tables of stone [the ten commandments] was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses, for the glory of his countenance: which [not the glory, but that which was engraven on stone] was to be done away, how shall not the ministration of the Spirit be rather glorious?" Then the ten commandments, as they only were engraven on stone, were to be done away, and clearly Paul embraced them in the word "law."

6. When Christ commissioned his ministers to go and teach all nations, he gave them the subject matter of their teaching: "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." Matt. xxviii. 20. Not one word did he instruct them to teach us an observance, as taught by Moses. Christ had incorporated into his teachings all of the Mosaic teachings which it was necessary for his followers to observe. His commandments were perfect in themselves. "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." I would not therefore dishonor my "One Master," "even Christ," by going back to Mosaic observance, which he never once enjoined, for perfection in righteousness; but like the apostles and Christians of all ages, keep the memorial day of the new Eden, in honor of his name, resurrection and Kingdom.

7. The seventh of the ten commandments never being enjoined on anybody but the Jewish people, nor even on their fathers, see Deut. v. 2-6; and there being no evidence that he has enjoined them on Christ's followers, we are under no manner of obligation as Christian believers or ministers, to either hold, practice or teach the observance of the Jewish Sabbath.

If it be replied that the Seventh Day "is the Sabbath of the Lord their God," I respond, true, but he never enjoined its observance on any except the nation to whom he spoke at Horeb; nor have Sabbatarians ever shown that he did.

8. If Christian believers are "married to Christ," they are adulterers if the law is not dead, and they are also held by that.

The whole question centers here. The law in any of its parts as given to Israel by Moses was never by any divine authority imposed on Christian believers. I hold myself responsible to God and man for this declaration; and am prepared to vindicate it.

To the brethren at St. Armands and elsewhere, I say, stand by Christ and only the observances which he commanded, as taught us by himself and his apostles, who taught, "Let no man judge you in meat, or in respect of a holy day, (this embraces all Jewish festivals and feasts) or of the Sabbaths, which are a shadow of the things to come; but the body is of Christ." Col. ii. 16, 17.

These are a few of my reasons for not holding, observing, or teaching the observance of the Jewish or Seventh Day Sabbath. No one of the evangelists or apostles ever called the Christian's day of worship by any other name than Sabbath. Therefore I hold that all who keep the day called the First Day of the week, keep what the New Testament, as written by the apostles and evangelists, calls the Sabbath, nip the true keepers. While those who take pains to work on that day either to annoy their neighbors or show their disregard for the day, are Christian Sabbath breakers.

And if I may presume to say a few words in reference to my associates named and embraced in the phrase "and others," I think from my knowledge of their views, their reasons are substantially as I have written above.

They are and have been very suspicious of any, even seeming departure from the teachings and practices of the apostles and the apostolic church; and they are especially so in view of the repeated warnings of the last day departures from the faith. What the New Testament and early church never enjoined, practiced or taught, cannot be very important Christian doctrine or practice. While on the other hand what they did practice and the whole church of Christ downward has continued to practice, and a practice which was never challenged or controverted by the early church, cannot be regarded as a damnable sin to observe the day unto the Lord, as these calling themselves Seventh-Day Adventists teach it is. For they maintain that Sunday keeping is the mark or worship of the beast. And it is written, that "whosoever shall worship the beast or his image, or receive his mark in his right hand or in his forehead, etc., the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation, and shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels and the presence of the Lamb; and they have no rest day nor night who worship the beast or his image and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name." Rev. xiv. 9-11.

Such is the fearful doom of all who keep the first day of the week for a Sabbath, if the teachings of seventh-day Adventists are true. And yet numbers of intelligent men and women are taken with and swallow it down! "O," we are told, "it is those who live where the light shines who are responsible." Not one word is said in that fearful denunciation of any such condition. And besides, if the converts to such a faith which they are seeking to make, compassing sea and land to make them, have ever kept the first day of the week as a Sabbath, if their teaching is true, they are forever damned and doomed to that fearful penalty which the third angel's message proclaims. Say not that they repent and find pardon. If the basis of seventh-day Adventism is that the day of mercy was shut in 1844, there is no such thing as repentance and forgiveness for a soul of them. Nor does the third angel's message make any provision whatsoever for repentance or forgiveness for any sin.

If it shall be denied that the shut door theory is the basis on which that structure was reared up, there are a plenty of witnesses yet living who will attest it. And if the ten thousand dollars worth of Ellen White's works are fairly examined they will attest the fact. And furthermore, if they have only living under the third angel's message, then the door is shut, and there is no mercy for sinners. It cannot be shown to exist under that message.

If they profess that they have changed their basis and now believe the door of mercy was not shut, then let them cease to maintain that they are giving the the third angel's message, for the two stand or fall together.

If the seventh-day Adventist doctrine is true, then all the gospel ministers who keep Sunday, all these missionaries who are carrying the gospel to the ends of the earth and keep Sunday, are damned souls for whom there is no mercy, because worshippers of the beast.

The writer of this is without excuse, for he has read and heard their argument for many years and is therefore on their hypothesis without excuse for Sunday keeping; and of course if they are correct is a worshipper of the beast with his eyes open, and of course comes under the malediction of the third angel's message and has incurred that fearful doom.

But the most brazen-faced audacity in the whole matter is, that they should go through the land teaching and insisting on the extinction of the wicked, and making it, next to keeping Saturday for Sabbath, their hobby, and profess in the face of the third angel's message, as quoted above, to be giving a message which denounces eternal torment on all the worshippers of the beast; and yet find men to credit them.

I warn Christians everywhere to beware of any class of persons who remove the old landmarks which the apostolic church left to mark our boundaries.—J. Litch, in Messiah's Herald.

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS.

Three Hundred and Eighty-Eight Years Since He Discovered America.

It was just 388 years last Wednesday since Christopher Columbus discovered the New or Western World. He is commonly mentioned as the discoverer of America, meaning this continent, and many intelligent persons are under the impression that he was such. But the well-known fact is very different. The first land that greeted his sight October 12, 1492, was one of the Bahamas, now known as Watling Island. It was long thought that he landed on Cat Island; but the latest investigations show this to have been a mistake. Columbus gave to the first land he had found in the Western Hemisphere the name of San Salvador, which has since been officially so called. After discovering several other of the West Indies, including Cuba and Hayti, (San Domingo)—he christened the latter Hispaniola—he returned to Spain, supposing these islands were on the coast of India, and consequently naming the natives Indians. His second voyage made him acquainted with the Carribean islands, also Jamaica and Porto Rico, and he then sailed back, after founding a colony at Hispaniola, which he had imagined to be the Ophir of Solomon. His third voyage brought him to the mouth of the Orinoco, which he thought to be the great river Gihon, having its rise in the Garden of Eden: to the coast of Para, to Trinidad, Margarita, and Cubagua. On his fourth voyage he merely explored the coasts of Honduras and Costa Rica, having been turned from his original purpose to seek a passage uniting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans by the mutiny of his crew, bent on finding gold, and was obliged by various disasters to return to Spain. He died in poverty and neglect, and in entire ignorance of the grandeur of his explorations. He had no idea that he had discovered a new world; the belief that the places he had visited were part of India he retained to the last. The discovery of the coast line of this continent is generally ascribed to John Cabot, long a resident of Bristol, and virtually an adopted Englishman, though presumably a Venetian by birth. His son Sebastian has often been credited with the discovery, but on insufficient grounds. It is remarkable that neither John Cabot's age nor the place or time of his birth or death should be positively known. A noteworthy fact is that the man who discovered the Western World, the man who discovered North America, and the man whose name was given to this continent—Amerigo Vespucci—should all have been natives of Italy. Vespucci has been much misunderstood and maligned. He has been unjustly regarded as an unprincipled adventurer. But he had many attainments; was an honest, conscientious navigator, and had nothing to do with the name of America, which probably came from Germany, Martin Waldseemuller, of Freeburg, having called the continent Americi Terra as early as 1507. Vespucci was a close friend of Columbus in the latter years of Columbus' life, and evidently had no intent to rob his friend of any honors that belonged to him.

Dealing With the Sultan.

In the course of a recent audience with the Sultan, Mr. Goschen, the British Minister, "with genuine English straightforwardness," uttered the following words of warning: "The foundations of your empire are much shattered; the slightest push may bring down the whole building." Sire, I entreat you to reflect upon the truth. Shortly afterwards Mr. Goschen called upon M. Tissot, the French Minister, and entreated him at his next audience to back up his warning with similar faithfulness. Great, however, was his astonishment when the Sultan, excited and indignant, turned upon him and said, "Never before has the ambassador of any power dared to address such language to me." M. Tissot hurried to Mr. Goschen and informed him what the Sultan had said, saying that he had literally repeated the very words which Mr. Goschen had used. Hereupon, after a short pause, Mr. Goschen sent for his dragoman and then said to the man, "Did you faithfully translate the words which I used?" The dragoman began to stammer out an apology. He had not the courage, he said, to render the expressions exactly, "for no man could ever dare to say such words to the great lord's very self." Hence, by an accident, the praise belongs to a Frenchman of being the first man to use a plainer manner of speech to the Sultan than any ambassador of a foreign nation had before ventured upon.

NEWS ITEMS.

TEHERAN, Oct. 12.—The Kurds have fallen back as far as Soojbulkh, sending their booty over the frontier into Kurdistan. They are reported to have totally or partially destroyed 150 villages. The tribes of Azerbaijan are preparing to march against them.

LONDON, Oct. 12.—The Porte has handed to the Ambassadors of the Powers at Constantinople a note announcing the surrender of Dulcigno to Montenegro. The note expresses the hope that the pressure of the Powers will be relinquished as regards the settlement of other pending questions.

LONDON, Oct. 13.—A dispatch from Bodsic to the Times, dated Oct. 11th, says: "According to the news received by the fleet from Cettinje, up to noon yesterday, not the slightest sign was shown of ceding Dulcigno. It is generally believed here that the Sultan will not perform his promises, and that he only made them to gain time."

THE WAR IN CENTRAL ASIA.

A dispatch from St. Petersburg says all the fortified ports on the Turcoman Steppes are provisioned for six months. Bami is fortified and provisioned very completely. All arrangements are nearly concluded for an attack less than a month hence, when 9,000 men and 100 guns will advance.

ST. PETERSBURG, October 21.—The Vedomosti says: "There is news from Turkestan that the Russian troops there are to be reinforced by a regiment of Cossacks and a battery of artillery. The sappers and infantry will also be reinforced.

FAILURE OF THE HARVEST.

ST. PETERSBURG, October 23.—The Golos devotes a long article to the failure of the crops. It says: "The outlook for Russia is very gloomy, as the country, whose ordinary export is 40,000,000 quarters, will have to buy grain from abroad. How to feed the peasantry the coming winter is a problem occupying the serious attention of the Government, and there is no ground for expecting a good harvest in the future. Thousands of insects defy effort to exterminate and lie hidden under deep snow until spring enables them to renew their work of destruction."

A St. Petersburg despatch to the London Daily News, dated Thursday, denies the report that the Russo-Chinese negotiations are about to be broken off.

The Shah of Persia has telegraphed to the Sultan demanding that a Turkish army corps be sent to the frontier to assist Persia in quelling the Kurdish outbreak.

BREVITIES.

The sarcophagus of Roger of Tuscany, Bishop of Lausanne, who was buried in Lausanne Cathedral in 1220, was opened a few weeks ago. The body was almost intact, the features were perfectly recognizable, and the six and a half centuries had not sufficed to destroy the texture of his Episcopal robes.

A telegram from Port Elliot, published in the South Australian papers, states that, on the 20th of August last, two men were out in the bay, near Hipson's Island, examining a piece of wreckage, when their boat was encircled by the tentacles of a large octopus and pulled over till it was half full of water, and in great danger of being swamped. The occupants escaped with the greatest difficulty.

A correspondent on the revenue cutter, Corwin, during its recent visit to the Arctic seas, writes: "In Kotzebue sound, just under the Arctic circle, a very extraordinary ice formation was visited. It is apparently an immense iceberg capped with earth and grass. The remains, almost the entire skeleton, of a mammoth dug from it, have been saved as a curiosity for the Smithsonian Institution."

The Rochester Astronomical Society announces that the comet discovered by Prof. Swift on Sunday last promises to become very brilliant. It is coming almost straight toward the earth, and so its position in the heavens changes slowly. It is in the constellation Pegasus, which is overhead at about 9 o'clock in the evening. It seems to be throwing off a brilliant tail, which will become visible to the naked eye as it swings into the neighborhood of the sun. If this comet fulfills its present promise it will be a magnificent object in the coming winter evenings. Some of the astronomers, it seems, suspect that this may be the great comet that blazed with extraordinary splendor in the western sky just before the war of 1812. If so, and if it retains its former brilliancy, there is a great treat in store for us. But there have been so many comets discovered this year which have disappointed those who predicted great things for them, that it will be well not to expect much of the newcomer until it has given unmistakable evidences of its mettle.

Hurricanes in the South Seas have wrought great devastation in the islands of Mare and Lifu (Loyalty Islands), where two of the London Missionary Society's mission stations are located. The Rev. J. Jones, writing from Mare, says: "In this district there are scarcely any houses left standing; the sea rose to a fearful height, sweeping stone houses and stone walls completely away. My house was made a place of refuge by the poor homeless people. They brought their children in crowds to escape the wind, rain, and sea; some of the people were carried in quite exhausted. No fire could be kept alight, the houses being all washed away; consequently no food could be cooked, except in my kitchen." The Rev. S. Creagh writes from Lifu: "Terrible destruction has been done; very few of our chapels remain intact. Our beautiful chapel at Nepenhe is a mass of ruins; the gable wall, built of solid masonry by French practical workmen, was blown flat down. Cocoanut trees have fallen by thousands; the yam, cocoanut, and banana crops, which bade so fair, are all ruined."

Resting.

Jesus, therefore, being wearied with his journey, sat thus on the well.—John iv. 6.

Jesus wearied in His journey,
In this world of toil and strife;
Yet while resting was not idle,
Preaching still the words of life:
So His children oft grow weary,
In the selfsame march of life,
We may in the conflict nearest,
In the never-ceasing strife.

Some are resting, yet still toiling,
Suffering on a bed of pain;
Resting from the active labors,
Working still for Christ the same;
Some are toiling, toiling, toiling,
Ever busy, ever glad,
Resting through immortality,
In a work of love and deed.

Every hour is work sufficient,
Work for Jesus and for souls;
Life can speak a word for Jesus,
Heart can sympathize with hearts,
And into the open wounds
Our bruised bosoms can distil.

God may be visible His children in,
Do to the purpose, wise and good.
When we reach those blissful mansions,
All will then be well indeed.
May we then be ever ready,
Doing, suffering, as He will,
For His love is everlasting,
And He guides His children still.

Occupy Till I Come.

The Master—the one like unto Moses, the one whom we must hear in all things or be destroyed from among the people. In teaching the people lessons of divine knowledge relative to his great theme, the kingdom of God, which was the burden of his message, illustrates his doctrines by parables familiar to his audience. He said, "Therefore, a certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return. And he called his ten servants, and delivered them ten pounds and said unto them, Occupy till I come." The reason why this parable was given at this time, was because he was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear. Now to correct this mistake of theirs touching the time for Jesus to ascend the throne of David on Mt. Zion, in Jerusalem, and rule in his kingdom, this parable was given, showing conclusively that the kingdom was yet future and that he himself as represented by the nobleman must first go off into a far country (to his father in heaven) to receive for himself a kingdom and to return. The kingdom is so inseparably joined with the return of our Lord, that should there be no return, then no kingdom. Paul in giving a young gospel preacher a most solemn charge says, "I charge thee, therefore, before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom." 2 Tim. iv. 1, also Matt. xxv. 31, and onward. Jesus was near Jerusalem, and they thought that the kingdom was due. Their faith took hold on a real literal kingdom, such as they were acquainted with, and had once among them, hence they express their simple honest faith, thus, "Wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" But we trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel." And they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear. Acts i. 6, Luke xxiv. 21, xix. 11. Now as this is a turning point between God's kingdom and the many imaginary kingdoms of men, we ask was the faith of the disciples right, and well founded? We unhesitatingly answer yes. First because the prophets had taught the doctrine in plainest terms, and secondly because they had taken many lessons from the Master, before and after his crucifixion, the subject of the kingdom being a specialty in his teaching. And thirdly, because their Master and teacher never saw fit to correct them only in the time for the establishment. And as the servants of the nobleman were commanded to occupy till his return, just so are the servants of Christ, their nobleman commanded, to occupy till he returns from heaven. Then comes the kingdom, the reckoning and thereward. Well may they humbly and confidently pray—Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as in heaven." This was the primitive faith, the faith of the gospel, the one faith, which faith we are exhorted by a servant of Jesus Christ, to earnestly contend for. While Paul in his first letter to the brethren at Thessalonica at the close of every chapter refers to the coming of the Lord as the crowning event: not only so but this was their faith, which faith to God word was spread abroad, and how ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven, who calls the attention of his people to this subject, saying, "Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give to every man as his work shall be." Not only are his people to wait, but they are to occupy, that is they must employ and improve their time and talents in his cause. He says, "Take my yoke upon you and learn of me. Also I must work the works of him that sent me while it is day, the night cometh, when no man can work." Watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation. "Go work in my vineyard, and whatsoever is right ye shall receive." The whole of the Lord will have to read and meditate upon his word and work with those who love this world more and place no higher a hope in the world to come. Like those who talent, and covet to be with frivolous excuses—wish they had no time to read my Bible and meditate on the truth, and have no time to listen when to one can talk about it. "Thou art a hard man!" Let me plainly say to such, the secret is they do not love the Lord, and hence have no interest in the cause, the time this world has blinded your minds, and action convinces you, you have both time and talent for the cares of this life. Such are fatally deceiving themselves, and the Lord will say to such, Thou wicked and slothful servant. And cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness. God is not unjust, no the fault is with yourself, you close your eyes and hearts to the boundless love of God. To such we say, "Be not deceived," read carefully the 25 of Matt., and take warning.

"The Vail" Not "His Flesh."

Having therefore, brethren, boldness (liberty) to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, which he has consecrated for us, through the vail, that is to say, his flesh. Heb. x. 19, 20.

The text expresses a fact of supreme importance, namely, that a "new and living way"—"the blood of Jesus"—has been provided for us. This blood—way is consecrated for us through the vail.

So far the text is clear enough; but the relation of the last clause, "that is to say, his flesh," is not so clear. It has quite generally,—and quite as thoughtlessly—been referred to vail, making "his flesh," and "the vail," mean the same thing.

There is no type or analogy to sustain this view; no grammatical law requires it; the sense of the subject forbids it.

It is absurd that Jesus' blood should be a way for others through his flesh—absurd also that his flesh should be used as a vail to shut us out from the holiest.

His flesh and blood co-operate to the same end, to bring us through the vail and nigh to God.

Obviously "his flesh" is in opposition with the "new and living way," and means the same thing. The flesh-way and the blood-way are the same way through the vail into the holiest.

The flesh-vail theory is the mystic's Paradise, in which the human nature of Christ, His flesh and bones, are amiable toys made to fill here and there, everywhere and nowhere, and out of existence, as a crazed fancy may bid. The whole school of spiritualists in and out of the church, from Swedenborg, Ann Lee, and A. J. Davis, down to Orlando Squires (Book of the Shepherd, Utica, N. Y., in 1870), Pickands and Jacobs, in Ohio, in 1868, and Dr. Barbour, Herald of the Kingdom, August, 1880, have, on the supposed authority of this text, flourished through the flesh-vail into the holiest, but into the wildest follies of interpretation, and, in some cases, conduct.

Persons so affected need to be reminded—

1. That there never was and never will be any Jesus, the Son of God, but "that holy thing" born of Mary. Luke i. 3, 5.

2. That he must "ever live," after his resurrection, a perpetual priest, to make his blood effectual as an everlasting atonement.

If his human body should ever be dissolved, dissipated or glorified away, our Great High Priest would be dead, and the atonement and whole gospel scheme broken down.

The object of salvation is not to get rid of human nature, but to cleanse, elevate, sanctify and glorify it.

O. R. L. C.

Let Your Words be Few, and Well Chosen.

In writing for THE RESTITUTION in its present limited form, it would be well to change the programme and condense our thoughts and ideas and crowd as many into as few words as can be done and not injure the sense. As it now is we seem to try to see how many words we can use to explain a single thought, and we do not mind using repetition when the sense would be as good, if not better, without it; we should avoid extremes, we may be too succinct, and not give a clear sense of the subject, so that our time and labor is lost.

Another mistake, as we think, is in giving chapter and verse to a score of passages on the same point when two or three would make it quite as clear, the many references are but seldom if ever searched out and read.

If these and a few other things were attended to, the editor would not have to request the brethren to write short articles so often; and those that write according to the wish of the editor, would not have to wait for months to have them published. If we cannot condense, and curtail our articles to come up to the capacity of the paper, then certainly we ought to have a larger paper. But this will be objected to from the start. The brethren are poor, can't get bread, their families in rags, and yet there are now a good hundreds of these same brethren who spend money enough for tobacco every year to circulate and school their children and pay for the paper,—yes, the secret is they do not love the truth

"And Ye Shall Know."

There are tears in our way,
Though places do we reach;
Lord, be with us night and day;
From Thy holy book, oh teach!
Balm in Gilead let us find,
Thy own tender words of love;
Underneath us put Thy hand;
Father, hear us from above.

"As thy day thy strength shall be;"
"I will guide thee with mine eye;"
Lo, look up! if that would see
One who always standeth by.
Closed eyes, though all upturned,
Could behold no vision bright;
Though so very close to us,
Thou must look, to have the sight.

Hear the message, children dear,
E'en from God, whose name is just;
"Cast on me your every care;"
Leave it all, yet all in trust.
When the "Lord of Promise" reached,
Land of rest and no more tears,
"Thou shalt know" why here been set
Copies to be wrought in tears.

Christians Despoiled Through Philosophy and Vain Deceit.

The apostles of the Lord had barely finished the work of planting the truth throughout the world, when they were constrained to lift up a voice of warning to the youthful churches to beware of the leaven of false teaching which was already abroad in their midst, and was destined to work sad leaven with the simplicity and purity of the faith. "There were false prophets among the people," says Peter, "even as there shall be false teachers among you .... and many shall follow their pernicious ways; by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of." No department of the truth would escape the corrupting touch of this false leaven. They would "even deny the Lord that bought them;" while "the promise of his coming" would become to them as "a cunningly devised fable." John also warns against the anti-christian teaching which was already at work,—the Gnostic "deceivers," who, while professing to be Christian disciples, denied "Jesus Christ coming in the flesh." Not less earnestly, and even more frequently, does Paul predict the same sad decline. With what solemn fervor does he beseech Timothy to be "urgent in season, and out of season" in his exhortation and teaching; "for the time will come," says he, "when they will not endure sound doctrine; but, having itching ears, after their own lusts they shall heap to themselves teachers; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall turn aside unto fables!" With what sad surprise does he find the Galatian disciples already turned to "another gospel" than that which he had preached. With what tender solicitude does he seek that the Colossians should be instructed only in the knowledge of him in whom "dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." "Beware," says he, "lest any man spoil you [i. e., despoil you, make a spoil of you, carry you captive] through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ."

The frequent and solemn warnings and predictions, of which these are but a sample, terrible as they were in their descriptions of the extent of the corruption which would ensue from the germs of error already planted by the enemy of Truth, were proved ere long to be divinely accurate. The slenderest acquaintance with Church History suffices to justify their terms. The very basis and vindication of our modern Protestantism consist in an acknowledgment of the fact that for centuries, which have come to be known as the Dark Ages, under the professed name of Christianity, the civilized world was held in the galling bondage of error, superstition, and cruelty, while "the meek and modest Truth" was forced to seek a refuge from bitter persecution "in nooks obscure, far from the ways of men."

It is admitted, then, that the simplicity of the gospel of Christ was buried out of sight under the accumulated corruptions of the Greek and Roman Churches. Have our Protestant reformations succeeded in restoring it to the light of day, and to its proper place in the minds of professing Christians? We doubt it much.

While thankful for what has been achieved, and rejoicing in the degree of liberty to which we have attained, —it is our deliberate conviction that much remains to do. We believe, indeed, that one gross parent error, which serves as a foundation for nearly all the abominations of the Papal teaching, requires still to be banished, with all its progeny, from the creeds of Protestantism, where it holds a place of almost equal honor as the accredited basis of all true religion.

This error is the belief in the immortality of the soul, and the inalienable destiny of every man to live for ever in some condition or other.

This doctrine we who occupy this platform solemnly declare to be no part of the doctrine of Christ, but on the contrary to be opposed thereto, and to be derived directly from that very "philosophy" against whose encroachments St. Paul raised a voice of warning. We further maintain that owing to the allegiance which professing Christians have sworn to this usurping theory, they have been despoiled and robbed of a great part of their precious inheritance of Truth, and brought under the yoke of many and pernicious errors.

The proofs of this grave indictment cannot be adequately presented in a brief paper such as this. It will be admitted, however, that if, as we have asserted, this idea of the "immortality of the soul" can claim no higher authority than human philosophy, its introduction into the Christian system of doctrine could not fail to have some such baneful effect as we have sketched. Let us then see what Church History has to say about the contact of apostolic doctrine with the systems of Greek philosophy. I say, Greek, because, although troubles arose from other sources, the term "philosophy" in Paul's letter points distinctly to this quarter. "The Greeks," he says, "seek after wisdom (sophia)." Their eminent men were by profession lovers of wisdom, or philosophers, divided into various contending schools of thought.

I might quote from the writings of scholars now present, but I shall rather call in as a witness one who cannot be suspected of any bias in our favor,—one who seems to have himself believed in the immortality of the soul,—I refer to the learned Church historian, Dr. Mosheim, merely premising that his testimony is borne out by that of others. His History of the Church during the first few centuries is full of references to the disastrous inroads of worldly philosophy into the doctrine of Christ. But so far as the Greek philosophy is concerned, the corrupting influence seems to have come almost entirely from one school, viz., that of Plato. Writing of the second century, Dr. Mosheim says: "Towards the close of this century, a new sect of philosophers arose of a sudden, spread with amazing rapidity throughout the greatest part of the Roman Empire, swallowed up almost all the other sects, and was extremely detrimental to the cause of Christianity. Alexandria in Egypt .... gave birth to this new philosophy. Its votaries chose to be called Platonics," because, "though attached to no particular sect, yet they preferred the sublime Plato to all other sages, and approved of the most of his opinions concerning the Deity, the universe, and the human soul." They were known also as Eclectics. "This new species of Platonism was embraced by such of the Alexandrian Christians as were desirous to retain, with the profession of the gospel, the title, dignity, and habit of philosophers. It is also said to have had the particular approbation of Athenagoras, Pantænus, Clemens the Alexandrian, and all those who, in this century, were charged with the care of the public school which the Christians had at Alexandria.... The Christian Eclectics had this also in common with the others, that they preferred Plato to the other philosophers, and looked upon his opinions concerning God, the human soul, and things invisible, as conformable to the spirit and genius of the Christian doctrine."

It is important to observe how distinctly the Platonic doctrine concerning the human soul was thus adopted by Christian teachers. According to Dr. Mosheim, all the other schools of Greek philosophy—Epicurean, Academic, Aristotelian, Stoic—either flatly denied or openly doubted the immortality of the soul. The followers of Socrates and Plato alone made it the basis of their teaching. And it was in this second century, then, that this dogma, as taught by Plato, was for the first time incorporated with Christianity. And with the natural result, "The venerable simplicity of the Christian system," says Dr. Mosheim, "was not of long duration; its beauty was gradually effaced by the laborious efforts of human learning, and the dark subtilities of imaginary science." "Many examples," continues the historian, "might be alleged, which verify the observations we have now been making; and, if the reader is desirous of a striking one, he has only to take a view of the doctrines which began to be taught in this century, concerning the state of the soul after the dissolution of the body."

Time would fail me to quote at length the instructive record of the decline which rapidly followed. Suffice it to say that in the third century the cause of philosophy triumphed over the objections and protests of the better class of Christian advocates—thanks principally to "the influence and authority of Origen, who, having been early instructed in the new kind of Platonism already mentioned, blended it unhappily with the purer and more sublime tenets of a celestial doctrine, and recommended it in the warmest manner to the youth who attended his public lessons;" and that, as early as the fourth century, "those vain fictions, which an attachment to the Platonic philosophy and to popular opinions had engaged the greatest part of the Christian doctors to adopt before the time of Constantine, were now confirmed, enlarged, and embellished, in various ways," leading to prayer to dead saints, worship of relics, and many other Popish dogmas and practices.

Protestants may, with some truth, claim to have escaped the particular forms of evil just referred to, which are still rampant in the Eastern and Western divisions of the Continental Church. But have they shaken themselves free from this heathen philosophy in regard to the more essential doctrine of immortality itself?

It was surely a cunning device of the enemy of Truth to induce the Christian teachers to believe that Plato and Christ could be served together. In one point the doctrine of Plato and that of Christ were coincident. On the same point they both differed from the bulk of the Grecian and Roman world. That point was this—that they both taught men to look forward to a future and immortal life. The chief remaining schools of philosophers, as we have already said, had no such faith; while as for the mass of mankind, Plato himself (than whom we can have no better witness) confesses that they "would not readily assent to his doctrine," apprehending rather that "on the very day in which the man dies, the soul is destroyed and extinguished; that it goes forth and is dissipated, like a breath or a smoke, and ceases to be."—Phædo, 39, 40, 68, 69.

But while both Plato and the Christ held out to despairing men a hope of immortality, there was scarcely one feature further in common between their respective teachings on the subject. Plato taught that death was only apparent,—that there really was for man no death, "what seemed so was transition," that immortality was inherent in the deathless and indivisible soul or thinking part, and that the manner of its enjoyment would be by the soul's escaping forever from the trammels of the material frame in which it had been for a while imprisoned. The Lord Jesus Christ, on the other hand, came proclaiming: "The hour is coming in which all that are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of Man and come forth," and that of those who should be thus bodily resuscitated, some should be appointed to life everlasting, but others to condemnation and a second and irreversible destruction. He uttered not a word—neither did his apostles—of the immortality of the soul; he gave no countenance to human pride; but he came with a message of mercy from the God of heaven to sinners who were in danger of utterly perishing, and offered them freely a share in the everlasting life whose fountain was in the Son of God.

What possible communion could there be between two such opposing doctrines? None. And hence, no sooner was the Platonic theory received into the Church of Christ, than a struggle began between them for the mastery. And in that struggle the natural pride of sinful men was all on the side of Plato, and against the "humbling" doctrine of the Cross.

One natural fruit of Plato's doctrine appeared at once in the rise, in the second century, of the Christian Mystics, who "were ordered," says our historian, "to extenuate by hunger, thirst, and other mortifications, the sluggish body, which confines the activity and restrains the liberty of the immortal spirit; that thus, in this life, they might enjoy communion with the Supreme Being, and ascend, after death, active and unencumbered, to the universal Parent, to live in his presence forever."

Thus the hope of the resurrection became dimmed and displaced, being reduced to secondary importance, and the way was paved for its utter denial. It was long ago pointed out by Tyndall, the great Protestant Reformer and Martyr, in his controversy with the Papist More, that to send the souls of believers to bliss immediately after the event called death, was to make void and useless the coming of Christ and the resurrection, which were the true Scriptural hope. And this argument has never to this day been answered.

Without wishing to charge upon Protestants at large complicity in the vagaries of extreme men, such as the followers of Emanuel Swedenborg, yet it is right to inquire what place the doctrine of Resurrection now holds in popular faith. It is notorious that among the Protestant churches of the continent, in France, Switzerland, and Germany, "the resurrection of the body" is boldly and wisely denied, and it is even considered a debatable question whether our Lord actually rose from the dead, or whether his resurrection was merely what they are pleased to call "a moral fact." And in our own country within recent years the same pernicious error has been propagated by theologians holding high rank, and important positions as educators of youth.

Let us look into this matter a few moments. Paul based the hope of a future and immortal life upon the fact that Christ had risen from the dead and become the first fruits of them that slept. Not so the theologies and creeds of Protestantism. As if they feared this divine foundation were not secure enough to build upon, they start rather from metaphysical theories about the dignity of human nature, and the indestructible quality of the nobler part of man—merely tacking on thereto a doctrine of the resurrection of the body, as authors are wont to relegate to an appendix matters more curious than essential, or which cannot conveniently come into the body of their work. Surely this is one of the strangest things done under the sun,—that men on whom has shined a full revelation of the path of life, should prefer to fall back upon "the rudiments of the world" for a guide; that those who have a living Prince of Life in whom to trust should seek their solace rather in those unsatisfying pleas with which the dying Socrates, who knew no better, sought to comfort himself and those about him.

"Is Christ the abler teacher, or the Schools?
If Christ—then why resort at every turn
To Athens, or to Rome, for wisdom short
Of man's occasions, when in Him reside
Grace, knowledge, comfort, an unfathomed store?"

A year or two ago I saw, in an evangelical magazine, a frank confession that in making the way of salvation clear to the sick and dying, teachers of religion were "apt to forget to set brightly before the eyes the resurrection hope." Why, how is this possible? Because a false hope has usurped its place. Can we conceive the Lord Jesus forgetting to set before the eyes in such a case his great promise that he would raise the believer up at the last day? Can we conceive Paul forgetting it—Paul, who protested that all his devotion advantaged him nothing, if the dead rise not; who, in instructing the Thessalonians as to the hopes of the Christian in death, passed by unnoticed the Grecian guess at immortality, said not a word about a spirit-world for the departed, but pointed forward to the resurrection of the dead and change of the living when the Lord himself should descend from heaven?

A false hope, we say, has ousted this Scriptural one from its place. The creeds and theologies did half the mischief, but the hymns, which convey the actual popular hope, have completed its dethronement. Hence we find our friends singing as if they had just quitted the bedside of Socrates, this "jargon of the schools:"

"It is not death to bear
The wrench that sets us free
From dungeon chain, to breathe the air
Of boundless liberty.

"It is not death to fling
Aside this sinful dust,
And rise on strong exulting wing
To live among the just."

Truth is here, but not such as was intended or can profit any one. It certainly cannot be death, whatever it is, to "rise to live among the just." Or again:

"Welcome sweet hour of full discharge (!)
That sets our longing souls at large,
Unbinds our chain, breaks up our cell,
And gives us with our God to dwell."

Or this, which was sung at the funeral of one of our best Scotch Biblical scholars, the late Dr. Eadie:

"Hark, a voice! it cries from heaven,
Happy in the Lord who die.
* * * * *
All their toils and conflicts o'er,
Lo! they dwell with Christ above.
* * * * *
Now they see Him face to face,
Him Who saved them by His grace,
'Tis enough—enough forever!
'Tis His people's bright reward.

What need to multiply instances? Are there not sown broadcast by thousands, for the use of young and old in our land, hymns such as these, in which the resurrection is openly set aside as a thing unnecessary? Such sentiments are rank treason against the Prince of Life, who holds the keys of death and the grave. They would snatch from his brow the diadem that is his, and plant it, where?—on the forehead of Death, that last of enemies, to save us from whom Christ both died and rose again! Oh, what impiety has this "vain deceit" led pious men to utter, let Dr. Young's daring couplet testify:

"Death gives us more than was in Eden lost;
The King of Terrors is the Prince of Peace!"

Dr. Mosheim mentions as one of the early effects of the adoption by Christian teachers of the Alexandrian Platonism, that "a torrent of allegory" came in upon the Church, which nothing could withstand. "The doctors," he says, "who had applied themselves to the study of letters and philosophy, and had imbibed the [illegible] taste, and struck out into the devious wilds of fancy.... Origen was at the head of this speculative tribe. This great man, enchanted by the charms of the Platonic philosophy, set it up as the test of all religion, and imagined that the reasons of each doctrine were to be found in that favorite philosophy, and their nature and extent to be determined by it." Again: "Having entertained a notion that it was extremely difficult, if not impossible, to defend everything contained in the sacred writings from the cavils of heretics and infidels, so long as they were explained literally, according to the real import of the terms, he had recourse to the fecundity of a lively imagination, and maintained that the Holy Scriptures were to be interpreted in the same allegorical manner that the Platonists explained the history of the gods." It must not be forgotten that Origen was not the first in the field, although he carried in a new direction, and to a fresh extreme, principles which were already for some time in vogue. Thus, by "this licentious and deluding art," as the judicious Hooker calls it, Christians came to be in effect robbed of the very Scriptures. Do our Protestant friends claim to have escaped the evil effects of this process? Let facts decide.

Origen's motto was: "The Scriptures are of very little use to those who understand them as they are written."—(Stromata, Book 10.) Is that a doctrine unknown to Protestantism? Was it not just the other day that a learned and eloquent Canon warned us, with an utter misapplication of Paul's words, that "the letter killeth;" while another eminent theologian, north of the Tweed, told us that our attempt to rest our belief in conditional immortality "upon the letter of Scripture, argues a misunderstanding of the idea of Revelation?"—(Principal Tulloch, in The Contemporary Review, April, 1878.)

And are these not a fair sample of the arguments which are brought against us in this controversy? It is no use to call attention to the general teaching of Scripture on the question. Our opponents are proof against any "array of texts," and ready to shelter themselves from the whole phalanx of Scripture terms, behind the so-called spiritual interpretation. What though the Bible never once addresses sinners as immortal beings, or utters a whisper of man's possessing an undying or indestructible spirit? What though it speaks rather of the soul as liable to death, as requiring to be redeemed from the grave, and from first to last addresses sinners as those who have come under condemnation of death? What though it offers, to those who will accept it, that they "shall abide forever," shall "have everlasting life," shall "put on immortality," shall become like the holy angels, who "cannot die any more;" while it threatens those who reject this offer with being consumed, being destroyed soul and body, coming to nought, and perishing in everlasting destruction? These, and many similar and harmonious forms of Scripture teaching are, by those who have set to their seal that Plato is true, made to bend to the dogma that sinners are all as deathless as the angels or as God himself, and that man does not require to be indebted to the Incarnate Son of God for the bestowal of immortality. But neither does their witness agree with itself, for while one division finds that destroyed sinners are destined to be preserved forever in hopeless misery; another, following the lead of Origen, teaches that for a sinner to "perish" is to be saved from his sins and find a dwelling-place among the ransomed and the blessed!

"Thus men go wrong, with most ingenuous skill,
Bend the straight rule to their own crooked will;
And, with a clear and shining lamp supplied,
First put it out, then take it for a guide."

And thus, by this philosophy and vain deceit, the noblest promises and most solemn warnings of the Word of God are reduced to a series of enigmas, hyperboles, or equivocations!

Oh, what despite has been done to the doctrine of Christ by this false teaching. If, on the one hand, the follower of Origen has robbed the preacher of the gospel of the salutary terror of the Lord, or has deprived the Universe of a perfect moral Governor, setting up in his stead a weak embodiment of sentimental benevolence that threatens but does not execute—what shall we say of the contrary doctrine of endless sin and pain, a doctrine so monstrous and incredible that even its pledged supporters in our day are afraid to preach it openly? It robs the Christian of that "righteous Father" whom Christ revealed; it casts a foul slur upon the holy name of God, putting him to an open shame before even the vindictive gods of heathendom. It has alienated from Christianity some of the best intellects of mankind, filling some with a fierce hate, and others with mute despair, and has given, oh, how much occasion for the enemy to blaspheme all that is called religion!

One further point, and we are done. The great promise of our Lord's personal return to the earth to give reward unto his servants, and establish the kingdom of God upon the earth, which cheered the apostles and early Christians,—this, too, has been engulphed and borne away in that torrent of allegory which philosophy let loose upon the Church. Nor has our Protestantism recovered from the loss. What a variety of fanciful fulfilments are we not still asked to accept of "the promise of his coming!" But not one of them could for a moment stand were the true doctrine of immortality restored,—least of all that worst one of them all, which makes the death of the saint the return of his Lord. For who that has learned that his only hope of immortality lies in the return of the Savior from heaven to change his body of humiliation and fashion it like unto his own glorious body—could ever be satisfied with the destruction of Jerusalem, with the endowment of Christianity by Constantine, with the mystical rhapsodies of Swedenborg, or any other stone that may be offered him as a substitute of the bread of Life? Deprived of this, the polestar of the Church's destiny, she is adrift without due guide, and is in danger of making shipwreck among the rocks and quicksands of the perilous latter days.

We plead therefore with our beloved friends to help us to remove this fundamental error that, like a mist engendered in, some unwholesome swamp, has succeeded in "darkening the whole firmament of Truth." Restore the true doctrine of immortality, and you have the most potent weapon ever forged for the defeat of that Rationalism and its twin Agnosticism, which are eating the vitals out of our modern Christianity, and every department of the doctrine of redemption through the slain and risen Son of God will share in the enlightening and gladdening effects of the liberation from the chains of centuries. Be assured it is the Lord's work this. "For every plant," said he, "which my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up." Rooted up this error shall be, whether we choose to share in the honorable work or not. With the river of life flowing freely at our feet, let us no longer betake ourselves to the stagnant pools of human tradition and philosophy. But if we are disposed to turn lightly away from this inquiry, let us beware lest that condemnation be passed on us which was of old uttered against a people highly privileged: "My people have committed two evils—they have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters, and have hewn them out cisterns—broken cisterns that can hold no water."—Paper read by M. W. Strang, at Liverpool Conference, Sept. 1880.

A converted Jew refused a fortune in New Zealand, which was offered him on condition of renouncing Christ. He was a cook at Ashburton Station, where he died on July 12th; the facts were then for the first time published. The New Zealand Recorder says: "Our departed friend was a Jew by birth. When we first learned this we asked him, 'Then are you still looking for the Messiah to come?' when he replied, in a tone of earnestness, and with a look of animation we shall not soon forget, 'I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of the living God, and that he died for me.' His mother, when he became a Christian, offered to place a fortune at his service if he would return to the faith of his fathers; for his relatives were wealthy. He replied, 'Mother, I love you all very dearly, but I cannot do it; I must be faithful to my Savior.' He was a kind father, and leaves two sons to mourn his loss."

The city of Smyrna, which has just escaped a blockade at the hands of the European Powers, still retains, even under Turkish misrule, much of its ancient consequence. Connected by rail with Aidin, Cassaba and other local centers of traffic, it ranks as the most considerable port of Asia Minor. Its situation on a steep slope overhanging the sea is remarkably beautiful, but the height of the surrounding hills, the narrowness of the channel connecting it with the open sea, and the filthiness common to all Turkish cities, make it extremely unhealthy. The trade is chiefly in the hands of the Greeks and Jews. One of the most striking episodes in the history of the latter people connects itself with Smyrna. In 1665 an enterprising Jew named Sabbathai Tzewi proclaimed himself as the Messiah, and headed a rising against the Porte. But although numbers of his countrymen rallied round him, the revolt failed, and was punished with merciless vigor, while Sabbathai only saved his life by publicly professing the creed of Islam.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment on the Kingdom of God on the earth with the Christ as King of kings, and the Immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the resurrection of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the last exaltation of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Coming Age---Its Proximity---Supplementary Remarks on the Signs Continued---Lovers of Pleasure More than Lovers of God---Test of Pleasure-Loving---Church Literature---Science Pertaining to this Age---Science of the Coming Age---Miscellaneous.---No. 10.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Test of Pleasure-Loving.—Her reading is exceedingly varied. She has libraries of science, professional libraries, and libraries of literature, and language. These form two classes; those that are composed of human productions, and those that are transcripts of the Divine mind. The former class concerns this age only; the latter class treats of the coming age, and the life required---to obtain in it a citizenship. The church is the chief manager of both departments.

Human Department.—See her immense issues of human productions---her reading matter for the world, and for her own household; her literature; her dime novels and other works of fiction. See her political reading. In every house, on every table, in reading rooms, in public halls, at hotels, and in all public places where the masses congregate; on cars and steamers, everywhere, can be found reading matter to suit the tastes of worldlings. By whom and for whom are these thousands of tons of light and cheap reading furnished? It is generally printed and circulated by church members, and for their reading and entertainment. Every division in the human department is crowded. All is activity and bustle. Counties with sparse population sustain two political papers. Why such activity in the worldly department? Simply for the reason that it pays. And why does it pay? The patronage is so immense. And why is the patronage so immense? Because the matter suits the tastes of the masses. They pay for what they like; for they are pleasure-seekers and lovers of pleasures. Who are these masses? The majority, perhaps, have their names on church books, and upon the Lord's day, may, sometimes, be found at the holy communion.

Divine Department.—This department is confined to the printing and circulation of what God has revealed to man, and what good and holy men have written in explanation of those divine sayings. The Bible is the revelation of God to man. Many great men have written books on the Holy Book to explain its words and enforce its doctrines.

People have been gathered out of the world as its pillar and support. This Book (the Bible) has been translated into many (200) languages. It was once only two-tongued; it is now many tongued. Speaking to over two hundred tribes in their own native languages. A vast multitude profess to love and follow the teachings of that Book. They have built costly edifices to the honor, and for the purpose of worshipping the author of that Book. So far, all seem quite appropriate and truly sincere. But, on closer examination self, and pleasure-loving are deposited in their bottom and top corners: their massive and costly foundations, and lofty steeples. They speak another language; the language of pride and sectarian rivalry. The strife is not, who shall offer the most unselfish and acceptable sacrifice to God, but who shall offer the most costly and the most attractive. Sectarianism and not divine love prompts the action, as will appear on investigation.

Church Printing Establishments.—All the wealthy, and, consequently, popular denominations, have what they call "Book Concerns," establishments where books are printed, and from which, as an authorized centre, they are issued. Bibles, Commentaries, Histories, Church Literature, Tracts, Sunday School Books, and questions, together with such other information as is of use to the denomination, are published. Periodicals are also issued. All the information that is deemed useful to educate, entertain and prepare the professor for his future home, is prepared and sent forth. All this effort seems praiseworthy; and so it is. Every enterprise, designed to multiply and circulate copies of the Holy Scriptures, is certainly noble. Persons there are in these establishments who are devoted to the cause of truth, and their untiring labor will finally be requited. With their work, we do not, at present, have to do. Our purpose is to follow their publications and learn the character of their reception among the children of the bride-chamber. How are they patronized? Who read the productions? How are these concerns generally sustained? These questions are worthy of attention.

Church efforts for the diffusion of Christian knowledge are called benevolent enterprises, and are sustained, in part, by free will-offerings. The patronage is not generally remunerative. Efforts are required to meet necessary current expenses.

Who is so unwise, so short-sighted as to suppose that he can make it pay well to furnish sober Christian reading for the Christian household? Honor could not be his motive, since, in this age, he [redacted] class of laborers.

Where can be found any religious periodical that pays well? Examine the daily and weekly issues of our large cities, secular steam presses, running day and night, to answer the demand. Who ever heard of our daily papers wanting patronage? A city of 300,000 inhabitants, like Cincinnati, supporting, at least, four daily secular papers, affords us a fair sample of our reading tastes. What city or community ever sent forth a daily Christian publication? Why not? Because the reading public never demanded one. And why have they not demanded one? Simply, yet truly, for want of interest in such reading. It is notorious that scarcely any religious periodical is self-sustaining. The New York Observer has lived through more than half a century, but that paper has been ably and prudently managed; since it has always mingled sufficient reading of this age to make its issues palatable. Very few religious papers can sustain weekly issues. Their subscribers are too few to sustain the weekly expenses. Such papers, rather than suspend, concluding that half a loaf is better than none, make their issues half secular, and half religious. Men, occupied in sending forth publications, soon learn the tastes of the masses, both in and out of the churches, and either conform to the general and popular taste, or abandon the business. The more closely any publication is confined to the Bible relative to future events and the coming age; the more zealous about the return of Christ in his kingdom, the less interest, and, consequently, the less the patronage.

Is there a single paper, devoted to the Second Advent, liberally sustained? We know that there are persons whose affections are absorbed in religious knowledge, but the numbers are so few that they form exceptions to the tastes of the masses of the nineteenth century Christians.

Christians of this age take pleasure in light, fancy reading. They study to be pleased. They want something witty and eloquent. Addicted to novel reading, they hunt after similar entertainment in church exercises. Divine things are dry in their estimation. Though occupying responsible positions in popular churches, they are willing to own that they are more familiar with Shakespeare than with the Bible. They are familiar with the works of fiction, but the science of divine things is too deep. They are more interested in reading the lives of political heroes, than in investigating the visions of Daniel and John.

Can it be said that this is true with some whose names are counted with believers in the near coming of the Son of God? What is the character of your tastes? Are you pleased with what delights the world? Does their company entertain you? Do you seek the society of scoffers? Are you fond of their favorite amusements? Do you read political news, party politics, rather than about divine things?

This is true with popular churches, not simply in their taste for reading human, rather than Divine thoughts, but, in their choice of occupations and amusements. Where are professing Christians not found that worldlings can be met? And what stronger evidence can there be, that such are lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God?

Such is only a glance at the conduct, occupation and tastes of this modern, espoused Bride of the meek and lowly Jesus, the Son of God, with the past history of her children in full view; with the groans of their terrible martyrdoms, extending through sixteen centuries, saluting her ears, their wrestling with wild beasts, their cries at the burning stake, their agonies in the inquisition, while the blood of millions of her children rise from the earth; under the shadows of the signs of her returning Lord, hear her shouts of merriment ascending from a thousand halls of unsanctified Christian debauchery---saying in her heart, my Lord delayeth his coming; and eating and drinking with the drunken.

Is this the Bride, fresh and blooming, that makes herself ready for Jesus the Bridegroom? She that is arrayed in fine linen, clean and white,---in the pure righteousness of the saints? Or, is she that harlot sister, corrupting herself with other lovers?

If it be true that the Bride is making herself ready to meet with triumphant shouts, I.o, this is our Lord; we have waited for thee, her beloved husband to share with his kingdom and his glory, she must be some other than the popular churches of the nineteenth century, who are lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God.

Miscellaneous.—It is not because the masses are found at pleasure resorts, but that they LOVE those amusements. The interest which Christians take in those past times which are so attractive to worldlings, forms the darkest feature of the age. It is now as it was in the days of the Jewish prophets---a wonderful and horrible thing is committed in the land; the prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests bear rule by their means; and my people love (to have it) so. The false, corrupt love was what brought down upon them the wrath of Jehovah.

The corrupt apostate taste of popular Christians is the plague-spot of this age. Professors of religion in these times, have much to say about Christian liberty. And what do they call Christian liberty? To carry out freely and fully their own inclinations. Whatever they feel like believing and doing, their notion of Christian liberty allows them to think and do. If they feel like going to church, they go; if they feel like remaining at home they remain at home. They always consult their pleasure rather than God's Book! because they are "lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God." Why do many professors spend ten-fold more on their filthy habits, such as the use of tobacco, than on the reading that describes the glories of Paradise? because they love tobacco more than the news of the soon-coming Jesus and his kingdom. Why are Christians found at the theatre rather than at the prayer-meeting? Because they love it better; it is more pleasing to their tastes. Why are they in the bar-room, at the gambling table, in the ball-room, at horse races, shooting matches, watering places, shouting at political gatherings; at parties; at all places of worldly pleasures? Simply because they love such things more than the things pertaining to the coming age.

Why will Christians (in name) spend days and nights in devouring the yellow covered reading poison of the day, and yawn over the divine paintings of Daniel and John as lengthy, tedious and dry? Because their hearts are with their treasures. Why will professors of religion pay dollars for the corrupt and vile rantings of an Ingersoll, and not a dime for a profound sermon on the divine origin of the Bible? With but few exceptions, it is because of the pleasure afforded them by the former entertainment over the latter. This is a Spanish, bull-fighting age, tickled with war and blood-shed, with news-sheets, filled with horrible murders, elopements seductions and all items of corruptions; not only doing such acts, at times, but taking pleasure in reading of others that commit such crimes.

Has God a peculiar people on earth? What are they? Who are they? Where are they? We will find it profitable to answer these questions before the Son of God appears. We have no time to prate about old issues. Let us enter our own closets with this part of our Lord's great prayer, "I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from the evil. They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." We thank God, that he has here shown us a peculiar people. Search our hearts and make us sensible of our true position. Are our names enrolled on high among that peculiar and blessed few?

SELECTIONS.

[Investigator]

Jesus the Life.

Holding forth the word of life. Phil. ii. 16.

In reading the New Testament every one must notice how frequently the words "life," "live," "live forever," "eternal life," "everlasting life," occur. So common are they that one can hardly open a page at random without finding them in view. Jesus said himself more than once, "I am the life," and "eternal life" is invariably connected with a cordial reception of him as the Savior, and a full and loving submission to his will. Language which is found so often on the lips of Jesus, and in the pages of his apostolic servants, must be important, we should say unutterably momentous. Without a clear notion of its import, much of the book will remain in comparative obscurity, and a great personal loss be sustained by every reader and disciple of Christianity. Let us try to get at the meaning of these words. As a safe guide let us follow the direction of Hooker, in our interpretations on this and on all occasions. "Hold it," says he, "for a most infallible rule, in exposition of Sacred Scripture, that where a literal construction will stand, the furthest from the letter is commonly the worst. There is nothing more dangerous than this licentious and deluding art, which changes the meaning of words, as Alchymes does or will do, the substance of metals, makes of anything what it lists, and in the end brings all truth to nothing."

What then is the literal meaning of "Life?" The Greek noun rendered life in such expressions as "I am the life," "life everlasting," and all similar forms, is zoe, of which the primary sense is "physical life and existence, as opposed to death and non-existence." All admit it is so employed in texts like the following:---"He giveth to all life (zoe) and breath and all things," Acts xvii. 25, and "If in this life (zoe) only we have hope in Christ," etc., 1 Cor. xv. 19. Every person understands such phrases as these so well---"the man is still alive," "save my life," "he lost his life there," that no explanation can possibly make the import of "life" when so used any clearer. Life has its universally known signs; so has death, its opposite. Now when the blessed One is called the "Life," and the bestower of "everlasting life," it has been long and widely common to understand these terms as signifying not life literally, but a kind of it, that is happiness, and happiness to run on without a close. In other words the literal idea of life is excluded, and the secondary, or figurative one, of blissfulness, preferred. Thus a very great change is effected in the representations of the Bible, for if the Savior wishes to be understood as the life, that is, as the Author of life, in its primary sense of conscious existence, and if he intended us by "eternal life" to receive the meaning of unending conscious being as the real meaning of his language, we certainly lessen the force of his words immensely, when we regard him as only the bestower of unfading joy.

Following that most excellent rule afforded us by the distinguished writer named above, we proceed now to ask if "a literal construction will stand?" That is, in the case before us, must we set aside the literal meaning for the figurative? Must we reject the simple idea of being---immortal being---as the gift of God's Son to his followers? We verily believe the literal will stand, for this reason, that unless we obtain life, and everlasting life from him, in its primary sense, we must ultimately enter on a condition of perpetual non-existence. Had men been naturally immortal, then, having in themselves life, or being heirs of ceaseless existence, they could in no way require a Savior to come and confer on them what they already owned. But in Scripture where are we pronounced immortal? It uses language of an entirely opposite character, as when it declares "all flesh is grass, and the glory of man as the flower of grass," and, to add no more, when it exhorts us to "seek for immortality." Rom. ii. 7.

Were we possessed of inherent deathlessness, a life that would go on unwinding and unwinding for ever and ever, we might need to seek for immortal or eternal happiness, but not mere immortality itself. In consequence of assuming that men are to live forever, as surely as God himself, no wonder that the Gospel "life" has been set aside in its primary import, and happiness, ceaseless happiness, alone held forth as the grand blessing to be obtained through the interposition of the Son of God on our behalf. The whole mistake, and a mournful one it has been, proceeded from the assumption just mentioned, and in what that originated we stop not at present to consider.

For the honor of the Lord Jesus Christ, for the completeness and consistency of his teaching, for the unspeakable delight of his followers, for the illumination of men yet in their sins, let us take for granted no longer that our race is destined to immortality. On the withdrawal of this assumption a huge erection of misapprehension, and not a little superstition of the darkest hue, perishes; the gift of God beams forth in richest benignity, and the universe is bathed in a mellower light. Jesus imparts life, and endless life to his friends; happiness he no doubt confers on them also, but being immortal, incorruptible being---through a resurrection from among the dead is the sublime product of his philanthrophy and might. His mission among men had a view to the future especially. It was in the midst of the dying and the dead that he announced "I am the life," "he that believeth on me, though he were dead"---though he must die---"yet shall he live," and "live for ever." In a world of immortals he might have exclaimed ---"I am the blessedness;" among men who had no life in themselves, whose breath was in their nostrils, who were hastening to the grave, he was required to present himself as the Life Giver---one who would resurrect the inmates of the sepulchre, and cause his saints to inherit an angel-like and enduring style of being.

Let us therefore disclose him as the Life of men; and assure the Christless that eternity instead of being their home will be their grave! "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so was the Son of Man lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life"---John iii. 14, 16. The bitten Israelites needed life, all that they had thus would have given to escape impending death; without money life was restored to them---their days were prolonged, by looking to the serpent of brass. So now it is life---life from the dead---an incorruptible and glorified resurrection---that is needed by men, and lo! it is reachable, for Jesus is "The Resurrection and the Life." It was infinite love that wrought the miracle in the desert,---mercy shone there in benign effulgence, but oh! how it radiates from Jesus, and from his cross, and from Joseph's tomb. The Israelites had their existence continued for a brief space of time, but at length the dark foe of man flapped his wings over them as his talons rent their vitals; the life set before us in the gospel of heaven is one that death will never reach. Life and love radiate from the eternal throne, they are concentrated in the Son of the blessed, and the blaze is excessively glorious. That Being with power so vast, and pity so profound, sends to each unsaved member of our lost family a message of sorrow and desire from behind the veil that hides him temporarily from view and its divine burden is this---"Ye will not come to me, that ye might have life"---W. G. Moncrieff.

SENTENTIOUS PARAGRAPHS.

Sorrow is a summons to come up higher in Christian character.

God communicates himself to us in proportion as we are prepared to receive him.

Strong to consume small troubles, to command
Great thoughts, grave thoughts, thoughts lasting to the end.

Service takes its value from character. The dime, as well as the eagle, takes honor from the state whose imprint it bears. Mind must and will control matter. The power of the Roman church to-day is the intelligence of their leaders, and the ignorance of the masses. No wonder they so persistently oppose our public school system. No wonder the colored people are excluded from every opportunity to rise above the status of a well developed animal.

FINE LINEN.

According to the Building News, a piece of linen has been found at Memphis containing 540 picks to the inch, and it is recorded that one of the Pharaohs sent to the Lydian king, Crœsus, a corslet made of linen and wrought with gold, each fine thread of which was composed of 360 smaller threads twisted together! The ancient Egyptians wove a fabric called [illegible] of justice," or "justification," [illegible] and valuable was it that it was esteemed the most acceptable offering to the "Restorer of Life." A few hand looms can still be seen at work in the eastern bazaars of Cairo, the cloth woven in which rivals in texture, color, and design the finest glass screens of Munich.

The site of a millstone manufactory of the bronze age is thought to have been discovered at Auvernier, near Neuchatel. Millstones in all stages of manufacture have recently been brought to light there.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, NOV. 2, 1880.

WE occupy but little space editorially this week, as we have been necessarily absent from home a part of the time since our last issue.

THE two following items we have clipped from Messiah's Herald, which show that God's word is not without its effect, although infidelity is so widely spread, and inquity is so prevalent in these last perilous times. The gospel will not prove a failure. Our Redeemer will see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied, in a glorified church redeemed by his precious blood.

Prophetic Study.—A mission paper recently gave us the following items of religious prosperity as the result of mission work among the Jews and other peoples. "The missions among the Jews in Turkey are prospering. Five stations, with five ordained missionaries are maintained at as many important centres. The Jews seem to be awakening to a spirit of inquiry into Christianity. At Smyrna a weekly meeting is maintained for the study of the prophecies and the attendance is frequently upwards of one hundred." This is a hopeful omen, and we trust such gatherings will be multiplied and the scope of prophetic inquiry be far-reaching in its embraces—taking in the predictions, not only of Christ's first coming, but also of his second.

French Missions.—"Rev. Dr. Fisch, of Paris, says that four million copies of the Bible have been sold in France; that all the young men in the army have been taught to read the gospel of John, and that five hundred thousand young men have learned that gospel by heart; that one hundred thousand soldiers, driven into Switzerland, during the late war, returned each with a New Testament in his hand. Can we wonder at the remarkable religious movement in France?" No. "My word shall not return unto me void," saith the Lord. The wonder is that the masses of Christendom do not better understand or act more in harmony with the divine philosophy of cause and effect—of Christian work and Christian results. "Go teach all nations, and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end," is the sacred commission and promise.

THE following items of news are significant in the present crisis of history as fulfilling important predictions made by God's holy prophets long ago:

"And there shall be an highway for the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Asayria; like as it was to Israel in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt." The concession for the highway is granted, and the "remnant of his people" is coming to light. It is sublime to be living in this age.

LONDON, Oct. 21.—The Porte has granted a concession for a railway through Syria to India. The concessionaries are English capitalists, and the scheme is promoted by Sir Austin Layard and Lord Salisbury.

NEWS OF THE LONG-LOST TRIBES.

The Report that a Portion of the Ten Tribes Has Been Found.

Prof. Sachau, who has lately returned from the East, brings news of a discovery that cannot fail to prove interesting to all Bible students. In 2 Kings xvii. 6, we read that "the King of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah, and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes." In the 18th chapter and 11th verse this is repeated. From the context in both places one gathers that Shalmaneser carried the Israelites away; although he did in reality die during the three years of the siege, which was brought to successful conclusion by his successor, Sargon, in 720. In 1 Chron. v. 26, the deportation of the Israelites is ascribed to Pul and to Tigath-Pilneser—both, probably, names for the same person, the predecessor of Shalmaneser. The Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh are mentioned as those whom he deported, and Hara is added to the places mentioned in Kings. It may be well to recall, in passing, that Tigath-Pilneser actually did wrest the trans-Jordanic territory from the King of Israel. In the apocryphal book of Tobit we find the Israelites spoken of as dwelling in the cities of the Medes, and a city, Rages, is mentioned, a place in the neighborhood of the modern Teheran, south of the Caspian Sea. Shortly after, or about the time of the capture of Samaria, Sargon conducted some campaigns in Babylonia and Elam, on the Persian Gulf, and from these regions he brought inhabitants to supply the vacancy caused by the deportation of the Israelites.

Halah was a portion of the city of Nineveh, the capital of the capital, which had apparently, at the time of Sargon's accession, been somewhat depopulated by civil strife. The cities of the Medes were southeast of the Sea of Urmia and south of the Caspian. But where was "Habor, a river of Gozan?" Both names appear twice. Habor appears as a tributary of the Euphrates, and Gozan as a part of Mesopotamia. For a long time this was supposed to be the region meant. There had, however, been no wars or disturbances of any sort to cause the depopulation of this part of Mesopotamia, and it is difficult to see why Sargon should have made room for them there. Further, to settle them in a place from which they could so readily return to their home would have been contrary to the Assyrian policy. There was also a scarcely known Habor and Gozan in the neighborhood of the Sea of Urmia, and there is yet a valley of Habor west of that sea. The expeditions of Tiglath-Pilneser and Shalmaneser against Media, against Naurl, about the Sea of Urmia, and against a land that is unknown, because the inscription is defective, but which lay apparently in the same northeasterly direction from Nineveh, would have made room for the importation of people from Samaria; and we find, in point of fact, "the cities of the Medes" mentioned as a place into which the Israelites were settled. This locality would have been far enough removed from Samaria to preclude the possibility of return. It satisfies, further, the close connection in the Bible narrative between Gozan and Media.

West of the Sea of Urmia, among the mountains, dwells the small remnant that still speaks Aramean. While travelling in this region, Prof. Sachau heard of some valleys inhabited by Jews. After some difficulty, he succeeded in visiting them. He found a people speaking the Turkish tongue, but retaining the Jewish religion. They had a tradition that they belonged to the ten tribes of Israel and that they had been brought thither by the Assyrians. There seems no reason to doubt the truth of their tradition. The Israelites of Nineveh and in the cities of the Medes naturally were lost in the population about them; but these Israelites, so isolated among the mountain valleys, would just as naturally have preserved their identity in the same way that the Ammonites have preserved their language. Hebrews they certainly are. They could not have come out of Babylon, unless a body of commercial Jews suffered an impossible metamorphosis into agricultural Israelites. Unless you derive them from the ten tribes of Israel they remain unexplained.

It is a pity that Prof. Sachau, not being an Old Testament scholar, did not interest himself as to the Hebrew text they use, nor as to any divergency of rites or ceremonies from those now in use among the Jews. It is, of course, probable that they came under the influence of the ubiquitous mercantile Jews, accepted their texts, and were rabbinized; but it is, nevertheless, possible that a search among them might be richly rewarded.

It is interesting to trace the fate of the different tribes. A part of Simeon was absorbed in Judah. A part as we learn from I. Chronicles iv., 42, migrated to Mount Seir, and ultimately were lost among the Arabs. The Rechabites seem to have taken the same direction, namely, toward Arabia. Reuben appears to have lost itself in Moab. Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh were absorbed in other peoples. Of Ephraim, probably Issachar, and the other half of Manasseh the well-to-do people were deported by Sargon; the poorer classes, with settlers from Babylonia and Elam, formed the Samaritans, so hated by the Jews. Asher, Naphtali, Zebulon, and the greater part of Dan, so far as they were not lost in the neighboring Phœnician and Aramaic population, formed, with some admixture from the Jews proper, the despised Galileans, Judah, Levi, Benjamin, a part of Simeon, and a part of Dan, with stray families from other tribes, are the modern Jews.

Among the Jews of Habor, or some of the Jewish tribes of Arabia, it is not impossible that valuable discoveries may yet be made.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Our Earthly House, and the Building of God.

The epistles of Paul are full of symbolic language and metaphors; of which a marked instance is seen in 2 Cor. v. 1, and the four first verses of the chapter taken together, run we should say, quite into the style of parable. Two houses are presented placing in very strong contrast the present and the future dwelling of God's people. The great odds, between things now seen and destined to pass away—they being temporal; and things not yet seen, because not yet come to existence, but to come and to remain, because they are eternal, chapter iv. 18 is supplemented as follows: "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

The earthly house is but temporal, and is to be taken to pieces dissolved—for it is but a temporary tent, and has been built by hands or human agencies. But the building of God—our house which is from heaven—belongs to things "eternal in the heavens."

Though writing to Corinthian Gentiles there is a historic Jewish reference to a likeness, in the temporary tabernacle put up by the twelve tribes on the way from Egypt, in which "Moses as a faithful servant in all God's house," governed and ruled all Israel, as religious conductor, temporal Judge and Chief Magistrate, "For there was a tabernacle made: the first, etc." This was taken down—dissolved to give place to the temple, itself also temporary.

But a perfect and enduring building was expected, as the following: "But Christ being come, a high priest of good things to come,"—not good things that have ever yet come, but to come—"by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building." Heb. ix. 1, 2, 11. Moses was God's sovereign servant over the house of Israel in the first tabernacle—all God's house. "But Christ as a Son over his own house; whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end." Heb. iii. 5, 6. Therefore the greater and more perfect tabernacle—the house of Christ not yet made—being of the good things to come and to be eternal, will be the building of God, a house from heaven, and eternal in the heavens, when the present temporal earthly tabernacle of the Gentile times, dominating over Jews and Gentiles now, shall give place to the new order of things that will not be dissolved or moved or shaken, but will remain.

Here let us pause a moment to reflect on the theological earth, the absurdity often cried to the public, earthly houses of these tabernacles, being dissolved daily, and immortals transmigrating to other houses—bodies not made with hands—eternal in heaven. What a floating wisp of straw to catch at? what a parallax to Paul's great idea, without any point of concluding agreement? As if the great pyramid, had been changed to a child's wooden spinning top! Is it, "our earthly houses of these tabernacles?" or is it, "our earthly house of this tabernacle," a common residence for many individual occupants? Does the strong implication that it was made with hands, or by human agency, as was Israel's tabernacle and temple, fitly contrast with the "house from heaven," the "building of God not made with hands? How about human bodies made with hands, in contrast with house bodies, built without hands?"

A tabernacle or tent was the dwelling put up for a family. It might be the common center of a tribe, or of many tribes, as in the case of Israel's tabernacle, the place of the chief ruler. Inspiration has constructed metaphoric tabernacles upon the largest idea. The vast expanse of cloud that closes over the entire cerulean arch, is a tabernacle in Scripture metaphor, "Behold God is great. . . . For he maketh small the drops of water: they pour down rain according to the vapor thereof. . . . Also, can any understand the spreadings of the clouds, or the noise of his tabernacle?" Job xxxvi. 26, 27, 29, meaning the loud peals of thunder that crash and roar through the vast cloudy tabernacle.

Again: "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handiwork," "In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun, which as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race. His going forth is from the end of the heaven, and his circuit unto the end of it; and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof," Psalm xix. 1, 4-6. The heavens and firmament are a vast tabernacle set for the sun, which with all his glory and strength goes through as a monarch through his dominions dispensing light and warmth.

Our last passage for an illustration is from Isa. xvi. 5, and is believed to be well in harmony with the Apostle's figurative idea, both of the earthly tabernacle, and the house from heaven. Speaking with prophetic prescience Isaiah says: "Let mine outcasts dwell with the Moab. . . . for the extortioner is at an end, the spoiler ceaseth, the oppressors are consumed out of the land. And in mercy shall the throne be established; and he shall sit upon it in truth in the tabernacle of David, judging, and seeking judgment, and hasting righteousness."

According to this, at the end of Gentile supremacy oppressors will be consumed out of Israel's land, and Messiah's throne will be established in the tabernacle of David. Literally there is not and will not be any tabernacle of David in existence. But the kingdom of David is the tabernacle intended, as must be obvious to all. Therefore in the latitude of metaphor or figure, a dominion or kingdom or empire, is a tabernacle.

So Paul speaks within the bounds of inspiration, of the earthly structure, the house of this tabernacle in which Christians dwell; which at that time was Cesar's, whose center was at Rome.

A tabernacle spreading over men, similar to the closing over of the rain cloud of Job, or the all comprehending tabernacle for the sun—the firmament of the heavens; or yet "the tabernacle of David which is fallen down," whose ruins are to be restored and it set up, Acts xv. 16, meaning the dominion of David's royal son and heir; this being our house from heaven so ardently desired as the true Christian hope, foreseen by John, with the entire change of all things—the former things—those of then and now, having passed away as he beheld, and the tabernacle of God, the house which is from heaven, established with men.

This is the greater and more perfect tabernacle, of the good things to come, not to be dissolved, not of Jewish building, not made with hands. Glory to God, for the assured hope that present pain and tears and sorrow and crying, will pass away from earth when the tabernacle of God comes to be with men, and death is forever no more, being quenched by sweet immortality. See Rev. xxi. 1-5. "Behold I make all things new," is the summing up of future facts.

From both Old and New Testament usage we follow Paul in enlarging the idea of a simple or literal earthly made tabernacle, made with human agency, by his justified use of metaphors.

Was Cesars vastly expensive tabernacle a happy house for Christians? The Apostle says: "In this we groan!" The ruler of that time is called the fourth beast dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; with ten horns on his head, each to be in time divided off as a beast of itself, and grow to an organization. Another horn also growing up among them was prophetically seen, which should wear out the saints of God and dissipate them, Dan. vii. 7, 20, 21, 25. "In this we groan," says the Apostle, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon"—covered over—" with our house which is from heaven. If being so clothed," covered, sheltered—" we shall not be found naked"—unprotected.

"For in this we groan,.....our house which is from heaven." What an opportunity of expressing a multitudinous plurality of individual houses is here passed by, neglected, ignored! Would that all might appreciate the true reason, which is, only one house now and one house in future for the collective body of Christ. "For in this we groan;" "for we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened; not that we would be unclothed" shelterless, "but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life."
